THE PARLIAMENTARY DEBATES

OFFICIAL REPORT

IN THE THIRD SESSION OF THE FIFTY-THIRD PARLIAMENT OF THE UNITED KINGDOM OF GREAT BRITAIN AND NORTHERN IRELAND
[WHICH OPENED 13 JUNE 2001]

FIFTY-THIRD YEAR OF THE REIGN OF
HER MAJESTY QUEEN ELIZABETH II

SIXTH SERIES VOLUME 419

FIFTH VOLUME OF SESSION 2003–2004

House of Commons

Monday 15 March 2004

The House met at half-past Two o'clock

PRAYERS

[MR. SPEAKER in the Chair]

The House observed two minutes' silence in memory of those who died as a result of the bombings in Madrid on 11 March.

Oral Answers to Questions

WORK AND PENSIONS

The Secretary of State was asked—

Student Nurses

1. Mr. Harry Barnes (North-East Derbyshire) (Lab): If he will hold discussions with the Treasury and the Department of Health on changing his Department's definition of remunerative employment to include student nurses on clinical placements. [160831]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Work and Pensions (Mr. Chris Pond): The child tax credit introduced in April 2001 extended support to around 100,000 families, including students and student nurses, who were previously excluded from support under the working families tax credit. Time spent by student nurses on clinical placements is a period of study, not paid employment, and such periods therefore cannot be treated as remunerative work for working tax credit purposes.

Mr. Barnes: Student nurses undertake nursing duties as part of their studies. Why can they not qualify for the child-care element of working families tax credit? One of my constituents may have to pack in her studies after having a baby because she cannot afford child care. Does this not remove a vital future resource from the health service, and waste the bursary moneys that have already been paid in connection with my constituent's studies so far?

Mr. Pond: As my hon. Friend will know, we are doing all that we can to increase the number of nurses and student nurses. He will also know that we have made a public commitment that every health-care student will be entitled to child-care grants for children under five, worth up to 70 per cent. of child-care costs. The Department of Health is currently developing the means to make that commitment a reality by autumn this year. That means that while student nurses are not entitled to the child-care element of working families tax credit because they are not in remunerative employment, they will be entitled to parallel and broadly similar support if they have young children.

Mr. Bob Blizzard (Waveney) (Lab): Will my hon. Friend also discuss with the Treasury the definition of "remunerative employment" in relation to school crossing patrol officers—the lollipop men and women who do such a great job looking after our children, standing outside in all weathers and all conditions? As he knows, they are very low paid and often have to claim benefits and other allowances. At present they are not entitled to the higher-earnings disregard. Would my hon. Friend consider awarding it to them? They deserve it, and we might find it easier to recruit such people as a result.

Mr. Pond: The whole House will want to join my hon. Friend in paying tribute to the work of school crossing keepers. He has been assiduous in raising the issue with my Department. Whether extending the disregard would be an appropriate way of rewarding those people is in question; we are considering it, but I cannot promise that we will be able to act. Nevertheless, I pay tribute to my hon. Friend and to those whose case he has raised.

Benefit Fraud

2. Syd Rapson (Portsmouth, North) (Lab): What measures he is taking to combat fraud in the benefit system. [160834]

5. Miss Anne McIntosh (Vale of York) (Con): If he will make a statement on the level of benefit fraud in (a) 1997 and (b) 2003. [160838]

The Secretary of State for Work and Pensions (Mr. Andrew Smith): Tackling fraud is a key priority. Ours is the first Government to measure fraud properly, to set targets for its reduction, and to legislate for the tools to do the job. We are penalising more fraudsters, recovering more money and putting out the clear message that benefit fraud is wrong.

The latest figures show that since 1997 we have cut fraud and error in income support and jobseeker's allowance by 29 per cent., which equates to £400 million a year. Beating benefit fraud is good news for legitimate claimants and good news for taxpayers.

Syd Rapson: I thank the Secretary of State for that answer. We all agree that tackling benefit fraud is crucial to maintaining trust in the system, but what advice can he give to the fledgling Liberal Democrat councillors of Portsmouth city council, who are in the difficult situation of having to find £200,000 from their meagre budgets simply to deal with the backlog?

Mr. Smith: My advice to Liberal Democrats in Portsmouth—fledgling or otherwise—is the same as to other local authorities: to work with us in combating fraud. More than 80 per cent. of local authorities are involved with the verification framework, and £160 million has already been provided to help local authorities with anti-fraud work. That sum increased to £233 million for the three years from April 2003. I do not know whether Portsmouth is one of those authorities, but I shall check, as, I dare say, will my hon. Friend.

Miss McIntosh: I thank the Secretary of State for that answer, but can he give the comparable figure for errors and failures to pay out on the part of his Department, and assure the House that he is indeed in control of his Department and its officials? In the past year alone, there have been between seven and 12 cases of people making legitimate claims for all sorts of benefits, particularly the pension credit, and then having to extract an apology from his Department because it failed to pay them. Is he in control, or are the officials getting carried away with their errors?

Mr. Smith: I am glad that the hon. Lady confirms that we apologise when we get things wrong, and I of course apologise for any individual such instance. Given that fraud is down by 39 per cent. since 1997, and that fraud and error are down by 29 per cent., it is clear that error has not fallen as far and needs to fall further. However, it has been falling.

Mr. David Ruffley (Bury St. Edmunds) (Con): Last year, the National Audit Office published a report on tackling benefit fraud, which said of housing benefit fraud:

"Although a Government review in 2000 proposed partial simplification as a first step, in practice the scheme has become more complex, with many changes."

Can the Secretary of State tell us why he has failed?

Mr. Smith: As the hon. Gentleman knows, we have not only introduced measures to simplify housing benefit administration; we are piloting the flat rate local housing allowance, which takes account of income, family circumstances and area and cuts out reams of red tape in the administration of that benefit. We have to evaluate that pilot properly, but as I reported to the House last week, the early results are very encouraging. I repeat the injunction to all local authorities that I mentioned to my hon. Friend the Member for Portsmouth, North (Syd Rapson): it is very important that central Government and local government work closely together to simplify benefits such as housing benefit, to make sure that they are efficiently administered and to tackle fraud.

Mr. George Osborne (Tatton) (Con): If the Secretary of State is making such progress in tackling fraud and error in his Department, can he predict when he expects to produce a set of departmental annual reports that are not qualified by the National Audit Office because they are full of fraud and error?

Mr. Smith: We are of course working very closely with the NAO, precisely in order to get our accounts into the shape that everyone wants them to be in. As I said, we have made considerable progress in combating fraud and error, but I will not take lectures from Conservative Front Benchers, given that the Conservatives did not even measure fraud properly when in government.

Pension Credit

3. David Taylor (North-West Leicestershire) (Lab/Co-op): What recent estimate he has made of the number of eligible pensioners in the east midlands who have yet to make an application for pension credit; and if he will make a statement. [160835]

The Secretary of State for Work and Pensions (Mr. Andrew Smith): We cannot estimate eligibility with precision, especially at the regional level, because we would have to take only partial data from the national survey, which would in any case be a couple of years out of date. But today we have published the latest monthly pension credit progress report, which shows that up to 29 February, 2.26 million pensioner households and 2.73 million individuals across the country, and 158,000 households and 192,000 individuals in the east midlands were already receiving pension credit.

David Taylor: Our Government have achieved a great deal in their focus on pensioner poverty, but the take-up level of pension credit causes considerable concern. Does the Secretary of State agree with last week's Pensions Policy Institute report? It said that a single, flat-rate pension, set at guaranteed credit level, paid to all and indexed to earnings, had much to commend it, being simpler, more robust, fairer and affordable in the long term. Is not that the way to tackle present and future take-up problems?

Mr. Smith: As we have debated on several occasions in the House, there are always attractions of a flat-rate, universal pension and other payments that can be put forward. However, the arithmetic is such that if we spent all the money that goes into pension credit on the basic state pension, although we could increase the pension for a single pensioner from £77 to something like £90, the poorest pensioners in our country would be more than £30 a week worse off as a consequence. I thank my hon. Friend for his comments on our progress in tackling pensioner poverty. He will be interested to know that 2,745 households in his constituency now receive pension credit, which is 36 per cent. more than received the minimum income guarantee.

Pensions

4. Mr. Eric Illsley (Barnsley, Central) (Lab): What advice is being given by his Department regarding the value of the state retirement pension for people born after 1962. [160836]

The Minister for Pensions (Malcolm Wicks): We provide information through such means as leaflets and the internet on how the amounts of basic and additional state pension are determined, and on known changes. Anyone can ask for a state pension forecast and we also now have combined forecasts, which combine state and company forecasts. More than 1 million have been sent out.

Mr. Illsley: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for that response, but I was somewhat surprised, while pursuing a recent constituency inquiry into a contribution record and the value of a future retirement pension, to be told by benefits office staff that the value of the retirement pension of anyone born after 1962 would be negligible. If that is not the case, will my hon. Friend ensure that benefits officers are reminded of the absolute truth of that matter, to prevent such misleading information from being circulated?

Malcolm Wicks: My colleagues in the Department were intrigued by my hon. Friend's reference to 1962; I knew that it was not the date when Barnsley last won the FA cup. In all seriousness, I hear my hon. Friend's point and if anyone in the Pension Service has misled him, I apologise on its behalf. We have rigorous training and education programmes but on this occasion, someone has clearly said something that is just plain daft. We will learn the lessons from that, but we have an excellent Pension Service, which is now doing a very good job across the country, including making large numbers—about 350,000—of home visits. However, on this occasion, we have clearly failed my hon. Friend.

Mr. David Willetts (Havant) (Con): May I invite the Minister to agree that it would be just plain daft to expect that the pension crisis could be solved by putting more and more pensioners on to means-tested benefits, thereby penalising people for saving? Does he not agree that the best way forward, for people who were born before 1962 and for those born after 1962, would be to raise the value of the basic state pension? Is that not what Mr. Alan Pickering has proposed this week, and why does the Minister not follow his advice?

Malcolm Wicks: It was a Conservative Government who, no doubt advised by the young—then even younger—hon. Gentleman, abolished the earnings link with the basic state pension in 1980. That meant that this Government inherited a situation of much pensioner poverty, which we had to tackle through targeted means. On the important issue of savings, whereas under the Conservative Government there was a pound for pound reduction against income support for any savings, we have introduced the savings credit element of the pension credit so that savings can be rewarded.

Mr. Willetts: Does the Minister not recognise, however, that there is a growing consensus that the best way forward is to increase the value of the basic state pension, to help to get pensioners off means-tested benefits and to encourage people to save? That is what the National Association of Pension Funds wants, what the charities looking after old people want and what the Conservative party is calling for. Why is the Minister in a minority, opposing that proposal?

Malcolm Wicks: The difficult and, I am bound to say—in terms of its impact—cruel logic of the Conservative proposals is that as the basic state pension increased, apparently in line with earnings, the poorest and most hard pressed, including those on pension credit, would presumably receive only a price-inflation increase. The cruel logic of the hon. Gentleman's proposals is that the poorest elderly—who are often the oldest, two out of three of them women—would gain least from the Tory proposals.

Ms Diane Abbott (Hackney, North and Stoke Newington) (Lab): On reducing pensioner poverty, is not the real problem with reliance on mean-tested benefits that, despite the time and money spent by both the previous Conservative Government and this Government on increasing the take-up of claims, pensioners are more reluctant than any other group of claimants to apply for means-tested benefits? So long as the Government rely on means-tested benefits to relieve pensioner poverty, a substantial minority of pensioners will remain poor.

Malcolm Wicks: As my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State has acknowledged, to put every extra billion pounds—we have now spent some £9 billion extra on pensions since 1997—simply on to the flat rate would make life easier for our Department, in that it would be administratively simpler, but would it be fairer? Would it be fairer to women or to the poor and hard pressed? Of course, the answer is no. Although there are some who wish to knock pension credit, it is proving a great success. We are on target, so much so that 1.9 million individuals—almost 2 million—are better off financially because of pension credit. I hope, therefore, that colleagues will not talk about this as a failure when in fact it is a considerable success for public service.

Disability Living Allowance

6. Mr. James Gray (North Wiltshire) (Con): If he will make a statement on the number of people claiming disability living allowance. [160839]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Work and Pensions (Maria Eagle): In the five years to 31 August 2003, the number of severely disabled people receiving disability living allowance increased by more than 25 per cent. to more than 2.5 million. In 2003–04, we expect to spend some £7.5 billion on helping people with the extra costs arising from their disability.

Mr. Gray: A constituent of mine was, tragically, one of those involved in the Bali bomb outrage, in which he lost his right arm. On returning to the UK, he applied for disability living allowance but was told that he was not eligible for it because he had been resident abroad in Beijing for six months. Will the Minister consider changing that rule, so that people who have been disabled in such terrorist tragedies or who are serving in our armed services overseas would none the less be eligible for the allowance immediately on their return to the UK?

Maria Eagle: I have every sympathy with the hon. Gentleman's constituent. If we changed for individual groups of people the eligibility for DLA and the time that a person has to wait before getting the benefit in payment, it would make the administration of the benefit incredibly difficult. We shall, however, bear in mind what the hon. Gentleman has brought to the House today, and we shall certainly consider what he has said.

Mr. Steve Webb (Northavon) (LD): Will the Minister confirm that the last time that a Government attempted to measure the proportion of people entitled to this important disability benefit was in 1996–97, before the present Government even came to power? Will she confirm that the estimate at that time was that half of all seriously disabled people entitled to this important benefit were not claiming it? Why have the Government done no work on assessing the scale of the problem now? Why has there not been a mass take-up campaign for DLA? Is it acceptable that £1 billion for disabled people is going unclaimed every year?

Maria Eagle: The hon. Gentleman might not have heard my response to the hon. Member for North Wiltshire (Mr. Gray), which was that the number of people taking up disability living allowance and qualifying for it has increased by 25 per cent. It is difficult to say, ahead of a claim, who would be entitled to the benefit and who would not, because it is not income related. Rather, it is dependent on the effect of a disabling condition on the care and mobility needs of the individual concerned. It is therefore not at all easy to come up with sensible and reliable figures about what the take-up of the benefit might mean. Also, there are some methodological faults in the studies to which the hon. Member for Northavon (Mr. Webb) referred.

Means-tested Benefits

7. Simon Hughes (Southwark, North and Bermondsey) (LD): What the take-up rate of means-tested benefits was in Greater London at the beginning of 2004. [160840]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Work and Pensions (Mr. Chris Pond): Today my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State announced the publication of the latest progress report, which shows that, as at 29 February 2004, 245,000 pensioner households in London were receiving pension credit, with an average award of £59. Additionally, at the latest count in August 2003, there were 364,400 non-minimum income guarantee income support claimants, and 133,000 income-based jobseeker's allowance claimants in London. I regret that details of housing benefit and council tax benefit are not available below national level.

Simon Hughes: The figures are useful as far as they go, but I hope that the Minister will also provide the other half of the sets of figures, by which I mean the number of people in Greater London who are not receiving the benefits to which they are entitled. Given that the Government are now moving towards some sort of conclusion on a form of local taxation that is different from the present one, will the Minister assure the House that his Department is feeding into other Departments the proposal that would make it much easier for people not just to pay a fair contribution towards local tax, but to receive what they are entitled to locally from the state? That matters hugely to people in this city and in the rest of the country.

Mr. Pond: Sadly, the hon. Gentleman will not have heard our earlier discussions, as he obviously has a just-in-time approach to oral questions, but we have already discussed issues surrounding the take-up of various benefits. He will know that we are working very hard to ensure that people who need and deserve help—those who are entitled to pension credit, council tax benefit, attendance allowance and other benefits—do get that help. I hope that the hon. Gentleman will join us in that process. On his proposals for reforming council tax, he knows that we are examining its structure to see if a more appropriate means of local taxation is possible. I very much doubt, however, whether it will end up being the Lib-Dem proposal for a form of local income tax.

Mr. John Redwood (Wokingham) (Con): Is not the complexity of the system one of the reasons why take-up is so disappointing? Given that the Government have extended means-tested benefits so high up the income scale, is it not an administrative absurdity that people have to pay tax with one hand in order to get it back as benefit with the other? Could that not be simplified and made much easier for people—[Interruption.]—in Greater London.

Mr. Pond: The right hon. Gentleman may be disappointed, but Government Members are not disappointed. Increasing numbers of people—hundreds, thousands and millions—are getting extra help, whether through the pension credit or new tax credits for families with children. If Conservative Members spoke more to their constituents to find out whether they are disappointed, they would find that most people—certainly with the pension credit, which follows a simple free phone call—are able to discover what they are entitled to. Many hundreds of thousands of them are doing precisely that, and are better off as a result.

Pensions

8. Mr. Barry Sheerman (Huddersfield) (Lab/Co-op): If he will introduce a fund to compensate those who have lost their pensions as a result of insolvency.

[160842]

The Minister for Pensions (Malcolm Wicks): We do, of course, have an understanding of the position facing workers who have lost pension rights on account of company insolvency. Indeed, my ministerial colleagues and I have met many such workers to discuss problems with them. There are complex arguments on both sides about what action should be taken, and we are giving them serious consideration.

Mr. Sheerman: Does my hon. Friend agree that the constituency problem that many of us feel poses the greatest injustice is when constituents who may have worked 40 years for a company tell us that they have lost their entire pension entitlement? Sometimes they have worked on in an attempt to save their company from going bust, thus failing to take up their pensions just in time as some of their colleagues have done. Will my hon. Friend talk to his Treasury colleagues? I remember back in 1979—I have been in this place a long time—that the Conservative Government introduced a retrospective tax on bank profits. Would that not be a good way to help finance the 60,000 people who have suffered such a bad deal?

Mr. Wicks: A number of proposals have been made both by Members and outsiders as to how the position can best be remedied. We are looking seriously at them, but we have to say on this occasion—and repeat the point—that it would be wrong to offer any false hope to those people at this stage. We are examining the circumstances very seriously, as I said. I must add that this is the first Government who have taken action to ensure that those scandals cannot happen in the future. That is why we are legislating now with the Pensions Bill for a pension protection fund, which will bring security to 10 million scheme members and their families. It is a major social advance.

Adam Price (East Carmarthen and Dinefwr) (PC): The Secretary of State helpfully announced in an earlier debate that work had been initiated on trying to assess the precise extent of the pension deficit for the 60,000 people facing this problem. Will the Minister tell us what progress has been made so far in that assessment and when we can expect an announcement in the House?

Malcolm Wicks: Work is, of course, going on, but all I can say at this stage is that we will bring forward those estimates when we are in a position to do so, which is not today.

Kevin Brennan (Cardiff, West) (Lab): Has my hon. Friend looked through the information given over the years to people in final salary occupational pension schemes? Has he ever found any sort of health warning that told people that—as happened to the constituents of my hon. Friend the Member for Huddersfield (Mr. Sheerman)—they could work in a company for 40 years and that their pensions could be worth nothing at the end of the day? Did their companies, the quangos set up by the Government such as the Financial Services Authority and the Occupational Pensions Regulatory Authority or the Department for Work and Pensions warn them that that could happen at any stage?

Malcolm Wicks: My hon. Friend, together with other hon. Members on both sides of the House, is a great champion for that group of workers, and I pay tribute to him. I cannot add to what I have said already about the current group of workers, but I emphasise that people who have worked hard all their lives and who have contributed for 30 or 40 years have a right to security, which is why—subject to the will of the House—we will provide security from April next year through the protection fund introduced by the Pensions Bill.

Mr. Nigel Waterson (Eastbourne) (Con): Will the Minister accept that the Pensions Bill will do nothing for the 60,000 people who have already lost their pension rights? Will he accept those people's strong moral claim and the Conservative amendments to the Bill, which are designed to compensate those who have already lost their rights? Following this morning's meeting between Labour Members and the Prime Minister, has that important matter now been taken out of the Minister's hands?

Malcolm Wicks: We are having serious dialogue with concerned Members of Parliament about a serious issue, which, because it is serious, should not be subject to mere partisanship. We are engaged in serious dialogue and will take no lessons from Tory Front Benchers who deliberately advised hon. Members to vote against the Second Reading of the Pensions Bill, which will set up the security for the future that the hon. Gentleman pretends to want now. If he had had his way, the Pensions Bill would not have had a Second Reading.

Mr. Frank Field (Birkenhead) (Lab): Since the Minister told the House that we should not hold out false hope to the 60,000 people who have lost their pensions, the Chancellor of the Exchequer has briefed the media that he has plans to take some of the unclaimed assets from banks and building societies and use them to finance charitable activity. Will the Minister accept that most hon. Members believe that charity begins at home and that the best way to use those funds at home would be to finance the pensions of those who have lost out owing to their firms winding up schemes.

Malcolm Wicks: With all due respect to the newspaper scribes, I have passed the stage at which I believe everything that I read in the newspapers, whether it is about the Chancellor or any of my hon. Friends. We have obviously examined and considered the proposal championed by my right hon. Friend the Member for Birkenhead (Mr. Field), but I cannot pretend that there are easy answers. At the risk of boring the House, I repeat the point for those who read Hansard or who are watching at home that we must not offer false hope in a complex situation.

Mr. Jonathan Djanogly (Huntingdon) (Con): Last week, I received a delegation from members of the Samuel Jones pension scheme. Some 200 members of that scheme live in St. Neots in my constituency and face the miserable prospect of a no-pension retirement following the insolvency of the company for which they worked and the underfunding of their scheme. Samuel Jones had a particularly long-serving work force, and the losses involved are significant. The Minister is not taking the situation seriously enough. Does he appreciate how young people are being put off investing in pensions because the Government refuse to deal with that type of problem?

Malcolm Wicks: It does not help to suggest that Ministers are not seriously concerned. When I meet groups of workers who are in that situation—I am happy to meet the hon. Gentleman and the workers affected because I take his question seriously—they talk with quiet dignity about the effect on them. They discuss issues such as the effect on their health, the rotten part-time jobs they have had to take to supplement their incomes and the impact on their families and marriages, and I take the situation seriously.

Child Poverty

9. Mr. George Mudie (Leeds, East) (Lab): How the Government will continue to measure progress towards eradicating child poverty. [160844]

The Secretary of State for Work and Pensions (Mr. Andrew Smith): The blight of child poverty has many aspects, on which the Government report annually in "Opportunity for All". At the heart of poverty is, of course, low income. The new measure of child poverty, which I announced in December, reflects that, combining as it does absolute income, relative low income and material deprivation.

Mr. Mudie: I commend my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State and the Government on reaching their ambitious but necessary 2004 targets for cutting child poverty by 25 per cent. I note, however, that the criteria for child poverty have changed, after one consultation, and that three new measures will be introduced. Can my right hon. Friend assure the House that the change in no way represents a dilution of the Government's targets in this important area of policy?

Mr. Smith: We will not know for some time whether we have met the 2004–05 target, although the prospects are good for doing so on a before-housing cost basis. They are more challenging on the after-housing cost basis. On the substance of my hon. Friend's question, I can assure him that the new measure is every bit as rigorous. As he said, we have consulted extensively on the issue, and there was support for including material deprivation alongside relative and absolute low income, to give a composite measure that truly reflects the experience of poverty. Incidentally, we did not consult only academics: we consulted poor people, including children in poor families.

Andrew Selous (South-West Bedfordshire) (Con): Could the Secretary of State say a little more about his reasons for changing one of the measures from an after-housing cost basis to a before-housing cost basis? In areas such as mine, where housing costs are significant and constitute a large proportion of the family budget, my constituents are interested in how much money they have to spend after their housing costs. Many of us do not understand the change.

Mr. Smith: Subject to the Office for National Statistics, the full range of figures will continue to be published, both on an after-housing cost basis and a before-housing cost basis. The hon. Gentleman, other hon. Members and the public will be able to make a judgment in the round on how well we are achieving the objective. The other important point to make is that the material deprivation component of the new measure will illustrate whether high housing costs are giving people a low after-housing cost income.

Mr. Paul Goodman (Wycombe) (Con): The Government said in 1998, in their document "Supporting Families":

> "We do share the belief of the majority of people that marriage provides the most reliable framework for raising children."

Is that still the Secretary of State's view and, if so, what role does marriage play in the Government's child poverty measurements?

Mr. Smith: It plays an important role. That remains the Government's view. If the hon. Gentleman looked at the extra resources that the Government are putting into counselling and encouraging people to resolve relationship difficulties in the interests of their children, he might find that we are at one on the matter.

Employment Initiatives

11. Mr. Anthony D. Wright (Great Yarmouth) (Lab): What assessment he has made of the effectiveness of initiatives to get people to move from temporary to permanent employment since 1997. [160846]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Work and Pensions (Maria Eagle): Since 1997, the number of people in permanent jobs has risen by nearly 2 million while the number of people in temporary jobs has fallen by 250,000. Temporary work as a share of total employment in the UK is the lowest of the major EU economies, at around 6 per cent. compared with, for example, 13 per cent. in Germany, 15 per cent. in France and more than 30 per cent. in Spain. That achievement provides further clear evidence of the success of the Government's labour market policies, built on the principles of creating a framework of macro-economic stability; designing legislation to protect the vulnerable and disadvantaged; ensuring that work pays through the national minimum wage and tax credits; creating an adaptable productive workforce with the skills employers need; and encouraging and supporting economic activity.

Mr. Wright: I thank my hon. Friend the Minister for that response. I congratulate the Government on the initiatives that have certainly decreased unemployment levels in my constituency of Great Yarmouth. Long-term youth unemployment has fallen by 75 per cent. since 1997. However, one of the feeder sectors for employment are the training providers, and the great concern at present is that the initial success is gradually fading away. We need more encouragement for employers, who have been marvellous in bringing forward some of these initiatives.

Would my hon. Friend offer some comfort by telling us whether further initiatives might be set up to encourage employers to participate in both training and the new deal programme that has already been so successful?

Maria Eagle: I congratulate my hon. Friend, who is well known for the efforts he makes to reduce unemployment rates in his constituency and for the interest that he takes in the matter. It is true that although there has been a massive fall in long-term youth unemployment in his constituency, there is still a problem in the area. I hope that the roll-out of Jobcentre Plus in his constituency, which has taken place over the last year, will mean a better and more sensitive engagement with local employers to ensure that they are properly matched with local young people who want jobs, so that employers have staff with the skills they need and the remaining unemployment problem in my hon. Friend's constituency can be dealt with further.

Mr. David Drew (Stroud) (Lab/Co-op): Does my hon. Friend accept that there is a particular problem for those who go back to work after suffering a bout of mental illness? Is my hon. Friend likely to reconsider the relationship between the therapeutic earning rules, part-time paid work and the eventual move to a permanent wage, so that if things go wrong at any stage, people will not completely drop off the face of the earth but can come back into work? Will my hon. Friend consider that?

Maria Eagle: My hon. Friend refers to the permitted work rules under incapacity benefit. I can assure him and other Members, who have written to me on the subject in some numbers, that we are evaluating the impact of those rules and will be considering whether they have achieved what we hoped for when we changed them. There is no doubt that we shall be looking into whether more can be done, so I hope that will assist the people to whom my hon. Friend referred.

Retirement

12. Mr. Jim Cunningham (Coventry, South) (Lab): What plans he has to help people make informed choices about their retirement. [160847]

The Minister for Pensions (Malcolm Wicks): Last month, we set out the Government's strategy for informed choice. I mentioned earlier the importance of combined pension forecasts, another aspect of which is to maximise membership of existing schemes. It is particularly sad when workers have the right to join occupational schemes but do not make use of their right. We are thus exploring options for that, including auto-enrolment, active decision making and a commitment to save.

Mr. Cunningham: I noticed that, as part of my hon. Friend's proposals, he intends to use the national curriculum. Can he tell us how that will work?

Malcolm Wicks: Obviously, I could do so in great detail. Drawing on my knowledge as a former Minister for Lifelong Learning, I am aware of the importance of citizenship as an aspect of what is known as personal, social and health education. In the teaching of mathematics we should do our best, without over-egging the pudding—we shall not turn every 14-year-old into a pension expert; otherwise I should ask them to join the Conservatives—to raise concerns about financial literacy and the importance of saving.

Annabelle Ewing (Perth) (SNP): Surely, to enable people to make informed choices, the Government must spell out in greater detail the impact of their massive extension of means-testing. For example, I am sure it is not well known that the already miserly 25p allowance for the over-80s is—astonishingly—subject to means-testing in relation to the pension credit. We need more information about those astonishing and shameful positions adopted by new Labour.

Malcolm Wicks: The hon. Lady just has not got it, has she? Why draw on the history books to talk about 25p? Why not use this opportunity to inform her constituents about the importance of the extra £100 for all Scots in households where someone is over the age of 80? In fairness, the hon. Lady should present a balanced picture. What we are doing on pension credit, winter fuel payments and television licences is of great benefit to hard pressed people in Scotland—and in England and Wales, too.

Barbara Follett (Stevenage) (Lab): What measures is my hon. Friend taking to maximise the financial literacy of carers—especially women carers—to inform them about the benefits of the state second pension?

Malcolm Wicks: For several decades, home responsibilities for young children, for example, have been recognised. We are now making advances for carers. It cannot be right that people who might have to give up work completely to do the job of being a carer—where would we be without the army of carers?—may face as a consequence, not a reward, the possibility of poverty in their own old age. The state second pension, which will benefit some 20 million people in total, and especially those on low pay, will be of particular benefit to an estimated 2.5 million carers. Carers need more rights. We have done a lot as a Government, but perhaps we need to do more. However, the state second pension is a major development.

Sir Sydney Chapman (Chipping Barnet) (Con): I speak as a person who defines youth as anybody who is younger than a year older than I happen to be, but who recognises that time is racing ever faster. Do the Government intend to give help and advice to those of us who are voluntarily not seeking re-election about informed choices on retirement? If they do, may I suggest that it would be helpful to have confirmation that the next election will be held on Thursday 5 May next year?

Malcolm Wicks: I have been told the date, but I have not brought my diary with me, so I apologise to the hon. Gentleman. I cannot believe that he is even thinking of retiring. I urge him to be age positive, to have an active old age and to take part in voluntary activity—the local Labour party always needs some help.

Vera Baird (Redcar) (Lab): I highly commend the efforts that are currently being made to help people to make informed choices, but does my hon. Friend share any of my concerns about a group of married women who assert that they were unable to make informed choices when they moved on to the small stamp many years ago? They say that their husbands encouraged them to think that they could always rely on their stamp, and that they were encouraged by bosses to think that that was right. The money that they paid out then was wasted, and of course they would need it for their day-to-day outgoings. Does my hon. Friend have some sympathy for, and any proposals to help, women who find themselves in a bad way on pensions because of that lack of information?

Malcolm Wicks: If there is any evidence that people were deliberately misled and did not sign the form, we will examine individual cases. The women who signed up to pay the married woman's stamp, as it was then called, now feel a sense of grievance. However, if we took action on that, I ask my hon. and learned Friend to consider what other married women who also write to me would say. They did not have that money in the purse or the pocket, but they paid the married woman's stamp, so there are difficulties. Many of our policies are designed to address the impact on hard pressed women in old age, which is why the state second pension will be important for a new generation and why pension credit is important now. The credit goes to the older elderly, and two out of three people to whom it goes are women, because of the inequalities that they faced during their working lives.

Incapacity Benefit

13. Mr. Jim Marshall (Leicester, South) (Lab): If he will make a statement on helping people on incapacity benefit to get back to work. [160849]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Work and Pensions (Maria Eagle): Tackling jobseeker's allowance unemployment had to be our first priority in 1997, but we have already gone further than any previous Government to give people on incapacity benefits help to move into work. That said, inactivity remains our greatest challenge. As part of our welfare to work strategy, we are piloting pathways to work, a groundbreaking approach that gives people on incapacity benefit access to a comprehensive range of work-focused support, rehabilitation and financial incentives. The scheme is already generating encouraging feedback and will be extended to a further four districts next month.

Mr. Marshall: I thank my hon. Friend for that full response. Does she agree that the positive policies that she has outlined to the House today are in stark contrast to the policies pursued by previous Tory Administrations who, in effect, used incapacity benefit as a means of fiddling the unemployment figures? As a consequence, the number of people claiming incapacity benefit increased threefold between 1979 and 1997.

Maria Eagle: My hon. Friend is exactly right: there was a 300 per cent. increase during the Conservatives' tenure of office—not that I would seek to make party political points on such an occasion.

The number of people coming on to incapacity benefit has fallen by a third since 1997. At the same time, the number of people in jobs has increased by 1.7 million and 700,000 people have left the unemployment register. Any Government would be proud of that record. We are starting to put right the mess that the Conservatives made when they were in office.

Mr. George Foulkes (Carrick, Cumnock and Doon Valley) (Lab/Co-op): I was tempted to speak on the previous question, but like the hon. Member for Chipping Barnet (Sir Sydney Chapman), I would have had to declare an interest. This question is more appropriate, but I have been pre-empted by my hon. Friend the Member for Leicester, South (Mr. Marshall), who made the sort of Tory-bashing attack that I really enjoy, so instead I will have to ask—[HON. MEMBERS: "A question."] Indeed.

Many people in my constituency are on incapacity benefit. They are principally retired miners who have got out of the habit and routine of work. Does my hon. Friend agree that the pathways to work project needs to give them financial incentives and the self-confidence and self-belief that they can do something so that they get back into work? What can she do to achieve that?

Maria Eagle: I always enjoy listening to my right hon. Friend, whether he is asking me a question, bashing Tories or whatever. He is exactly right that one problem of long-term incapacity is a lack of confidence. In that regard, I am very encouraged to hear individual stories of people's experiences, which at this stage are anecdotal because it is too early to evaluate pathways to work. For example, a lady in south Wales who was on incapacity benefit for 25 years has just gone back to work as a result of pathways. Such stories give us hope that there can be a breakthrough and assist those on incapacity benefit, many of whom want to work, to get back into the labour market.

Economic Inactivity

15. Bob Spink (Castle Point) (Con): If he will make a statement on the level of economic inactivity in the economy. [160851]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Work and Pensions (Maria Eagle): Since 1997, the general growth in employment for the most disadvantaged groups has been greater than the growth in overall employment. There are now 170,000 fewer inactive lone parents since May 1997, and since that time the number of people moving on to incapacity-related benefits has declined.

We still have more to do. The employment rate for sick and disabled people remains significantly below that of the overall working population. That is our next challenge. Our strategy will continue to focus on the principles that have delivered so much labour market success. We will continue to make work pay and continue to put more inactive people in touch with the labour market through our new pathways to work pilot, which the hon. Gentleman will be pleased to hear will be extended to cover his constituency next month.

Bob Spink: That is all well and good, but the hon. Lady has not addressed the problem of young people. Is she not aware that more than 1 million young people are not working, training or studying? Does that not show that the new deal is failing?

Maria Eagle: I am very much afraid that the hon. Gentleman has disappointed me. I thought he was going to say that he was pleased that youth unemployment in his constituency is down by 68 per cent., that unemployment is down by 70 per cent., that long-term youth unemployment is down by 88 per cent., and that long-term unemployment in general is down by 92 per cent. He must have got out on the wrong side of the bed this morning.

Chris Bryant (Rhondda) (Lab): One cause of economic inactivity throughout the country is the significant increase over the past 10 years of the number people going on to incapacity benefit owing to emotional stress, depression and psychiatric illness. Will the Government put together a specific project to get more of those people into work, many of whom would desperately love to work if they possibly could?

Maria Eagle: My hon. Friend is right. Stress, mental illness and behavioural difficulties form one of the big three main disabling conditions of those who come on to incapacity benefit. In that respect, some of the rehabilitation and condition management programmes that are piloted in pathways to work concentrate on that group of people. It is too soon for me to say whether those intervention programmes will work, but I can say that for the first time in this country we are addressing that problem. We hope to develop programmes that will really tackle that difficulty and enable that group of people, who for far too long have been abandoned to benefits for ever, to get back into work, which is what most of them want to do.

Employment Policies

16. Ms Karen Buck (Regent's Park and Kensington, North) (Lab): What assessment he has made of the contribution of his Department's policies towards increasing levels of employment. [160852]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Work and Pensions (Mr. Chris Pond): As a result of both economic stability and our radical reform of labour market policies, 1.7 million more people are in work than in spring 1997—almost exactly the number of jobs that Opposition Members warned would be destroyed if we introduced the national minimum wage, a further increase in the level of which was announced today. Our tax and benefit policies now ensure that work pays. Through Jobcentre Plus, active labour market support has helped individuals move into work, especially through the new deal, which has helped lone parents, the young and long-term unemployed, the disabled and the over-50s move off benefit. That has benefited the economy to the tune of £500 million a year.

Ms Buck: I thank my hon. Friend for that answer. The Government deserve great credit for the success of those policies. However, is he aware that unemployment in London has fallen less than it has across the economy as a whole? Indeed, there are now more unemployed people in London than in Scotland and Wales put together. Despite very strong employment growth, there is still a mismatch in the labour market, so many London unemployed are locked out.

In view of the report of the analytical study of London that the Government are due to consider in the near future, will my hon. Friend assure me that his Department is putting considerable effort into finding ways to ensure that the London unemployed are able to fill London jobs, and that we tackle the two big cost barriers of housing and child care, which are locking them out of such jobs?

Mr. Pond: I can give my hon. Friend that assurance. She has worked hard to ensure that she can help people in her constituency as well as in London as a whole to find the rewarding and quality employment that all of us on the Government Benches want. We do not underestimate the challenges that we face in getting people in London and throughout the country into work, but through measures such as the new deal, work-search pilots, in-work credit, the lone parent job grants—they will come into effect in October—our changes in housing benefit administration to make sure that we get people smoothly off benefit and into work, and the national child care strategy, we are meeting those challenges.

Mr. Peter Luff (Mid-Worcestershire) (Con): In a spirit of constructive opposition, may I say to the Minister that one of his Department's policies that I welcome is the creation of Jobcentre Plus facilities? One of those was promised in Droitwich Spa in my constituency, but is he aware that as a result of a decision by the Department of Health to withdraw funding for the proposed health centre, which was to be part of a one-stop service incorporating such facilities plus police and local council services, the Jobcentre Plus facilities are threatened? I urge him to make representations to his colleagues in the Department of Health in order to save a very important facility for my constituents.

Mr. Pond: I thank the hon. Gentleman for his constructive approach and his welcome for Jobcentre Plus, which, by bringing together the Employment Service and the benefits service, is providing, especially through the role of personal advisers, a tailored service to help ensure that people know not only about job opportunities and training but about the availability of child care and other support that they might need to get into work. That is contributing greatly to continuing the drive to moving people into employment. I shall certainly be happy to discuss further with him the role of the Department of Health, to get further details, and if appropriate to discuss it with colleagues in the Department of Health.

Pension Credit

18. Linda Gilroy (Plymouth, Sutton) (Lab/Co-op): How many people in Plymouth, Sutton are in receipt of pension credit. [160854]

The Minister for Pensions (Malcolm Wicks): I know from my visit to my hon. Friend's constituency that she is an energetic champion of elderly people in Plymouth. At the end of February, 4,245 pensioner households in Plymouth, Sutton, comprising 4,875 individuals, were in receipt of pension credit, with an average award of just over £41. Our take-up campaign is continuing at a local and national level. The Plymouth local service, which will be at the guildhall on 25 March, is playing a major role in that drive.

Linda Gilroy: I thank my hon. Friend for that reply. For years, my constituents have been saying to me that they have saved for their retirement to no effect. It is important that the work and pension service, which is doing such a good job, as he says, should provide such help. Will he encourage it to work in partnership with other agencies, particularly Plymouth city council, which has just launched a "Tell Granny" campaign on council tax benefit take-up? Many more who receive pension credit will now qualify for council tax benefit.

Malcolm Wicks: I thank the city council for its work. The senior citizens forum in Plymouth is also playing a major role by directly contacting its 9,000-strong customer base. That shows the importance of working with partners such as Age Concern and other organisations to drum home the message that pension credit is a success. I should add that, as part of the drive against sexism, we ought to tell Grandad as well.

Orders of the Day

CONSOLIDATED FUND (NO. 2) BILL

Order for Second Reading read.

Question, That the Bill be now read a Second time, put forthwith, pursuant to Standing Order No. 56 (Consolidated Fund Bills), and agreed to.

Bill accordingly read a Second time.

Question, That the Bill be now read the Third time, put forthwith, and agreed to.

Bill accordingly read the Third time, and passed.

Fire and Rescue Services Bill

As amended in Standing Committee, considered.

New Clause 1

FIRE AND RESCUE NATIONAL FRAMEWORK—SCRUTINY

'(1) The Framework referred to in section 21 as first prepared shall not have effect until an order providing that it shall have effect for the purposes of section 21 has been made by the Secretary of State.

(2) Any revisions to the Framework which the Secretary of State wishes to make shall not have effect until an order providing that they shall have effect as amendments to the Framework has been made by the Secretary of State.'.—[Mr. Hammond.]

Brought up, and read the First time.

3.31 pm

Mr. Philip Hammond (Runnymede and Weybridge) (Con): I beg to move, That the clause be read a Second time.

Mr. Speaker: With this it will be convenient to discuss the following: new clause 3—Intervention Code—

'(1) The Secretary of State shall publish a Code specifying the circumstances and the manner in which:

(a) he may make an order under section 22; or

(b) he may issue a direction under any provision of this Act.

(2) The Code shall include, in particular, details of:

(a) the persons or classes of person the Secretary of State will consult before taking the action referred to in subsection (1);

(b) any other codes of conduct or agreements with any other persons or bodies to which the Secretary of State will have regard when contemplating any action referred to in subsection (1).

(3) Before publishing the Code referred to in subsection (1) the Secretary of State shall consult—

(a) all fire and rescue authorities or persons confirmed by them as representing them; and

(b) all persons or bodies recognised by any fire and rescue authority as representing any group of its employees; and

(c) any other persons he considers appropriate.'.

New clause 11—Setting of fire, death and arson targets and reporting on performance—

'(1) The Secretary of State shall for each Fire and Rescue Authority set a target for—

(a) the reduction in the number of accidental fire deaths in the home; and

(b) the reduction in the number of deliberate fires.

(2) The targets referred to in subsection (1) shall be published annually by the Secretary of State for a period of five years forward.

(3) The Secretary of State shall place before parliament at least once in every session a report specifying—

(a) the targets under subsection (1)(a) and (1)(b);

(b) any changes to those targets since the previous report and the reasons for those changes;

(c) measures taken or being taken to achieve the targets set out in subsection (1)(a) and (1)(b); and

(d) the Secretary of State's assessment of progress towards achieving those targets.'.

Amendment No. 20, in clause 21, page 10, line 8, after 'functions', insert

'the decision on which cannot be reasonably devolved to a fire and rescue authority.'.

Amendment No. 17, in page 10 line 9, leave out subsection (b) and insert—

'(b) must set out minimum standards of response to specified categories of incidents from fire and rescue authorities in connection with the discharge of their functions under sections 7, 8, 9.'.

Amendment No. 1, in page 10, line 30, leave out subsection (6).

Mr. Hammond: New clause 1 deals with issues surrounding the fire and rescue national framework—a detailed document, which sets out what amounts to a blueprint for the organisation, operation and management of fire and rescue services across the country. Let me give hon. Members a flavour of the document. It states:

"By 1 April 2004 Fire and Rescue Authorities must establish Regional Management Boards with . . . delegated powers that are appropriate to" their

"aims and objectives; plans for meeting the requirements in each of the six key areas listed at paragraph 2.9 of this document; and sufficient evidence to demonstrate the capacity—both resources and expertise—to deliver those plans."

In turn, regional management boards must

"introduce regional personnel and human resource functions . . . develop a regional approach to training . . . establish regional control rooms . . . and introduce regional procurement" strategies. Later, the document states that "Fire and Rescue Authorities, through the Regional Management Boards, must: ensure the phased transition from existing control rooms" and ensure compliance

"with national protocols on staff roles and training"—

whatever they are. In short, the framework document tells fire and rescue authorities how to organise the discharge of the functions conferred on them by the Bill. It sets out what they are and are not allowed to do, when and how they are required to devolve their functions upward to higher bodies, and the guidance that they should accept from Secretaries of State. The document even lays down detailed human resources policies and strips several functions from the democratically accountable authorities, transferring them up to the regional management board.

For the purposes of this debate, it is not necessary to argue whether having some sort of framework to deal with such matters is right or wrong. The concern that new clause 1 is designed to address is the democratic deficit—the lack of scrutiny of the framework document, which in many ways is meatier than the Bill itself. The framework is given statutory status by virtue of clause 21, and clauses 22 and 23 create a regime whereby the Secretary of State can intervene and penalise authorities if they do not comply with its requirements. The framework is extraordinarily centralising, and it will come into force without having undergone any proper parliamentary scrutiny. The Secretary of State determines what is in the framework, he issues the framework—after consultation, of course—and he can amend it at any time that he feels it is appropriate to do so.

Without making any comment at this stage about the precise content of the framework, I should explain that the purpose of new clause 1 is to subject the framework to parliamentary approval. Under the Bill as drafted, the Secretary of State has only to lay the finished document before Parliament, whereas new clause 1(1) provides that the initial framework shall have effect only once the Secretary of State has made an order by statutory instrument, giving Parliament an opportunity—albeit an inadequate one—to exercise some measure of scrutiny over what, as I have already suggested, will be by far the most important part of the collection of documents that will determine the way that our fire and rescue services operate in future: a document that will be at least of equal standing to the Bill itself.

Subsection (2) provides for similar arrangements in the case of any amendments to the framework that the Secretary of State may wish to make. Amendment No. 1 is a consequential provision that would remove from clause 21 the current provision for laying the framework before Parliament.

I hope that the Minister will be able to accede to our request for a simple measure of parliamentary scrutiny of what will be an extremely important document. If, as he repeatedly assured us in Committee, the framework will not amount to a micro-management plan for every nominally independent fire and rescue authority, he has nothing to fear from allowing parliamentarians—who represent the populations of communities throughout the country—an opportunity to consider the framework in its final form after he has completed his consultation, and to approve it so that it is incorporated in statute via the provisions of clause 21.

New clause 3 addresses a slightly different issue. It is designed to qualify the Secretary of State's power to intervene in the operation of a fire and rescue authority under the powers granted to him in clause 22. Under that clause, the Secretary of State may direct a fire and rescue authority precisely how to act or not to act if he believes that it is failing or likely to fail—not failing or likely fail to discharge its statutory functions but failing or likely to fail to comply with the national fire and rescue framework.

These are intervention powers that are over and above the sanctions under the best-value regime enshrined in the Local Government Act 1999, which also apply to fire and rescue authorities by virtue of clause 23. As drafted, these are wide-ranging powers of intervention. In our view, the ability to intervene gives the Secretary of State far too much power vis-à-vis what are supposed to be local community-based services that are delivering a service that is accountable to the local community.

New clause 3 simply requires the Secretary of State to provide some codification of the circumstances and the manner in which he will make orders under clause 22, and the circumstances and the manner in which he will issue directions under any of the many provisions allowing him to do so in a Bill that places huge powers in his hands.

Subsection (2) requires the Secretary of State to specify who he will consult. It does not require him to provide an exhaustive list of individuals or organisations. In Committee, the Minister made clear his objection to the listing approach. The subsection requires the Secretary of State instead to define the classes of persons, and critically to specify any other codes or agreements to which he will have regard before intervening.

It is no secret—I am sure the Minister will readily have divined the intention—that I have in mind the Local Government Association's code on intervention. It is a code that was agreed between the LGA and the Office of the Deputy Prime Minister, defining how the Secretary of State will use his intervention powers after a comprehensive performance assessment where an authority is deemed to be failing. The code includes extensive provisions on support for failing organisations, notice to be given and opportunities for authorities to rectify their deficiencies. Generally, it governs the Secretary of State's approach and ensures that intervention follows a clear scheme that everybody understands and is not arbitrary in any way. I should be grateful for assurance that the regime, which will apply to interventions under clause 23, which deals with best value, will also apply to interventions under clause 22. A loophole will otherwise be created, as the Secretary of State will invariably have the opportunity to intervene under either clause, and it is not appropriate that one intervention route is bound by the provisions of the LGA code and the other is not.

Finally, new clause 3(3) specifies the authorities and recognised organisations representing employees who must be consulted on the code before it is issued by the Secretary of State.

The new clause proposes a modest limitation on a wide power of intervention, and seeks to ensure that it is used as expected by fire and rescue authorities, is not arbitrary and does not become an alternative or loophole for avoiding established intervention procedures. If the Minister can confirm that the LGA code will be applied to any intervention under the provisions of the Bill, we will not seek to press new clause 3 further—[Interruption.] He is saying from a sedentary position that he has already done so, but that had not penetrated my consciousness. He will be glad of an opportunity to put that on record on the Floor of the House so that all local government bodies are aware of it.

New clause 11 requires that, as part of the framework arrangements, the Secretary of State set out annually, on a five-year forward basis, targets for a reduction in the number of accidental fire deaths in the home and of incidents of arson. It requires him to report to Parliament annually on progress in achieving those targets, which is not a terribly onerous burden. After all, the Government have said that reducing accidental fire deaths is the raison d'être of modernisation, so surely they will not object to putting that objective at the centre of the framework structure with clear targets that are updated regularly, thus enabling them to measure the progress of the reforms. The problem is that the Government have reduced the targets. Until last summer the target for the reduction of accidental fire deaths in the home was a cut in the average for 1994 to 1999 of 20 per cent. by March 2004. Gosh, March 2004 is now! The reduction should have been achieved already, but last summer, the Government put the date for the achievement of that important target back by six years, to March 2010. While they have been telling us that modernisation will save lives, and while fire authorities, required to reconfigure their deployments under integrated risk management plans, have closed fire stations, changed manning and crewing arrangements or, as in the case of my own constituency, removed fire appliances from fire stations, and have been busy with their integrated risk management plans, the Government have demonstrated a lack of confidence in the saving lives agenda by reducing the targets for accidental fire deaths in the home.

3.45 pm

I should like to quote from the report of the Select Committee on the Office of the Deputy Prime Minister published in January. With regard to downgrading, it states:

"we are disappointed that the Government has relaxed its target to cut down the number of deliberate fires and extended the time available to meet the targets on accidental fire-related deaths. We are concerned that Government did not consult sufficiently with relevant parties before relaxing targets."

It is hardly surprising that the public are increasingly sceptical about the integrated risk management plan cuts that are beginning to filter through locally—they are certainly beginning to do so in my area—when the Government are simultaneously downgrading the very target whose fulfilment is the justification for much of the modernisation programme. The foreword to the framework document, which is signed by the Minister for Local and Regional Government, talks of "a better service that saves more lives".

Whether the service saves more lives depends on the base line, however, and the Government have simply moved the goalposts—[Interruption.] The Government have moved the goalposts over the past 12 months by downgrading the target for reducing accidental fire deaths in the home.

The Minister for Local and Regional Government (Mr. Nick Raynsford): I thank the hon. Gentleman for giving way, but he has misled the House in suggesting that a change in the actual targets—

Mr. Speaker: Order. The Minister should perhaps rephrase his remarks. I do not think that the hon. Member for Runnymede and Weybridge (Mr. Hammond) would mislead the House.

Mr. Raynsford: I am grateful, Mr. Speaker. I wanted to point out to the hon. Gentleman that we are committed to reducing fire deaths. The fact that there may be a change in the target does not in any way change the commitment to a reduction in the number of deaths, and neither does it indicate that there will be no change or reduction. A change has been made in the light of circumstances which, as he knows only too well, could not have been foreseen when the target was set. That is the result of the collapse in the scrap metal price, which we debated at length. He knows perfectly well that that is the case. Will he accept that, if a target becomes ineffective because of outside circumstances, sticking to it rather than realistically trying to ensure an appropriate response in the changed circumstances is folly? I hope that he will accept that we are doing the most sensible thing.

Mr. Hammond: The Minister referred to the reduced target for deliberate fires or arson, but he has ignored the reduced target for accidental fire deaths in the home. If he would like to explain to the House what unforeseen circumstances have made that target impossible to achieve, I would be very happy to give way to him again. The only suggestion that I have heard from him is that an increasingly elderly population has made it difficult to achieve the targets. I hardly think that that circumstance was impossible to foresee at the time when the targets were set.

I will accept what he says about the arson targets and scrap metal, although I shall have something else to say about them in a moment, but in relation to accidental fire deaths in the home, the Government have reduced the target. [Interruption.] In my book, it is a reduction in the target; other hon. Members will draw their own conclusions. The target of achieving a 20 per cent. reduction from a given base line by March 2004 has been pushed out to a target of achieving the same reduction from the same base line by March 2010. To my very simple mind, that is a reduction in the target—

Mr. Raynsford: It is an extension.

Mr. Hammond: I shall leave other hon. Members and members of the public to reach their own conclusions.

On the reduction in arson targets, as the Minister rightly says, the number of vehicles being subjected to deliberately set fires has increased dramatically, partly as a result of a collapse of the scrap metal market and the cost now involved in disposing of vehicles. What are the Government proposing to do about that, apart from downgrading the targets? They are proposing a methodology for the implementation of the EU end-of-life vehicle directive that will by general consent make the problem worse by creating an additional disincentive to the owners of old vehicles to take them to authorised dismantlers.

The Minister of State clearly disagrees, but I had lengthy debates on this in a previous incarnation with a then Industry Minister, and I would be fascinated to hear how the current proposals for implementing the directive will not lead to an increase in the number of abandoned vehicles deliberately set on fire.

Mr. Raynsford: Perhaps the hon. Gentleman will explain how free disposal of end-of-life vehicles from 2007 will not have the effect that he wishes. We think it will.

Mr. Hammond: The right hon. Gentleman misrepresents what the Government are proposing. There will be a gap during which people with existing vehicles will be required to take them to an authorised dismantler, who at current scrap metal prices is likely to charge a fee.

The Government's performance on targets has been rather shabby. The dropping of the fire deaths target undermines the high moral stance that Ministers have sought to attach to the modernisation programme, and reinforces an already sceptical public in the suspicion that modernisation is a cover for some old-fashioned cuts. Frankly, that suggests to us that the setting, monitoring and performance in achievement of the targets must be watched closely. That is why new clause 11 would force the Government regularly to publish, update and explain any changes to the targets, and to give Parliament an assessment of progress in achieving them. That would allow us to measure the real impact of modernisation on these important public safety objectives.

Amendment No. 20 would limit the guidance that the Secretary of State can give in the framework—guidance allowing the Secretary of State to intervene under clause 22 if there is a failure to act in accordance with it—to areas in which decisions could not reasonably be left to fire and rescue authorities. We concur with the sentiments behind that amendment. We see a real danger that the Government's instinct to try to micro-manage from the centre will find expression through the national framework. That is one of our two principal concerns about the shape of the Bill as it stands.

Through amendment No. 17, the hon. Member for Hayes and Harlington (John McDonnell) seeks to include a requirement for a specified minimum standard of response to specified categories of incident. I will be interested to hear what he intends, because it seems to us that the amendment would undermine the local discretion that the integrated risk management plan process is intended to introduce for local authorities. I will also be interested to hear what the Minister has to say on that, on the new clauses, and in particular on the Government's reduced targets.

John McDonnell (Hayes and Harlington) (Lab): I want to speak about amendment No. 17, which I tabled specifically to allow the Minister to elaborate on some of the questions that have just been posed and thus overcome some of the arguments that have been advanced in previous debates to the effect that the exercise is simply about cuts to service. It is important to clarify exactly how the new system of integrated risk management proposals will be implemented.

We should celebrate the work that has already been done. In March, we celebrated another 5 per cent. reduction in fatalities in the past year. We should congratulate the service on that. I tabled the amendment because of the dilemma that runs not only through our debates but through the Select Committee report—a dilemma in relation to the need to ensure some consistency in standards throughout the country. The amendment gives the Minister an opportunity to negate the contention that the new system may introduce flexibility to the extent of creating a postcode lottery in local fire services' response to specific incidents.

In moving away from the traditional national minimum standards system, we need clarity about local discretion. Of course, everyone—including the fire authorities and the Fire Brigades Union—has argued that we need to tailor the modern service response to specific needs. However, there are anxieties. We need to put on record again the fact that we are not considering an overall reduction in investment in the service or a cuts exercise for any individual fire authority. We are considering a long-term, consistent pattern of investment that will improve service provision and the resources on which individual firefighters and authorities can draw.

Mr. Hammond: Does the hon. Gentleman recall that, during the industrial dispute in 2002 and early 2003, the Prime Minister and the Deputy Prime Minister both said that the firefighters' pay settlement over and above inflation had to be self-financing out of the savings from modernisation? Does that not suggest that it will be difficult to achieve the objective that he has outlined?

John McDonnell: I do recall that, but I also remember the subsequent debate in which the Government identified a sum of money for transitional investment in the fire service to cover the interim period when the savings could be identified. I am confident that, if the new system is implemented properly, we can overcome the allegations that it is a cuts exercise. I seek clear reassurance, on the record, from the Minister that we are considering increasing not reducing investment.

How far will the integrated risk management plans go to establish a consistent approach throughout the country? If we are moving from minimum standards, how can we achieve consistency of approach? I would welcome the Minister's elaborating on that today so that the Government's intentions can be put on record. I would welcome in particular an outline of what happens if inconsistencies break out in individual fire authorities. What powers of intervention would the Minister have if he believed that a specific fire authority's inconsistent approach would increase risk?

I am anxious about some of the statements that have been made about local approaches, especially responses to automatic fire alarms. How will individual fire authorities identify the level of risk and therefore the appropriate response? Some fire authorities have made statements that have not helped the argument for the need for a flexible approach. For example, the firemaster, as he is called, for Lothian and the borders said:

> "Where we get a call from an automatic detector which isn't confirmed by someone as being a fire, we intend to send out one fire engine instead of the two to four we send at the moment."

There has been some suggestion that authorities will invite the general public to investigate whether a fire is associated with an automatic fire alarm. Clearly, that is unacceptable. We need clearer national guidance to ensure that such an inconsistent approach does not break out. It is estimated that there are 1,500 calls through automatic fire alarms when, although it is not confirmed, there is a fire. Clearer guidance on minimum standards would help.

How will the integrated risk management ensure consistency? How will the Minister's national guidance and national framework ensure that we do not take a step backwards leading to increased risk or a need for more investment in local provision? What powers of intervention will he have if an inconsistent approach is shown to be putting lives at risk and reducing resources?

I should like to hear from the Minister yet again that this is not a cutting exercise, and that it involves investment and flexibility. I should also like to hear about any consultation on initiatives to measure the need for response. Will it be possible for some to be piloted, so that fire authorities can learn from others what response is most appropriate, what lessons can be learned from a change from existing minimum standards to a more flexible approach, and how mistakes can be identified and rectified. I want to hear the Minister's comments on the overall approach, so that we can reassure individual firefighters in our communities that the Bill will result in a general improvement rather than a reduction in services.

Richard Younger-Ross (Teignbridge) (LD): Two themes ran through the Committee stage—lack of scrutiny and centralisation of power. Our amendments and those of the Conservatives tried to deal with both. I compliment the hon. Member for Runnymede and Weybridge (Mr. Hammond), who clearly worked hard on the amendments tabled in Committee and on those we shall discuss today. We support in principle his new clauses in this group, and some that we shall deal with later—although, as he would probably expect, I shall ask him a couple of questions about one of them.

A national framework always has potential for good and potential for bad, or for unintended consequences. The same applies to powers taken by the Secretary of State, and we want to ensure that these powers are used only to improve fire services and to increase local accountability and democracy. In Committee, the Minister would smile angelically and tell us that, of course, he had no intention of misusing the powers; they were there "just in case". If that is true, I do not think he should have too much difficulty in accepting some of the Conservative amendments, or accepting the principles enshrined in our amendments to clause 20.

New clause 1 confers a level of scrutiny that, in our view, is missing from the Bill. It demands a statutory instrument enabling consideration of various clauses and, in particular, amendments to the framework. I disagreed slightly with the hon. Member for Runnymede and Weybridge when he said that a statutory instrument was the weakest of options, although I know that they are not the best way of testing the Government. I do not know whether he was implying that all these matters should be dealt with on the Floor of the House; certainly, debating all the regulations here would take up rather a lot of time. With that proviso, however, I am happy to support what he said about new clause 1.

In a sense, new clause 3 tackles the same issue that we are tackling through amendment No. 20: constraining the Secretary of State's powers by establishing codes. My only concern, which the hon. Member for Runnymede and Weybridge probably shares, is that although we might be able to scrutinise those codes, the Minister will ultimately be able to set them as he wishes. An element of trust is involved, and I would like to go a little further, so I was pleased to hear that the hon. Gentleman supports our amendment.

I turn to new clause 11. Targets are like shifting sands: they are there one minute, and then they are not. The Minister seemed to protest a little too much about the extension of a target date. If one expects a target to end on a set date, it ought to be possible to review it to see whether a tougher one can be fixed, or whether one has gone as far as possible. Extending the target date by several years clearly stops the review process, thereby reducing one's ability to set a lower target.

Mr. Hammond: The original target defined a maximum number of fire deaths in the coming year—beginning in March 2004—that would meet the target. But because of the change, a higher number of fire deaths will still meet the target, as that figure does not have to be achieved until 2010. Is that not the problem?

Richard Younger-Ross: The hon. Gentleman makes an extremely valid point, and I need not comment further.

The targets set by the hon. Member for Runnymede and Weybridge are somewhat broad, and we should remember that targets do get adjusted. I have been informed that the target for death by fire has been tweaked slightly to remove death resulting from arson; perhaps the Minister can confirm whether that is so. The removal of arson attacks would automatically lead to a reduction in fire deaths, because the target would have been shifted slightly. Such information will doubtless be winging its way to the Minister very shortly.

Mr. Hammond: Is not the point the use of the word "accidental"? We are talking about a target for accidental fire deaths in the home, so it does not include deaths by deliberately set fires. However, to be fair it never has.

Richard Younger-Ross: My understanding was different, but I am happy to be corrected. Targets have been adjusted slightly in other cases. My concern is that we could become too wrapped up in targets, although having a certain number is a good thing. I hope that the hon. Gentleman will explain why he chose these targets in preference to other, slightly more prescriptive ones.

Amendment No. 20 is in my name and that of my hon. Friend the Member for Southport (Dr. Pugh). In our view, decisions should be taken at a local level where that can reasonably be done. We must have trust in fire and rescue authorities that have been democratically elected; otherwise, we will undermine them, and the fact of their election will become pointless. As a result, they will become managers rather than decision makers. We welcome the national framework in principle, but certain decisions must be taken locally. The Minister could achieve that in a number of ways, but I hope that he accepts the broad principle that the elected members of fire and rescue authorities should have decision-making powers, rather than simply managerial ones, and that he will ensure that that happens.

Mr. David Drew (Stroud) (Lab/Co-op): I shall be brief because I took part in the Committee stage, which gave us plenty of opportunities to discuss how integrated risk management plans would function. I have just a couple of points, which relate to how Gloucestershire fire authority envisages its way forward and, more particularly, how local firefighters, through the Fire Brigades Union, are seeking to move the debate forward.

One issue is how IRMPs will fit with other aspects of evolving county and wider arrangements. In particular, we have the community safety plan in Gloucestershire, which is quite an extensive attempt by the county council to draw together different services working in the emergency field. I should be interested to know how my right hon. Friend the Minister envisages the plans working, at least in the short term. The view seems to be that where there have been pathfinder projects, services are further forward than in some other areas, such as Gloucestershire, where there has not been such an opportunity. I should be interested to hear what my right hon. Friend has to say on that. How do we move those brigades forward?

Mr. Hammond: The hon. Gentleman says that Gloucestershire has not had the opportunity of pathfinder projects, but it has pioneered the use of tri-service control facilities. How does he understand their fitting into the Government's stated agenda of reducing the number of control rooms throughout England to only nine?

Mr. Drew: We rehearsed that point in Committee, if somewhat vaguely, and I am sure that we shall come to it in the next-but-one group of amendments. We in the county of Gloucestershire have some misgivings because a fine service has evolved there, and it is good to see the three emergency services working together. It is fair to say that we are talking to our right hon. and hon. Friends on the Front Bench about the opportunities for what that tri-service may become, but we will no doubt refer to that under the appropriate group of amendments.

To return to the immediate group, I should be interested to hear from the Minister how areas where there have not been the same opportunities for trialling and testing the new procedures can catch up, and how those procedures will fit with other proposals that have emerged through county councils and other parts of the emergency services. How will those sit together with the new set of IRMPs? Much of that is outwith the Bill's scope, because practical, detailed considerations are involved. However, the Government need to show good faith and that there is not a cuts package behind the proposals, and they need to demonstrate how they will modernise services, using the best forms of consultation to ensure that all elements are involved.

Mr. Adrian Flook (Taunton) (Con): I take issue with the hon. Member for Stroud (Mr. Drew), who said that he had much time in Committee to make contributions on this matter. When we came to discuss clause 21, my hon. Friend the Member for Runnymede and Weybridge (Mr. Hammond) said:

"we need to make rapid progress to consider the next four clauses before the knife falls at 6 o'clock".—[Official Report, Standing Committee G, 24 February 2004; c. 231.]

As that was at 5 o'clock, we did not have quite the necessary time to discuss the issues involved, particularly those relating to new clauses 1 and 3. The House may appreciate the brevity of the remarks made by the hon. Member for Stroud, but they could have been longer, because the Committee felt at that point that we were not scrutinising the matter closely enough.

Mr. Raynsford: Nonsense.

Mr. Flook: The Minister may call that nonsense, but I have here the comment made in Committee on 24 February, clear as the light of day.

Mr. Raynsford: Does the hon. Gentleman recall the comments of his Front-Bench colleague at the end of the Committee about the adequacy of time for full consideration of the Bill?

4.15 pm

Mr. Flook: I might well be able to, if I had those comments in front of me. None the less, the point about scrutiny is as plain as the light of day at column 231.

Three fears are particularly relevant to new clause 1. The first is that the national framework is too rigid and will undermine localness. Secondly, there is a fear of gold-plating. The hon. Member for Teignbridge (Richard Younger-Ross) said that the Minister had described this as a just-in-case set-up. I can see exactly what will happen in the Office of the Deputy Prime Minister. It will take on board more and more responsibilities, and the document will become a gold-plated version that undermines localness. Thirdly, the entire emphasis of the national framework involves the ultimate aim of cutting costs. The Government have not been particularly open about that in the framework document, and it will be interesting to know how many respondents to the consultation process, which I believe has now finished, referred to the Government's aim of cutting costs.

The Government have said that they see the framework document as a strategic one. The Minister hides behind the fact that the Bain report called for it. I am sure that it did—it called for a lot—but I am not sure that the Government have responded to everything in that report with provisions in the Bill. The framework sets out in minute detail how fire authorities must act in a huge number of respects, including human resources, training, control rooms and procurement. It goes so far as to talk about the swapping of personnel between various authorities and even between different branches of the emergency services. It talks at some length about effectively discharging those responsibilities at regional level. In fact, the word "regional" occurs throughout the document. The Government are looking closely at making regional management boards omnipotent over a large number of fire authorities. That might easily undermine the basis for the working of, for example, Somerset fire authority. That might be the Government's aim.

There is definitely an irony here. The Minister has been keen at every twist and turn, both in the framework document and in Committee, to talk about local accountability, and I am sure that he is going to wax lyrical about it now. The irony is that Somerset county council will no doubt be able to see a nudge and a wink when they are offered. When human resources, training, control rooms and procurement are subsumed into a regional body, a cash-strapped Somerset county council will no doubt welcome the chance of a capital receipt and the chance to release the beautiful Hestercombe house on to the open market. The control room may well end up somewhere else in the south-west, whereas, if these changes were to happen in the fullness of time, it might move to the centre of Taunton, which would make far more sense for any tie-up with, say, Devon, Dorset or Cornwall.

The basis for all those changes is this large framework document, which is 49 pages long; the Bill is only 26 pages. The framework needs to be subject to much more regular scrutiny, and that is why new clause 1 is so important. I hope that Conservative Members will call for a Division on it. At the very least, we need scrutiny, and there are effective ways of carrying that out without clogging up the machinery of government. Parliamentary scrutiny is necessary. It is impossible to deliver what we need in local terms from the framework as it has been drafted.

Mr. Raynsford: New clause 1 seeks to introduce a requirement for a statutory instrument before the national framework can take effect. This requirement, unlike that in the amendment tabled by the hon. Member for Runnymede and Weybridge (Mr. Hammond) in Committee, would not alter the status of the framework as guidance. I suspect that the change in the amendment reflects the point that we made in Committee that wording the framework as a statutory instrument would probably not help comprehension and implementation by those engaged in the fire service.

Our intention with the national framework is to provide a comprehensive document that will act as a "manual" for fire and rescue authorities. That is reflected by its status as guidance to which authorities must "have regard". By its nature, a national framework should provide strategic leadership—hence the inclusion of subsection (2)(a) in clause 21, stating that the fire and rescue national framework "must set out clear service priorities and objectives for fire and rescue authorities".

That provision is very much in accordance with the thinking not only of the Bain report, but of the Select Committee, whose first recommendation is worth repeating. Its report was very good, and I am very happy to cite its first recommendation, which says:

"The Committee broadly welcomes the reforms outlined in the White Paper and is hopeful that the Fire and Rescue Services Bill will bring about real reform in the Service. The Service needs strong political leadership to ensure successful implementation and management of change during a potentially very turbulent period. Government must lead by example, and must provide support at local level to ensure implementation of reform, even in the face of confrontation."

That is exactly what we are doing and the framework has been produced within that remit.

Providing strategic direction is not the only purpose of the fire and rescue framework. To be effective as a manual, the framework should include guidance on all aspects of Government fire and rescue policy and reference to good practice as it develops. There is an enormous amount of good practice in the fire and rescue service; the problem is often that it is not universal. We believe that the good practice of individual fire authorities, if adopted by others, could make a real difference. Spreading good practice is fundamental.

The framework should also help to deal with the capacity support measures that the Government will provide to fire and rescue authorities, making it clear what help is available—an important matter mentioned by my hon. Friend the Member for Stroud (Mr. Drew), to which I shall return. It will also help to deal with the independent performance assessment measures that the Audit Commission is implementing. I shall also say more about that later.

The hon. Member for Runnymede and Weybridge accused us of producing a centralising document, but I have to say that it is not. We have repealed—or are in the process of repealing—a highly centralised statutory framework dating back to the Fire Services Act 1947, which prescribed in considerable detail exactly what was required in every part of the country. In its place, we are giving greater discretion and responsibility to fire and rescue authorities to develop their own integrated risk management plans, reflecting local needs and priorities. However, as my hon. Friend the Member for Hayes and Harlington (John McDonnell) rightly explained, there must be an overarching national framework to ensure that there is both coherence and consistency and that standards are not allowed to fall below acceptable levels. That is precisely the purpose of the framework.

My hon. Friend was concerned about whether there might be a fall away from decent standards as a result of changing the 1947 Act framework, and I hope to reassure him on that point. We are absolutely committed to reducing deaths, to improving the effectiveness of the fire and rescue service and to ensuring more effective prevention of fire, which is the key to reducing the number of deaths. All our measures are designed to achieve that purpose.

There is no question of a cuts package: no cuts whatever are envisaged. We are continuing to provide real grant increases to fire and rescue authorities, and we are investing heavily in new equipment for the fire and rescue service—and we are committed to carrying on doing so. That is in marked contrast to Conservative Members, who choose to criticise us opportunistically but who, significantly, did not include the fire and rescue service among those that would be exempt from the shadow Chancellor's pledge for no further growth. When we hear Conservative Members criticise us, we should remember that the Conservative party is committed to cuts in the fire service that will jeopardise the ability of fire and rescue authorities to implement the modernisation programme that we are introducing. Of course, it would be a risk only if—heaven help us—the Conservatives were elected again. I repeat my reassurance to my hon. Friend.

We have been closely monitoring and supporting the development and implementation of IRMPs through the provision of guidance and risk assessment, with support teams working directly with fire and rescue authorities, and through our role as a consultee. The Bill re-enacts the existing statutory duty for a fire and rescue authority to plan and provide arrangements for fighting fires and protecting life and property from fires within its area. Authorities will be required to secure sufficient equipment and training to discharge their duty in normal circumstances and implement effective arrangements for receiving and responding to calls for help.

The published guidance on IRMPs makes it clear that fire and rescue authorities should set their own locally determined standards, which should be expressed in easily understood terms, to measure performance on intervention and prevention. The framework will be closely monitored and will allow us to see whether we are making the progress that we are committed to making, and, if we are not, it will allow intervention to tackle any failures.

Mr. Hugo Swire (East Devon) (Con): On prevention, will the Minister return to the points that we discussed earlier about the targets being moved? It is difficult for the layman to comprehend why the targets are being reduced. The target of achieving a 20 per cent. reduction in accidental fire deaths in homes by March 2004 has been pushed back to 2010, and the target of reducing deliberately started fires by 30 per cent. by 2009 has been cut to 10 per cent. Those reductions occur at a time when a country such as New Zealand has managed to halve such deaths in four years, so it must be possible to meet the targets. If the Bill is about prevention, why have the targets been moved?

Mr. Raynsford: If the hon. Gentleman had been following proceedings, he would know that we are discussing new clause 1 and that targets are covered by a different new clause, which I shall deal with in due course. I was responding to issues raised properly in the context of new clause 1 and intend to continue to do so.

I reassure my hon. Friend the Member for Hayes and Harlington that a working group set up by the practitioners forum is examining the issue of automatic fire alarms, which raises important considerations. We know that automated fire alarms produce a substantial number of malfunctions and that if appliances are called out to deal with a malfunctioning AFA when a real fire occurs, it could prejudice the response of the fire service to the other incident. It is therefore important to implement robust procedures to ensure that those incidents that cause genuine concern are responded to in the normal way, and that fire and rescue authority resources are not indiscriminately allocated where there is actually no risk. Finding the means to do that without creating greater risk is difficult, but it is a proper challenge that a number of fire authorities have already begun to address, and I hope that we can make considerable progress through the practitioners forum working group.

My hon. Friend the Member for Stroud raised a number of issues about how the community safety plan, which draws together different services, links with IRMPs. I reassure him that IRMPs allow fire and rescue authorities to provide extra resources for prevention work, which may be undertaken by them or in partnership with other bodies. There are many examples of good practice in partnership work, which may involve engaging with teachers and others who are in a position to assist with effective fire prevention activity in particular sections of the community. We want to see continuing work of that nature and will give further guidance through the support team that I have alluded to, which is in place to help authorities establish the new arrangements introduced by IRMPs.

The fire and rescue national framework will play a significant role in driving forward the modernisation agenda, which is required to ensure that we have an effective fire and rescue service that saves more lives, and it is imperative that there are no unnecessary obstacles to delivering that agenda. The requirement for a statutory instrument to be agreed by this House before the national framework or amendments to the national framework can take effect could mean unnecessary delay and uncertainty.

Before the Bill has received its Third Reading in this House, let alone consideration by another place or Royal Assent, we are already well advanced with the first draft of the national framework, which has been out for consultation, and we hope to publish the first definitive version this spring. Thereafter, we will update the framework and, in order to help authorities with their planning processes, we intend to publish the framework in time for the start of their budget setting and business planning rounds each year. Unnecessary delay and uncertainty before the framework takes effect would be entirely unhelpful.

Furthermore, any guidance that updated policy would be issued as a revision to the framework, so that authorities and the Audit Commission were clear about our expectations. For example, we will provide guidance to ensure that medical criteria for firefighter appointment and retention are compliant with the Disability Discrimination Act 1995. Under new clause 1, all such guidance would require a statutory instrument before having effect. The delay and uncertainty that would result from the requirement for a statutory instrument for each new piece of guidance would again be to the detriment of the smooth and efficient running of the service.

4.30 pm

We do not accept new clause 1, but we accept that Parliament has an important role in scrutinising decisions relating to fire and rescue policy. The Government will continue to be accountable to Parliament in the normal way. Clause 21(6) requires that we lay the plan, and any significant revisions to it, before Parliament and we have ensured in the legislation that, if the Secretary of State proposes to enforce a measure in the framework by exercising the intervention powers in clause 22, the order-making process will be subject to parliamentary scrutiny. There is already a good example of how that would work in the national plan for the police. The Police Reform Act 2002 requires the Secretary of State to prepare a national policing plan, but there is no requirement for a statutory instrument before the plan takes effect. The Secretary of State must lay the plan before Parliament in the same way that would be required for the framework.

I can reassure the hon. Member for Runnymede and Weybridge that we have included in the legislation a requirement to consult in preparing the framework, or significant revisions to it. We have consulted widely, and we will continue to do so on future revisions. Members of both Houses have had the opportunity to comment during that process. Amendment No. 1 is consequential to new clause 1 and seeks to remove the requirement to lay the framework before Parliament. However, it is absolutely appropriate that Parliament is kept informed of the contents of the framework.

Amendment No. 20 seeks to limit the priorities and objectives for fire and rescue authorities that the Secretary of State would be able to set out in the national framework to those that authorities could not "reasonably decide" for themselves. As I have already stressed, the Government have devolved much more responsibility to fire and rescue authorities. We have repealed section 19 of the 1947 Act, which required that any reduction in the number of fire appliances or firefighting posts, or the closure of any fire station, required the Secretary of State's consent.

We have also replaced the outdated national standards of fire cover with local integrated risk management planning, thereby allowing more local discretion for fire and rescue authorities to deploy their resources in line with their assessment of present local needs and risks. However, we must get the balance right. The independent review of the fire service said:

"successive Governments have not provided the leadership required".

It also said:

"it is for central government to set the Fire Service's strategic priorities and to provide a clear lead on policy development".

The national framework will play a crucial role in providing that leadership and driving reform and improvement in the service. That includes setting priorities and objectives where appropriate, but we will not use the national framework unnecessarily to interfere with local decisions. That would run counter to our overall programme of reform, not least to the principle of local risk management.

We see the national framework as a contract, embodying our partnership approach to reforming the service. It was first issued as a draft for consultation with plenty of time for people to comment before it became a statutory document. Clause 21(5) sets out a requirement for a full consultation process. However, the amendment would create unnecessary uncertainty about what can and cannot be "reasonably devolved" to a fire and rescue authority. That is obviously a subjective issue. The amendment would therefore inevitably lead to ambiguity and could in theory lead to expensive and time-consuming legal challenge. That is the last thing we need at a time when we are embarking on a major reform programme to deliver a better service that saves more lives.

On new clause 3, I have previously referred to the existing protocol covering the use of existing intervention powers across all local authority services that has already been agreed with local government stakeholders and published. The protocol was developed through the framework for partnership, signed in November 1997 by my right hon. Friend the Deputy Prime Minister on behalf of the Government and by the chairman of the Local Government Association on behalf of local authorities. It has worked well and directions have had to be issued to local authorities on only two occasions.

The protocol provides for a sufficient evidence base before any action is taken and for the form and extent of intervention to reflect the type and seriousness of failure and the need for effective improvement. It provides that, other than in cases of urgency, there should be a process of agreement with the authority on how it will address any service failure in the first instance. It provides for the use of intervention powers only if that process fails to deliver the required improvement. It also provides for consultation with the authority concerned on any proposed directions.

In exercising the powers that we seek under clause 22 and elsewhere, we are committed, as I have already made clear, to following the principles set out in the protocol, which already covers the existing powers to intervene in fire and rescue authorities contained in the Local Government Act 1999. I do not believe that it would be sensible to produce a separate protocol for the powers in the Bill; the hon. Member for Runnymede and Weybridge has implied as much and, in the light of my reassurances, I am sure that he will want to withdraw the proposed new clause.

Amendment No. 17, proposed by my hon. Friend the Member for Hayes and Harlington, would require the national framework to set out minimum standards of response to incidents for fire and rescue authorities. I remind him that the independent review of the fire service stated:

"there is a compelling case to move to a risk-based approach and to do so now . . . it should be for fire authorities to identify the risks and the best means of handling them".

Following the recommendations of the independent review, we acknowledged in our White Paper last summer that national standards of fire cover that set out the speed and weight of response to incidents are no longer appropriate and that they would be replaced by integrated risk management plans, produced by each fire and rescue authority. Each IRMP should set out the authority's own standards for both prevention and intervention purposes, based on its assessment of risk to life in the local community. All fire and rescue authorities in England and Wales have published their draft plans, are consulting their communities and work forces on their proposals and will formally adopt their IRMPs from 1 April 2004.

To require the inclusion of minimum standards of response in the framework would limit the flexibility that we intend to devolve to a local level to ensure that emergency cover and response is determined locally and provided on a risk to life, not a risk to property, basis. The inclusion of minimum standards could skew authorities' decisions on the allocation of resources.

Let me provide a few statistics from the old national fire cover standards. Between 1997 and 2001, there were 2,600 fatalities and 76,300 injuries as a result of fires in England and Wales. Throughout that period, there were recommended minimum attendance standards.

[Mr. Raynsford]

Specified attendance time to industrial and commercial—A and B risk locations—was between five and eight minutes, but a breakdown of the figures shows that 80 per cent. of fatalities occurred in C and D risk locations where attendance times were between eight and 20 minutes. That makes the point that if we base the whole approach on risk to life, it is important to move away from the old property-based standards, so that the approach reflects more effectively the risk to life.

I reassure my hon. Friend the Member for Hayes and Harlington that there is no scope for local fire authorities simply to abandon the principle of action designed to save lives, but if we stuck with the old arrangements, there would equally be no scope for local fire and rescue authorities to vary the standards in the light of local circumstances to ensure a quicker and more effective response where people's lives were at risk. I am thinking particularly of night-time fires in houses containing families in residential areas where, under the old standards, the response requirement would have been slower than that for empty commercial property in a city centre. Such an arrangement cannot be right. The focus must be on threat to life and I hope that the IRMPs will allow a more sensitive implementation of what we are all committed to: measures to safeguard lives.

New clause 11 would require the Secretary of State to set targets for each fire and rescue authority in relation to the reduction of accidental fire deaths in the home and of deliberate fires, and to report to Parliament on progress in each Session. I am intrigued that the Opposition have moved that provision, as during most of our debates, not only on this Bill but on the Local Government Act 2003, they constantly attacked the Government for what they described as the unnecessary proliferation of centrally set performance targets. However, when it suits them politically, they are only too happy to try to impose targets.

We remain absolutely committed to new national targets, which were announced in the fire White Paper, for the reduction of accidental fire deaths in the home and for the reduction of deliberate fires. As before, progress will be reported in the ODPM annual report, which is deposited in the Library. I should make it clear that there is no question of reducing the targets. We are committed to real reductions in the number of lives lost and the number of non-accidental fires. However, we recognise that since the targets were first set, changes in circumstance and a greater understanding of context have made it impossible for the original aspirational targets—that is what they were—to be achieved realistically. We need targets that can be delivered, rather than notional targets that would generate disappointment if they could not be met.

Mr. Swire: Will the Minister give way?

Mr. Raynsford: No. The hon. Gentleman asked me about this earlier. I noted his comments and I am now responding to them, so I hope that he will listen.

I completely reject any implication that the present targets are insufficiently challenging. If we were to take no action, we could expect an additional 200 accidental fire deaths over the period up to 2010. Instead, the target on accidental fire deaths commits us to saving more than 1,000 lives throughout that period. I am pleased to say that we are making good progress because accidental fire deaths in the home are at an all-time low of 292 for England and Wales. I wholly reject the completely incorrect assumption put forward by the hon. Member for Runnymede and Weybridge that, as a result of changes to the targets, there will be more deaths and more deliberate fires than would otherwise occur. That is not the case because the numbers are reducing. We are committed to reducing them and we are committed to saving lives, but we are also committed to realism, rather than to targets that are simply not achievable for a variety of reasons.

Mr. Hammond: The Minister cites the number of lives that his target will apparently save. Will he tell the House how many additional lives would already have been saved if the original date for achieving the target of March 2004 had been adhered to?

Mr. Raynsford: As I have just told the hon. Gentleman, the latest figures show that we have made significant progress yet again on reducing the number of lives lost. I am surprised that he does not welcome the fact that accidental fire deaths in the home resulted in only 292 losses of life in 2002–03—the lowest level on record. We are reducing the number of lives lost. If people set an unrealistic target, they could in theory claim to be capable of achieving more. However, the original target was not achievable. We realised that, so we set a realistic and extremely challenging target for reducing the number of fire deaths.

Mr. Swire: Will the Minister give way?

Mr. Raynsford: No, I have given way to the hon. Gentleman already and I need to make progress.

Mr. Swire rose—

Mr. Raynsford: I have given way to the hon. Gentleman and answered his question. I am sorry that he is not in a mood to listen.

We are absolutely committed to reducing deaths, injuries and unnecessary fires. That requires real commitment and continued investment, and it ill behoves Conservative Members to try to make cheap points when we know that their spending commitments would not protect the fire service. The service would thus be starved of funds and unable to achieve the commitments towards which we are working. We are hearing a lot of synthetic and unconvincing rhetoric from the Conservative party on the matter.

Clause 21(2)(a) will require the Secretary of State to set out priorities and objectives for fire and rescue authorities in the national framework. The national targets on accidental fire deaths and deliberate fires are already in the first paragraph of the draft framework. The performance of fire and rescue authorities will be assessed by the Audit Commission, and the performance expectations set out in the national framework, which includes an explicit reference to the national targets, will be a key yardstick for the Audit Commission when assessing performance. I therefore ask the hon. Member for Runnymede and Weybridge to withdraw the motion.

Mr. Hammond: May I first deal with the Minister's remarks on new clauses 3 and 11? Let us get the pleasantries out of the way. On new clause 3, I am grateful to him for confirming that the Local Government Association code will apply to section 23 interventions. I know that many people outside the Chamber who were not entirely sure about the situation will be grateful that he has put his clarification on record.

Any discussion of targets seems to evoke a strange response from this usually mild-mannered and reasonable Minister because he goes berserk whenever we draw attention to the targets that were set as part of the public service agreement several years ago. The targets were set by his Government, not by us, someone from outside or civil servants. I hope that he will not try to tell us that that was not the case. He now tells us that those targets were unachievable and unrealistic. I wonder what the Treasury thinks about being told that the targets, which were offered in exchange for Treasury funding in a previous spending review, are unachievable and unrealistic. The Minister does not have a leg to stand on. One moment he tells us that he has not relaxed the targets for accidental fire deaths, but a moment later he tells us that he has and is justified in doing so because unforeseen circumstances have intervened.

Mr. Raynsford: What targets for reducing fire deaths is the hon. Gentleman's party committed to and what discussions has he held with his shadow Treasury colleagues on the resources necessary to deliver them?

Mr. Hammond: We are in a situation in which the Government have set targets in the national framework that are lower than those agreed in a previous public service agreement. We are trying to ensure that the Government are held to account for future changes that they are minded to make to the targets set out in the national framework in the way that they made changes to the existing targets last summer.

Mr. Swire: Perhaps my hon. Friend can give me the answer that the Minister was clearly unwilling to do. We learned from the Minister that the original targets were aspirational. In that case, why was New Zealand able to halve the number of accidental fire deaths in its homes over four years? The Government's extension must be a de facto reduction in targets.

Mr. Hammond: My hon. Friend is right to draw attention to the New Zealand example. That country has been much quoted over the past 18 months in relation to fire, and for good reasons. Many people outside and inside the House might think that the Government, as a natural corollary of their modernisation programme, based as it is around redirecting resources to save lives, would not want to relax the targets for reducing accidental fire deaths, but to tighten them so that they are tougher and more demanding. The purpose of new clause 11 is not to change the targets, but to ensure proper scrutiny of them so that the Government cannot do what they did last summer and simply sneak in a reduced and relaxed target.

The hon. Member for Teignbridge (Richard Younger-Ross) asked why I selected those two targets. It was because they are the two targets that the Government set out in the fire and rescue draft national framework. Although reduced, they are the same targets qualitatively as the two targets included in the previous public service agreement.

The debate on new clause 11 has been useful. Members of the public and Members of the House will draw their own conclusions on what is or is not a reduced target. Members of the public and the media are used to looking carefully at the spin that the Government put on any numbers, figures or targets.

The Minister addressed several of the detailed points raised on new clause 1, but he did not address the principal concern. The national framework is above all a strategic framework for the delivery of fire services. It is right and proper that such a framework should be fully scrutinised by Parliament. It is simply not good enough that Parliament will be kept informed, as he put it, as the framework evolves and is eventually introduced and modified. Parliament needs scrutiny and control of the process. His protestation that a negative resolution would be too time-consuming and in some way too costly for such an important measure, which is key to the modernisation of our fire and rescue services, is unacceptable. The Government have not made a case for rejecting new clause 1.

Question put, That the clause be read a Second time:—

New Clause 2

RETAINED FIREFIGHTERS

'(1) The Secretary of State shall by order, within six months of the coming into effect of any part of this Act, establish a body to be known as the Advisory Panel on the Recruitment and Retention of Retained Firefighters.

(2) The body shall be made up of such people as the Secretary of State shall appoint to include—

(a) at least two persons appearing to the Secretary of State to be representatives of fire and rescue authorities or organisations representing fire and rescue authorities;

(b) at least two persons appearing to the Secretary of State to be representatives of retained firefighters or organisations representing retained firefighters;

(c) at least two persons appearing to the Secretary of State to be representatives of private sector employers or organisations representing private sector employers;

(d) at least two persons appearing to the Secretary of State to be representatives of public sector employers or organisations representing public sector employers.

(3) The body shall meet as the Secretary of State shall direct to advise the Secretary of State and fire and rescue authorities on all matters relating to the recruitment and retention of retained duty firefighters.'.—[Mr. Hammond.]

Brought up, and read the First time.

Mr. Hammond: I beg to move, That the clause be read a Second time.

The clause relates to retained firefighters, and I think that it is common ground on both sides of the House that they play a crucial part in the modernisation agenda. All too often the focus or the spotlight falls on the large metropolitan brigades, with their need occasionally to respond to major disasters and to think about the response to the new agenda of anti-terrorist preparedness. However, in many brigades throughout the country, retained firefighters are the backbone of the service.

In many ways the challenges of modernisation are greater for those brigades that depend largely on retained firefighters. By and large, they will not see the same savings from changed work practices as those brigades that employ mainly whole-time firefighters. Almost by definition, those brigades with retained firefighters do not already have available a pool of full-time employed personnel to deal with the service's new emphasis on fire prevention. They are faced with some particular challenges as we move forward with this agenda. On the whole, the brigades in question are the smaller ones, with lighter management structures, which in turn pose further difficulties in addressing the issues.

As I look round the Chamber, I am certain that every Member here would be happy to record the huge debt that is owed to retained firefighters for their sterling support of the community when they continued to provide cover during the brief but potentially dangerous fire strikes at the end of 2002 and the beginning of 2003. I regret to say that in some cases that was done in the face of intimidation and harassment from colleagues. By way of belated but well-deserved reward, those retained firefighters will be included in the new negotiating machinery, and the Minister made it clear in Committee that he intends that they should have proper representation, along with other groups of firefighters and employees of fire and rescue services.

In the new clause, I have sought to address the overarching problem of the recruitment and retention of sufficient retained firefighters to allow the modernisation agenda to proceed successfully. It is increasingly difficult to find the kind of people who traditionally have worked as retained firefighters. I do not want to digress too far into anecdote, but when I was a boy I remember being terribly excited about the fact that the greengrocer was a retained firefighter. Every now and then, to great excitement in the greengrocer's shop, he would tear off in his car to fight a fire. In traditional communities, the small self-employed shopkeeper or business man could undertake that vital community role and provide himself with a worthwhile additional income. As our lives have become more complicated and as pressure on the self-employed has increased—people generally have to spend more time on running a business now—it has become less easy to persuade such people that they can afford the time and potential disruption to their business that being a retained firefighter entails.

[Mr. Hammond]

According to figures produced by the Chartered Institute of Public Finance and Accountancy, the retained firefighting force across the country is about 3,000 firefighters or 20 per cent. short of its intended strength, which represents a considerable gap in its ability to deliver what is required of the current structure and set-up. The Minister may wish to comment on this, but my understanding is that as we proceed with things such as integrated personal development strategies both retained firefighters and full-time firefighters will participate in in-job training and personal development programmes, which are extremely worth while but which, almost by definition, require a greater number of personnel to provide cover while people are undertaking training and personal development activities. We are 20 per cent. short now, but once the integrated risk management plans have been put in place, the modernisation agenda has been implemented more fully and the new human resources arrangements are up and running, we will have an even greater need for retained firefighters.

The key to finding such people is recognising the role of employers. Some retained firefighters, of course, will be self-employed, but the great majority will be employees, and it is important that the House should acknowledge the need to focus on persuading employers of the benefit to the community and perhaps to themselves of releasing employees for retained duty. Various proposals were made in Committee. It was suggested, for example, that formal recognition should be bestowed on employers who release employees for retained duty and even that cash rewards or compensation should be made available to employers who sacrifice the efficiency of their business by allowing employees to play a role as retained firefighters.

New clause 2 would introduce a formal recognition of the importance of retained firefighters and of the problem of recruiting and retaining them by establishing an advisory panel to the Secretary of State. In Committee, the Under-Secretary, the hon. Member for Corby (Phil Hope), referred to a comprehensive review that he had established on 15 December 2003 looking at issues relating to retained firefighting and the need to recruit more retained firefighters. Why have I tabled the new clause, given that he told the Committee about that? I want to be clear that the Government recognise the need to involve employers from both the public and private sectors in the initiative.

In Committee, the Under-Secretary said that the review would include

"members from a variety of stakeholder groups, including the Local Government Association, CACFOA and the RFU".

When I intervened to ask him whether the employer community was also engaged in the process, he replied:

"The employers will be fully engaged in the process."

However, it turned out that we were speaking at cross purposes, as he clarified his remarks by saying:

"The LGA is in the review team."—[Official Report, Standing Committee G, 2 March 2004; c. 386–387.]

The Local Government Association is a representative of employers of retained firefighters, but I had intended to convey to him the need to engage the employers of potential retained firefighters—the businesses and public bodies that employ such people in their everyday jobs, which need to be persuaded of the community's need for them to be released for retained firefighting duties. As far as I understood it, he confirmed in the Committee that representatives of employer organisations other than the LGA were not engaged in the review process. I would like the CBI, the Federation of Small Businesses and various other bodies that represent private sector employers to be included. I would also like representatives of the big public sector employers to be engaged in the process. Of course, the public sector must lead by example. In many parts of the country, large proportions of the population are engaged in public sector employment; indeed, the proportion is as much as a third in some areas.

The point of tabling the new clause was to seek to formalise the advisory panel as an ongoing body that would advise the Secretary of State on matters relating to retained firefighters and also to formalise the membership of the panel so that it included representatives not only of the fire and rescue authorities and the retained firefighters, but of employers from both the public and private sectors. The problem should be put on the table—we are 3,000 retained firefighters short today, and the number may be 4,000 by the time that the IRMP process is completed—and we need to work together to ensure that additional retained firefighters are delivered in the places where they are needed.

In my fire authority, Surrey, there are proposals in the integrated risk management plan to change the manning of a fire station from whole time to retained service. Of course, that will be possible and the saving will be harnessed only if and when it is possible to recruit the additional retained firefighters. The provision of 24-hour retained cover at a single-appliance fire station will take a considerable number of retained firefighters. I have not done the maths, but I suspect that about 20 or 24 individuals are required to provide 24-hour retained cover in a single-appliance fire station, although the Under-Secretary will correct me if I am wrong.

I tabled the new clause to draw attention to the point and to get the Under-Secretary to focus on the role of employers and—I hope—to give some commitment about the engagement of employers in the process. I shall certainly not press the new clause to a Division if he can assure us that employers in the public and private sector will be properly engaged. Furthermore, I tabled the new clause because I know that some hon. Members—not least those from the Devon contingent, which featured strongly in Committee—will have a lot to say about retained firefighters. Devon is a fire authority that depends almost entirely on retained firefighters.

5.15 pm

Having tabled the new clause, I did some further digging. On Friday, the Retained Firefighters Union told me that it had done a quick survey of eight fire authorities picked at random and discovered, shockingly, that not one had a budget for recruiting retained firefighters. That is a serious situation, when we are already facing a shortfall of 3,000, and the shortfall is likely to increase.

It is imperative that we act. Retained firefighters are arguably the most cost-effective part of the fire service. Failing to recruit and retain enough of them will undermine the modernisation process and will certainly slow down the harvesting of its financial savings. The authorities with the largest number of retained firefighters are almost invariably those with the least scope for modernisation savings and the smallest slice of the transitional funding that the Office of the Deputy Prime Minister has made available.

I hope that the Minister will be able to confirm that there will be a mechanism whereby employers, both public and private, will be included in the process in a way that fully recognises their key role. I look forward to his response and to the contributions that I confidently anticipate from the aforementioned Devon contingent.

Richard Younger-Ross: Devon was indeed extremely well represented in Committee, with three members, but the south-west generally did not do too badly either, with five. However, that did not mean that we always got our points across to the Minister.

The hon. Member for Runnymede and Weybridge (Mr. Hammond) spoke about employer representation on the review body. He thinks that he was at cross purposes with the Minister, but I understood exactly what he meant in Committee, so I am surprised that it was not so clear to the Government.

We debated this at length in Committee, and the hon. Gentleman has mentioned our probing amendments on encouraging employers to release people to serve as retained firefighters. We suggested cash rewards, which will perhaps not prove to be the way forward, as a way of recognising what employers do. The Minister responded positively and said that retained firefighters were a vital resource, so I am horrified to hear that there are eight fire authorities with no money to recruit them. That is a scandal.

Mr. Hammond: In fact, it is worse than that. The Retained Firefighters Union polled the eight authorities at random, so the statistical suggestion must be that many more will prove to have no budget.

Richard Younger-Ross: That is an appalling situation. It could be that the authorities that rely heavily on retained crew are having problems with their budget. The Government are quite rightly seeking parity of salaries for retained firefighters, so they have recognised the need in words, but they have not recognised it in cash terms. Let us consider the example of the combined authority in Devon, which relies heavily on retained firefighters. The 16 per cent. pay increase over three years translates into a 23 per cent. increase in the budget of the Devon fire authority. That authority is finding it hard to make ends meet and says that it would require a further £2 million to achieve the same sort of funding as other fire authorities. It is therefore perhaps unsurprising if recruitment campaigns are cut in the attempt to ensure that resources are put into essential services such as firefighting, the response to road traffic accidents and so on.

The problem will get worse. As work patterns change and our countryside has fewer people working in it and more people commuting longer distances, those available on the ground will become few and far between. It is therefore imperative that greater efforts are made to recruit those few people who reside close enough to the station. The Government accept that a genuine problem needs to be tackled. I hope that they also accept that it is not simply a matter of an advertising campaign or a review but of considering the way in which fire authorities are funded to recruit and retain those firefighters. Parity is good as far as it goes but it falls apart if the fire service is left short of cash.

The hon. Member for Runnymede and Weybridge mentioned local authorities. We do not need a review in that case because Ministers are responsible for local authorities. I therefore urge the Minister to write a letter to himself to spur himself to write to local authorities telling them to be more responsive and to encourage their members of staff to become retained firefighters. Many authorities resist that, which is a great shame because a potential resource is not being used. In rural areas, its use is essential.

Mr. Drew: I wish to make a couple of brief observations. Like other constituencies, Gloucestershire relies heavily on retained firefighters. However, those firefighters can function only if they have a close relationship with full-time firefighters. Sometimes we talk about retained firefighters as though they work in isolation and provide cover to an area on their own, but, in order to provide effective fire cover, the full-time firefighters in a sizeable market town must have a relationship with the retained firefighters in the smaller market towns. Whatever the Government devise, a structure that recognises that relationship is vital.

I do not want to get hung up on the idea of an advertising budget. I accept that advertising might attract some individuals, but the main problem is that the retained fire service operates restrictively. If we had an arrangement under which people would be off call far more often, we could recruit them more easily. However, the system is predicated on the belief that people live and work locally. If either does not pertain, the opportunity to become a retained firefighter is precluded. We may have to consider a system whereby people who work locally but live some distance away are on call when they are at work and those who live locally and are willing to be retained firefighters and on call at times of greatest danger in the evenings and at night are not on call during the day, when they work away from home.

I do not think that this is a matter for statute. I think we should ask ourselves whether we have a service that is fit for the 21st century, and it is clear that the service is not currently working very well. The only way in which the three retained fire stations in my neck of the woods—Painswick, Nailsworth and Dursley—can recruit is by word of mouth. Nepotism often occurs: the sons and daughters of existing retained firefighters often become retained firefighters themselves, because they have been targeted directly. I do not think that is a terribly good thing, because we want the service to be open and accessible, and in any case it is a pretty ad hoc method.

Mr. Hammond: I agree with much of what the hon. Gentleman is saying. He mentioned an advertising budget. I do not think that a responsible fire authority would limit a ring-fenced budget to advertising for recruitment purposes. There is much more to recruitment than advertising. I wonder how many people are aware of the retained fire service, of how it works and of the opportunities it provides.

Mr. Drew: That is certainly true. I am merely saying that I think any advertising should be aimed at employers rather than attempting to recruit directly. Employers may encourage staff to think about becoming retained firefighters, but those who are interested will have probably taken that route already. It is more a question of securing release from employers.

I think we need a set of proposals from the Government, rather than legislation for the statute book.

Mr. Swire: The Minister will have to resist the temptation to use the Labour party buzzword of the last fortnight—"opportunistic", as applied to everything that the Opposition do—because I think that there is a commonality of interest in this case. The new clause is eminently sensible, and deals with an issue about which we in the west country feel strongly. As we have heard, Devon in particular relies very much on its retained firefighters.

I agree with the hon. Member for Stroud (Mr. Drew) that retained firefighters should not be regarded in an individual way, in that they are part and parcel of the deal. In our part of the world, however, they are perhaps more significant than they are in other areas. The hon. Member for Teignbridge (Richard Younger-Ross) mentioned the costs to Devon fire and rescue service of the increase in retained firemen's salaries—above 16 per cent. over three years, representing a total increase of 23 per cent. in the authority's budget. That means that a £2 million increase is needed for the service just to stand still.

The Bill does not address the issue of rural sparsity, which has an impact on the question of retained firemen. Nowadays we look increasingly to employers in the private sector, and elements of the public sector, to release employees so that they can do community jobs. We have community support police, for instance, as well as established voluntary bodies such as the Royal National Lifeboat Institution and the Sidmouth inshore lifeboat service—if I may give a plug to an excellent service in my area.

We seem to be asking businesses, particularly those in the private sector, to do more and more, while penalising them through higher national insurance contributions and more and more socially based legislation. All that deters them from taking on more people in order to expand. Now we are telling them that, having taken on more people despite all the penalties, they should release those people to do community jobs. We have to be very careful in terms of how much we ask these hard-pressed businesses to do.

However, I take the point that we need to raise awareness of the existence of the retained fire service and the opportunities within it—not only among employers but among the employees themselves. However, I am not convinced that an advertising campaign per se is the answer. It might go some way towards alleviating the problem in the short term, but we need to articulate a career structure in the retained service to show people that there is a career progression, that the terms of employment have been improved, and that the service is a viable alternative for those who cannot become full-time firemen, or for those for whom the fire service has not provided the opportunity to become full-time firemen.

5.30 pm

I do not know the latest figures for retained firefighters in Devon—whether there is a problem, or whether one is likely to arise—but the genuine feeling exists that this legislation is based on the desire to create larger units, which it surely will, and that at some point our service will be subsumed and we will come off worse. Ours is a very good fire authority that works extremely well, using a lot of local knowledge; frankly, it cannot be improved upon. A merger and no increase in the number of retained firemen could result in one of two things: a loss of cover or a cut in services. As we all know, for a rural area the insurance implications of a loss of cover could be very profound indeed. That issue has not been touched on at all.

I take the point, made by the hon. Member for Stroud, about increasing the number of off-call retained firemen, but to go down that road would require increasing the number of retained firemen on call at any given time. I do not see how having more off-call firemen would deal with the problem of a lack of retained firemen. Yet more would be needed, and such a problem cannot be solved in that way.

I should be interested to hear what the Under-Secretary has to say about new clause 2. We Conservatives are generally against increasing the amount of legislation, but the creation of such an advisory panel would mean that our retained firemen were being properly represented. The new clause is well constructed. It refers to "representatives of fire and rescue authorities or organisations representing fire and rescue authorities", and to

"representatives of private sector employers or organisations representing private sector employers".

I suspect that there are lessons to be learned, particularly in the light of the mobilisation—[Interruption.] If the Under-Secretary would do me the courtesy of listening, he might be in a better position to answer this point. Indeed, when I asked the Minister for Local and Regional Government a direct question earlier, I was not granted the courtesy of a direct reply.

I shall re-run what I said to allow the Under-Secretary to take it on board. In terms of releasing private sector and public sector employees, there are probably lessons to be learned from the recent Iraq war. There was a significant mobilisation of the Territorial Army and other reserve forces, but to be honest some employers were more compliant and encouraging to their employees than others. It would be very interesting if representatives of those self-same employers were included on a advisory panel, which might well be able to answer some of our questions about retained firemen.

Mr. John Redwood (Wokingham) (Con): Given that the Under-Secretary is not even extending to my hon. Friend the courtesy of listening to his argument, is he not a little worried that such an advisory body would be ignored by a Government who are not interested in the employer's view, and who do not look after retained firemen?

Mr. Swire: My right hon. Friend makes an extremely good point. Having sat through our deliberations in Committee, I know that neither the Under-Secretary nor the Minister is interested in any of our arguments. So far as they are concerned, they are going to implement this measure, in keeping with their attempt to regionalise everything and in line with the artificial regions that they are seeking to create throughout the country. It is part of their regionalisation programme, and anything that stands in the way of that is dismissed.

The Government say that we are little Englanders and that we are not keen on modernisation, but as we know, that is all baloney. [Interruption.] The Minister says "Correct" from a sedentary position, but many of the people who will shortly be invited to vote on whether to have regional assemblies will probably show that it is we who are correct. We leave that, however, to the electorate—something that the Minister is apparently not prepared to do, given that he is prejudging the result of a democratic vote. Historically, that has been shown to be a dangerous thing to do.

My right hon. Friend the Member for Wokingham (Mr. Redwood) suggested that the Minister might not be listening to employers. There is no real evidence that anything that this Government have ever done has involved listening to employers, particularly in the private sector. They are seen as the bogey men, the people who must pay more each time there is a tax rise. As we look forward to a third term of Labour tax rises, if there is to be one—[HON. MEMBERS: "Hear, hear."] Hon. Members are clearly not listening. As we look forward to a possible third term of Labour tax rises, those employers will be invited to pay more and more tax, but we are asking the self-same people to release employees to act as retained firefighters.

It is incumbent on the Minister for Local and Regional Government to consider having a platform, such as that suggested in new clause 2, to enable representatives of the retained fire services and employers to get round a table and solve a problem that he has to admit exists—we have not invented it. I shall be interested to know the answer, if either the Minister or the Under-Secretary will do me the courtesy of answering the question.

Mr. Flook: If we are to protect the fire service in our rural counties, we need an advisory panel on the recruitment and retention of retained firefighters. That would make eminent sense. As we have already heard, retained firefighters are the backbone of the service, especially in rural areas. That is certainly the case in Somerset, where only three of the 27 firefighting stations are full time: Taunton, Bridgwater and Yeovil; the other 24 stations operate on a retained basis. In my constituency, that involves some very brave men and women in Wellington, Wiveliscombe and Dulverton. By definition, they are drawn closely from the local community, which is vital in rural areas because many addresses are not tabulated in the way in which we should like them to be, and local knowledge is needed to discover exactly where fires are, and where firefighters must go.

The future is worrying. As my hon. Friend the Member for Runnymede and Weybridge (Mr. Hammond) said, the recruitment and consequent retention of firefighters in the retained stations is dropping considerably. There is already a 20 per cent. shortfall, which is no surprise in rural areas. My hon. Friend mentioned greengrocers, and many farmers and farm workers are also involved, of whom there are now far fewer. As we all know, there are also fewer farms—no doubt because other Government policy undermines them. There are therefore fewer and fewer people who are willing and physically able to be retained firefighters.

It is important to address that issue, and one way of doing so would be better and more fully to understand why employers might be willing to release individual employees to be retained firefighters. It is therefore helpful and sensible to suggest that an advisory panel be set up. It would be even more helpful if there were greater representation of private sector employers. I presume that the 20 per cent. shortfall is increasing rather than decreasing, and although the Government may not agree with the precise wording of new clause 2, I should be interested to learn how the Minister for Local and Regional Government intends to remove that serious impediment to the modernisation of the fire service. Somerset, a rural county that is delivering its firefighting capability very cost effectively, is not receiving its fair share of the transitional funding needed to move to a modernised firefighting service. That is also the case in Devon. If the shortfall is increasing, one solution would be to set up an advisory panel, as proposed in new clause 2, to enable the Government to understand the reasons behind the shortfall and work towards lessening it.

Richard Younger-Ross: I am not too sure of the situation in Somerset, but Devon requires £2 million in transitional funding and has been loaned £500,000. The important word is "loaned"; the money must be paid back.

Mr. Flook: I am grateful for that intervention. Only a quarter of the contribution is being made in the short term—rather than in the long term—because it has to be paid back.

The hon. Member for Stroud (Mr. Drew) made an excellent point about the need to raise awareness. In communities that have retained firefighters, the firefighters' neighbours will probably know what they do part time, at weekends and at night, but the majority of people in communities such as Wellington, Wiveliscombe and Dulverton will not be aware of that. It would help if the Government and local firefighters did more to raise that awareness.

I welcome the announcement that the Minister made on 15 December of a review of the retained firefighting service. It will be interesting, some weeks on, to see whether he is able to inform the House of any progress. In Committee, he alluded to the involvement of the CBI, and I would be interested to hear whether he would consider it appropriate for the Federation of Small Businesses or the Institute of Directors to become involved, and whether they could be asked why they believe there is a shortfall and how they could help to shore up the gap, which seems to be getting larger rather than smaller.

[Mr. Flook]

Phil Hope: I appreciate the concerns about the recruitment and retention challenges that face the retained section of the fire and rescue service, which have prompted the proposal of this new clause, but I believe that the hon. Member for Runnymede and Weybridge (Mr. Hammond) is misguided in suggesting that a new statutory standing body would be an effective method of tackling these issues. I hope that I will be able to satisfy his concerns about engagement with the public and private sector employers, for example. I note that he has recruited two whole-time Back Benchers—if I may call them that—from the Committee, and one retained Back Bencher, who seems to have slipped in, and who will possibly slip out again later—[Interruption.] I also appreciate that the hon. Member for Runnymede and Weybridge seems to have taken the whole Committee stage through single-handedly.

Hon. Members will no doubt recall that the Central Fire Brigades Advisory Council also acted as a statutory consultee for the majority of the Secretary of State's regulation-making powers under the Fire Services Act 1947. That body has already been criticised for its increasing inability to provide any strategic direction on the future of the fire and rescue service. Indeed, Professor Bain's report recommended a new advisory and consultative structure that would widen engagement with stakeholders and ensure a focus on strategic advice rather than on executive functions. I am pleased to tell hon. Members that we have already put this new, more flexible structure in place. The practitioners forum and the business and community safety forum are up and running to ensure that both the providers and the users of the service can inform the process of modernisation.

Mr. Hammond: Which business representative organisations are engaged in the business and community safety forum?

Phil Hope: I can confirm that the CBI, for example, is a member of the forum. The hon. Gentleman mentioned other business organisations, and I shall describe in a moment how they are being consulted in the review of the retained fire service.

It was not just the existing advisory and consultative structure that Professor Bain considered to be ineffective. The independent review of the fire service found the existing negotiating machinery also to be ineffective. The Bain report recommended that it be replaced with "a smaller body, with executive authority to negotiate and the experience and skills to do so".

The new body should have an independent chair and clear links to Ministers and the policy-making process. Significantly, Bain also made it clear that membership of the body should include the Retained Firefighters Union, whose members, like those of the other unions, have a keen interest in the new clause and a very strong interest in effective negotiating machinery. I include in that the National Association of Fire Officers, the Association of Principal Fire Officers and Unison, as well as the Fire Brigades Union.

In the White Paper, "Our Fire and Rescue Service", we made it clear that we agreed with much of Bain's thinking on the negotiating machinery. Our objective was—and still is—to see three negotiating bodies for uniformed fire and rescue service staff. We want one for chief fire officers and assistant chief fire officers; one for middle managers; and one for fire fighters and control room staff. Like Bain, we also want the new negotiating bodies extended to include a wider range of employee representative bodies. That will benefit all fire service employees and will ensure that issues relating to the pay terms and conditions of retained staff can be tackled effectively.

Members will know that, under the pay agreement for the fire and rescue service 2003, the current negotiating machinery is being reviewed. I hope that that review will result in the improvements that both the independent review of the fire service and the recent White Paper articulated—a matter that later amendments touch on—but, if it does not, the Bill will enable the Government to take the powers needed to bring about those improvements themselves. I still hope that that will not be necessary.

Hon. Members will be aware that, both in the White Paper and the draft national framework, the Government have recognised the vital contribution of the retained section of the service and have acknowledged the need to find solutions to the long-recognised problems of recruitment and retention, which have been mentioned this afternoon. That is why I announced on 15 December that there would be a review of issues affecting the retained section of the service. Under the more flexible arrangements afforded by the new consultative structure, a team has now been formed to take forward that review.

The review team's key remit is to examine the factors that contribute to the recruitment and retention challenges faced by the retained section of the fire and rescue service. That will include issues surrounding equality and diversity, public awareness, engagement with the business community, deployment, community participation, and the role, reward and conditions of service as they relate to recruitment and retention issues.

The retained review team met for the first time on 21 January. Its membership is drawn from across the fire and rescue service community and includes representatives from the Local Government Association, the Chief and Assistant Chief Fire Officers Association, the Retained Firefighters Union, the Fire Brigades Union, the Office of the Deputy Prime Minister and the Scottish Executive justice department.

Although the focus of the review will be the fire and rescue services of England and Wales, the Scottish Executive justice department's participation has been invited because the issues that the retained review team will be investigating also have relevance to the Scottish fire service. ODPM will also liaise with the Northern Ireland fire service about the work of the review team.

Only the key service stakeholder groups will be directly involved on the review team. However, other organisations—including public and private employers' organisations—will be involved in helping to identify a range of options for tackling the recruitment and retention challenges. I made it very clear in Committee that employers would be fully engaged in the process. It is essential that we understand the motives, and the reluctance, of private and public employers whom we wish to attract into releasing staff to become retained firefighters. The review team is therefore seeking advice from a wide range of public and private sector employers and the national bodies that represent them.

Let me go further to provide more reassurance to the hon. Member for Runnymede and Weybridge. A workshop has been arranged for the end of April, which will involve the review team, other representatives from the fire and rescue service, organisations that rely on volunteers in order to provide a service, Government Departments, employers' organisations in the public and private sectors and bodies that promote opportunities for voluntary work both to individuals and to employers. We anticipate that the workshop will provide the review with valuable insight into how the challenges of recruitment, retention and business community engagement can be effectively overcome.

The business community will include the Confederation of British Industry, the Federation of Small Businesses, which will bring a welcome nod from Conservative Members, and Business in the Community. I might add that the Royal National Lifeboat Institution, along with the Women's Royal Voluntary Service, will also be invited. We would like to invite those bodies, along with others that I shall not read out, to participate in the workshop, and I hope that that reassures the hon. Member for Runnymede and Weybridge.

On recruitment budgets for retained firefighters, I am sure that the review will want to take into account the survey, which has been mentioned this afternoon. The retained review must examine recruitment budgets, which are matters for individual fire and rescue authorities, because we do not know whether they separately identify whole-time and retained firefighters. When we make judgments about budgets, we must know the detail, which is exactly what a review team and a workshop can identify. The Office of the Deputy Prime Minister is providing centrally produced recruitment literature for use by all fire and rescue authorities.

Richard Younger-Ross: The Minister will know, because it has been in all the papers, that there is a massive campaign to recruit special constables. Does he envisage that the Government might lead or encourage such a recruitment campaign for retained firefighters?

Phil Hope: The retained review is all about examining what works and what does not. The hon. Gentleman will be glad to know that the ODPM is producing a video that includes information on retained firefighters, which can be issued to raise awareness in the local community about the wider role of retained firefighters. The hon. Member for Runnymede and Weybridge pointed out that the issue is about not only adverts but understanding the wider contribution that retained firefighters make and that we want them to continue to make in future.

Mr. Swire: Can the workshop's remit be extended to discuss with the Institute of Directors and other employers' organisations what incentives can be offered to employers who regularly release their employees as retained firemen?

Phil Hope: The problem with identifying one or two organisations is that the list tends to grow. I cannot say whether the workshop will examine that point, but it is the exactly the kind of issue that the review team must examine to ensure that we are getting things right.

A number of hon. Members have raised questions about different things that the review might do. My hon. Friend the Member for Stroud (Mr. Drew) asked whether greater flexibility in the times when retained firefighters are required to be on call might help recruitment, and the review team will certainly examine that issue. Individual fire services are already examining the requirement to be on call, with flexibility in mind, and they are offering differing contracts depending on what times retained firefighters can offer. My hon. Friend's contribution was helpful and it addresses the issue of the availability of retained firefighters in terms of their living or working close to a fire station.

The hon. Members for East Devon (Mr. Swire) and for Taunton (Mr. Flook) discussed funding. I do not want to get diverted into a debate about funding, but when they bid for extra cash for Devon, which is understandable, they might like to have a word with the shadow Chancellor, who has just announced a policy to freeze funds for local government—I do know how he will square that with his Back Benchers. Conservative Front Benchers often say that they will clamp down on public spending, but Conservative Back Benchers keep standing up and asking for more cash. I do not want to introduce discord into the debate; I simply point out some of the contradictions in the position adopted by Conservative Members.

The physical hard work undertaken by retained firefighters in their firefighting activities has been pointed out, but the Bill's purpose is to broaden the role that the fire service plays, which includes promoting community fire safety. We will attract many more people into the fire service, whether they are whole-time or retained firefighters, who will undertake a variety of roles. The extra numbers mean that firefighters can focus on prevention, which is important in reducing fire death.

Mr. Hammond: That is interesting. Does the Minister envisage fire authorities engaging retained personnel to carry out routine, non-emergency response duties? As far as I know, the bulk of the retained work is responsive, and the nature of the role will change slightly if retained firefighters report by pre-planned arrangements to do preventive work.

Phil Hope: The hon. Gentleman rightly says that the bulk of the work is responsive. When I described the fire service's wider role in prevention at the Retained Firefighters Union conference, a retained firefighter said that retained firefighters could not do that. Before I could respond, a Welsh retained firefighters' representative stood up and gave an excellent account of how retained firefighters are doing precisely that in Wales. The flexibility and diversity of the role provides many opportunities for retained firefighters to contribute to the overall targets that we are endeavouring to achieve.

I have answered in full the questions about how we will consult on the future of retained firefighters, and I hope that I have given the hon. Gentleman the assurances that he requires. The review team will, we hope, submit its report to the practitioners forum in July, and its report will contain its recommendations, its implementation and communications strategies and its programme for delivery. Given today's debate and the consultation, which will take place not only through the workshop but in other ways, I hope that we have satisfied the hon. Gentleman that new clause 2 is not necessary and that he will see fit to withdraw it.

Mr. Hammond: I am grateful to the Minister for his explanation, but I detect a touch of complacency. He does not recognise the crisis that the retained service currently faces—the retained service is short of 20 per cent. of its personnel and as the role expands that shortfall is likely to get considerably worse.

I am interested in the workshop that the Minister is holding. As he anticipates, I shall write to him to suggest some other organisations that might appropriately be invited to participate in order to ensure that the business community bodies represent the employers found in the areas where the retained service operates—on the whole, that is not city centres or even large towns but rural and semi-rural areas. If the Minister has an observer ticket for that workshop, perhaps he will write to me. I promise to keep my mouth closed, but I would be interested to see what goes on.

It is disappointing that the Minister has not made a commitment to add business membership to the review team, which is the ongoing body that will report to the practitioners forum in the summer. Despite everything that Ministers say about changing the culture of the fire service, which I am sure that they genuinely want to achieve, their approach is still exclusive. The review team is made up entirely of insiders—employers, civil servants, expert advisers and union officials—who will listen to what people in the real world have to say, but those slightly awkward people from the real world have not been risked on the inside of the deliberation. I would feel more comfortable if the Minister had said that he would put representatives of the business community on to the review team, which might then achieve rapid progress in the direction that we all want to go.

Perhaps the best way to make progress would be if the Minister were to have a quite word in the ear of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, preferably before Wednesday, to suggest that when he is thinking about incentives to business to do various worthwhile things for the good of the economy, he might spare a thought for those businesses that could be persuaded to release employees for retained firefighting duties, which might make a rapid difference to the available pool of retained firefighters.

I do not intend to press new clause 2; I simply wanted to raise the issue. I am grateful to the Minister for his comments and hope that we can regard the debate as ongoing, because it is in everybody's interests that we address the retained firefighter crisis.

I have one final point. The Minister said that he was not sure whether fire authorities had separate budgets for recruitment of retained firefighters or whether that was subsumed within a larger budget. Given the scale of the crisis and the significance of retained firefighter recruitment in some fire authorities, appropriate fire authorities should identify separate budgets for that purpose. When the Bill reaches the statute book, the Minister will have various powers to ensure that that happens and I hope that he will consider doing so as a means of making progress on the issue.

I beg to ask leave to withdraw the motion.

Motion and clause, by leave, withdrawn.

New Clause 4

LIMITATION ON POWER TO AUTHORISE CHARGING

'(1) An order under section 19 may not authorise a fire and rescue authority to charge for:

(a) extinguishing fires or protecting life and property in the event of fires; or

(b) rescuing people in the event of road traffic accidents or protecting people from serious harm in the event of road traffic accidents; or

(c) discharging any function relating to emergencies conferred on it by the Secretary of State under section 9.

(2) An order under section 19 may authorise a fire and rescue authority to charge for the provision of emergency medical assistance only in circumstances where a National Health Service Ambulance Trust is authorised to charge for such provision.'.—[Mr. Hammond.]

Brought up, and read the First time.

Mr. Hammond: I beg to move, That the clause be read a Second time.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With this it will be convenient to discuss the following:

Government amendment No. 12.

Amendment No. 2, in clause 19, page 9, line 10, leave out subsection (2).

Government amendment No. 13.

Mr. Hammond: The new clause deals with the scope of the power of the Secretary of State to authorise charging under clause 19. The current regime, under the 1947 Act, confers only one statutory function on fire authorities—that of extinguishing fires and protecting life and property in the event of fire—and prohibits charging for the discharge of that activity, but by omission it allows charging for all other areas of fire service activity. The practice is that few authorities charge for emergency work. I shall focus in this short debate on road traffic accidents.

We should not confuse this issue with the power that exists, and could specifically be granted to fire and rescue authorities under the Bill, to charge for non-emergency functions, such as the use of equipment and manpower, or the establishment of the authority to carry out everyday functions such as pumping water out of a basement or filling a swimming pool. Those are useful functions, but they are not central to the emergency role of the service.

An essential part of the purpose of the Bill is to put road traffic accidents and other emergency work—for example, chemical and nuclear decontamination in the event of a terrorist attack, or rescue from floodwater—at the heart of what the fire and rescue services do. All those roles will have the same essential statutory basis as the current requirement to extinguish fires and protect life and property in the event of fire. The Minister has argued repeatedly—somewhat disingenuously—that because the Bill has a continuing prohibition on charging for fire-related activities, it reflects the 1947 Act. However, as I see it, that Act bans charging for the statutory function of the fire authority. There is only one statutory function at present. To retain the status quo, we would need to extend that ban on charging to all statutory functions, including attending at road traffic accidents and other emergencies. New clause 4 does not go that far. It does not suggest that the ban on charging should extend to the statutory functions of fire prevention and fire education work under clause 6. It simply suggests a prohibition on charging for the emergency statutory functions of the fire and rescue authorities under clauses 7, 8 and 9.

On the one hand, the Bill extends a clear additional statutory function, but on the other it seeks to keep open the ability to charge for the discharge of that function in an emergency. That is not an acceptable proposition, and it is not what our constituents expect us to legislate for. The Bill also provides for the charging of third parties, which is a thinly disguised reference to insurers. Charging motor insurers would represent another stealth tax on the Government's favourite victim, the motorist. What about the uninsured—the millions of people who drive on our roads every day without insurance? They are an increasing problem. Would they pay? How would the Government collect charges from people who do not have an insurer to pay up on their behalf, when they cannot collect two thirds of the fines imposed by courts on similar people? Will not this be simply another example of an additional charge or tax on the law-abiding, insured majority, while the public purse continues to support the antisocial minority?

Mr. Redwood: Is my hon. Friend worried that if a fire authority was particularly keen to recoup its costs in the way that he describes, there might be an argument about payment before someone received the service that they deserved in an emergency situation?

Mr. Hammond: My right hon. Friend raises an important point, but it is not a question of "might". At least one fire authority—the London Fire and Emergency Planning Authority—is keen to charge in that way and has made it clear that it would like powers to charge for road traffic accident rescue work. Another practical problem might arise if fire authorities were allowed to charge for attending road traffic accidents. What if someone were involved in a road traffic accident and was trapped in his vehicle but physically uninjured? Such a person might tell the fire brigade, which has raced to the scene with lights flashing and sirens blaring, that he does not want to be cut out of his car and receive a bill for £250. He would rather wait while his friendly local mechanic or a chap he knows from down the pub, whom he has just phoned on his mobile phone, comes along to cut him out. [Laughter.] Hon. Members may laugh, but it is central to our relationship with the emergency services that it never crosses our minds to ask whether we will be charged for the services delivered. When we pick up the phone and dial 999 because we see smoke, we do not wonder first whether there will be a charge for calling the fire brigade.

I am against charging for emergency services that are part of a statutory function, although I am not necessarily against charging for non-emergency work. I am also against discriminating against the law-abiding majority by limiting charging to those with insurers able to pay. That is the Government's idea of the way to make such charges a painless tax. I made the same point when I was health spokesman in 1998 during the passage of the Road Traffic (NHS Charges) Act 1999. I sought an assurance in Committee on behalf of motorists, but all I got was a lecture from the Minister about bad landlords causing people to be trapped in lifts. Any hon. Members who have offices in Portcullis House will know that it has the eight lifts most likely to break down nearby, but they are not maintained by someone whom I would regard as a particularly bad landlord. I hope that the Minister will deal with motorists involved in road traffic accidents, instead of trying to refocus the discussion on people trapped in lifts.

Amendment No. 2 would leave out clause 19(2), which prevents charging for extinguishing fires, and replace it with new clause 4, which would prevent charging for fires, road traffic accidents and any emergency functions conferred on fire and rescue authorities by clause 19. That is an enabling clause that will give the Secretary of State power to confer functions by statutory instrument. We have the benefit of the Secretary of State's preliminary thinking, in the form of a draft statutory instrument that was circulated in Committee. To broaden the House's understanding of what is involved in clause 19 functions, the draft statutory instrument includes chemical, biological, radiological or nuclear incidents; search and rescue in cases in which there is a serious threat that one or more persons has been trapped in the area as a result of a landslide or the collapse of a building; major flooding; and major rail, water and air accidents. It would be unthinkable to charge people for interventions in such emergencies, so why on earth cannot the Government rule out doing so?

Subsection (2) of new clause 4 addresses a different issue: charging for emergency medical assistance. The background to the provision is the Road Traffic (NHS Charges) Act 1999, which authorises charging, via insurers, for the costs of national health service treatment provided after a road traffic accident. Our position during the progress of that measure was—as it remains—that we resist unfair discrimination against the motorist, who should not be seen as a soft target simply because, if he is a law-abiding individual, he will generally have insurance.

[Mr. Hammond]

A programme is currently under way to promote co-response and, indeed, first response by fire and rescue authorities, whereby if a fire and rescue authority is the first on the scene of an incident, it will increasingly—I shall come to that point later—be able to deliver emergency medical assistance. Furthermore, especially in rural areas, fire services could in future be the first responder to other types of medical emergency—for example, cardiac arrests—if the fire station was significantly nearer to the patient than the nearest ambulance station. We simply cannot have a situation in which people pay according to whether the fire engine or the ambulance gets there first. That would be outrageous and our proposal attempts to deal with it.

The Minister has obviously understood our concern, which we debated in Committee, and I am delighted that he responded with Government amendment No. 12, especially subsection (2A), which bans all charging for emergency medical assistance by fire authorities. However, I find myself in the curious position of having to tell him that I think he has given too much. We risk the opposite scenario, in which the victim lying at the roadside would no longer have to listen to the ambulance approaching from one side and the fire engine approaching from the other, hoping that the ambulance got there first so that he would not be charged by the fire service. As a result of amendment No. 12, he could be hoping that the fire engine got there first, because under the Road Traffic (NHS Charges) Act 1999, if the ambulance arrived first, he might be charged by the NHS.

I anticipate the Minister's defence to my objection. A patient treated at the scene by a fire brigade will not always be taken away in an ambulance to an NHS hospital. Often, people at the roadside with minor injuries decline, for all sorts of reasons, to get into an ambulance and go to hospital; a plaster is stuck on the injury and they go off about their business. However, I hope that the Minister can give us a pragmatic answer to avoid creating a new injustice in resolving the one that we identified in the Standing Committee.

Amendment No. 12 limits the prohibition on charging for fires, so that fire authorities will be able to charge for fires under the sea—that is, in tunnels—or fires and rescues at sea. Can the Minister give us some information about that proposal? I understand that, at present, the Maritime and Coastguard Agency has lead responsibility for rescue from fires at sea, which includes extinguishing them. What is the current practice on charging? From discussions with the Kent and Medway Towns fire authority, I know that the current interpretation of the 1947 Act is that it prevents charging for work carried out in relation to fires in the channel tunnel. None the less, there is an elaborate mechanism to allow the Kent and Medway combined authority to extract a substantial annual sum from the operators of the channel tunnel for providing cover for the tunnel. It would be useful if the Minister would clarify what the situation will be for the channel tunnel and other subsea structures, as well as how the amendment will affect rescue at sea? Government amendment No. 13 makes amendment No. 12 consistent with other parts of the Bill, by making it clear that references to "sea" are not restricted to sea within the territorial limits of the United Kingdom.

I cannot believe that the British public want charges for emergency responses from our fire and rescue services. If we introduce charges for the attendance of the fire service at a major road accident, what will come next? Will we charge for the police to go to the scene of a burglary? Will we charge for cutting people out of a train wreck or plane crash, or for decontaminating them after a terrorist attack? I do not think so. That cannot be what the Government have in mind. So what is their refusal to limit the scope of charging all about? It is clear that it is about a desire to double charge motorists and to make them pay for a service for which they pay already through their council tax. I have asked the Minister once, and I ask him again, for a categorical undertaking that, if the Government will not accept our new clause, Britain's 27 million motorists and their insurers will not be charged by the fire and rescue services for emergency attendance at road traffic accidents. Anything less than such an undertaking will leave Britain's motorists in no doubt about what the Government have in mind for them: yet another stealth tax on law-abiding, insured drivers.

Mr. Drew: Some of us on the Labour Benches thoroughly concur with some of what the hon. Member for Runnymede and Weybridge (Mr. Hammond) has said, so we look forward to our right hon. Friend the Minister for Local and Regional Government allaying our worst fears about what could happen. Of course, there is always the difficulty that we worry more about what might happen rather than what is likely to happen. In Standing Committee, we probably spent more time on clause 19 than on any other part of the Bill, although there was only one Division, despite the fact that several amendments were discussed.

The problem for some of us is that the consultation paper is somewhat opaque. Some of us do not understand all the nuances of every last dot and comma of the Bill, and the consultation paper should have gone some way towards clarifying how the charging policy would work in practice. I may be alone, but I am not much the wiser about that, so I hope that my right hon. Friend will be able to assuage our fears about several things.

We are concerned that the proposals would make the current ad hoc arrangements worse. Currently, some fire and rescue authorities can make a charge if they feel that a person's behaviour has resulted in gratuitous waste of their time and resources. However, we need some explanation of the proposals. Given that all three emergency services spend most of their time actually dealing with emergencies, I am not clear how there can be a process that settles in advance whether an incident is such that a charge should be levied on a motorist or a person who has the misfortune to be stuck in a lift. The proposals are a recipe for disaster unless we can lay the ghost of those fears and ensure that charges would not lead to problems in the future. I hope that my right hon. Friend will lay the ghosts completely so that we can move on. Charging must be put in its proper context—as a very small part of a much more important piece of legislation.

Richard Younger-Ross: I support much of what the hon. Member for Runnymede and Weybridge (Mr. Hammond) has said, but I disagree with what he said about new clause 4—we disagreed on that in Committee. He has a great future in a Treasury team because he has the ability to double count figures in the same way in which the Chancellor of the Exchequer does whenever there is an announcement on new Government spending—that is not meant as a compliment.

The hon. Gentleman talks about double charging as if there will be two sets of charges, but that is blatantly not the case. If there is a system of charging in specific instances, the running costs of the relevant authority are reduced. If those costs are reduced, the charge to the taxpayer is thus reduced—the taxpayer does not pay in that instance. Double charging would occur only if the money raised disappeared or were wasted, and I do not believe that that will be the case.

Mr. Hammond: Will the hon. Gentleman tell me how far the Liberal Democrats extend that thinking? Will they introduce charging throughout such areas as the national health service and the education sector?

Richard Younger-Ross: No. I noticed that the hon. Gentleman hypothesised that there would be a great roll-out of a programme through which the Government would charge for this, that and the other, but that is not the case. In the case of road traffic accidents, one can say that someone is to blame, so charges can be recovered from whoever is at fault. There was no one who could be said to be at fault or to blame in the other cases that he mentioned. He cited an aeroplane crash, but it would be difficult to determine with whom the fault lay in such a case. If terrorists blew up a plane, it would be almost impossible to recoup costs from those individuals. However, in the specific case of a road traffic accident, it is more than possible to recoup costs.

Mr. Redwood: Is the hon. Gentleman thus saying that if people smoke too much against advice, they should have to pay for their lung cancer treatment?

Richard Younger-Ross: I am not saying that, but as the right hon. Gentleman well knows, people who smoke too much sometimes find it difficult to get certain forms of treatment because doctors are reluctant to treat them.

We are considering a specific case in which someone is at fault. I understood that when the Conservative party was in power, it accepted the established principle that ambulances have always been able to charge for attending a road traffic accident. It is not unreasonable to extend the call-out charge for attending an RTA to firefighters. The hon. Member for Runnymede and Weybridge seems to be trying to create a new category of people whom he can support, and he seems to be creating a new category of victims.

Mr. Hammond: Motorists—27 million of them.

Richard Younger-Ross: Yes, all of a sudden there is a concept that motorists are victims. Motorists sometimes do get a raw deal, and most of them feel that they are victims if they get parking or speeding tickets. However, it is not unreasonable for the person who was at fault for a road traffic accident to be expected to pay a charge for an emergency service to attend.

I accept several of the concerns that the hon. Member for Stroud (Mr. Drew) raised. If a charging regime is to exist, we must be clear about what it is. Will the Minister define the limits of such a regime so that the fears—the irrational fears, I hope—that a great charging regime will suddenly exist can be laid to rest?

Mr. Hammond: What does the hon. Gentleman propose to do about the increasingly large number of motorists who do not have insurance? The way in which the Government word the provisions suggests that they envisage avoiding that difficult problem by levying charges only on insurers, thus letting uninsured motorists—those who are breaking the law—get away scot-free.

Richard Younger-Ross: I accept that that is a valid point. Uninsured people should be expected to pay the charges, but a problem would arise if they were not able to afford them. We need a new system to stop people driving without insurance. I would need to talk to our transport spokesman to find out what our exact policy is on that, but other systems, such as displaying evidence of insurance in car windscreens, might be a way of dealing with the problem. It is of course wrong for people not to be insured and to get away with it, but that is not what we are debating. The hon. Gentleman cites the example of people escaping payment, but that argument is rather like saying that as some people avoid paying tax, we should not pay tax. That argument is nonsense, and I think that the hon. Gentleman knows it.

Mr. Redwood: I support new clause 4, for which my hon. Friend the Member for Runnymede and Weybridge (Mr. Hammond) argued his case powerfully. I was shocked when I read the Bill and realised that it would enable the Minister or his successors to authorise charges for rescuing people caught up in terrible accidents. The mind boggles as to how that might take place. Is the Minister seriously suggesting that when the fire service arrived on the scene, there would have to be negotiation with victims on how they would pay? Would they have to show a credit card or carry cash, or would they be allowed to defer payment? Would they be able to argue over the price? Would they get a quote in advance, or would they have to pay whatever bill was sent to them and their insurers after the rescue?

My hon. Friend made a powerful point in response to an intervention that I made. I was thinking of a poor victim who desperately needed to be rescued from his or her vehicle and perhaps needed to be taken to the local hospital. Such victims would be in no condition to think through such matters and would agree to any charge that might be made thereafter. However, my hon. Friend cited the even more difficult case of a person who needed to get out of his or her vehicle, but was in no immediate pain or danger. Such people might well want to shop around and use a mobile phone to find out whether a private sector contractor could arrive in a reasonable time and do the job more cheaply. The fire service would presumably have to give them a quote, so the whole situation would become laughable.

[Mr. Redwood]

I speak as someone who wants less government, lower taxes, far fewer quangos, officials and regulations, and far less intervention in daily life than currently exists under the Government. However, there must be a core of public services that we, the taxpayers, get free in return for our massive taxes. If I had to set out a shortlist—it would be a much shorter list than that which the Government produce for us against our will—of things that should be supplied free at the point of use and paid for by the enormous tax revenues that are collected, the service that we are discussing would be high up the list. I would want good defence, criminal justice and emergency services that worked when we were in need of emergency service provision. I cannot believe that a Labour Government, who raise so much money from us all and mug the motorist every day with their massive fuel taxes, licence fees, hidden taxation on motoring and congestion charges, can have the audacity to come to the House with the measure and to take it through Committee without understanding just how much people will hate the proposal and how wrong people would think it to have to pay a fee at the point of accidents such as those that I described. I am delighted that the hon. Member for Stroud (Mr. Drew) speaks up for good, honest Labour Back Benchers who are as shocked as I am to see the Minister coming before the House, without any shame on his face, to demand payment in such dreadful circumstances.

When the Minister responds to the debate, he may well argue that he does not wish to impose charges on all people in the dreadful circumstances that I described. Of course, he could point out that, under the Bill, he would have to authorise a charge before one could be imposed, but I am worried about not only the Minister, but his possible successor before the election. I am not sure who that might be if he is replaced in a reshuffle. I think that he should be promoted to the Cabinet, but he is far too competent for that. We know that competence is not valued in gaining promotion to this Government, so he may be moved sideways. The next Minister—

Madam Deputy Speaker (Sylvia Heal): Order. I hope that the right hon. Gentleman will make his remarks germane to the amendment rather than to people's promotion prospects.

6.30 pm

Mr. Redwood: I stand suitably corrected, Madam Deputy Speaker.

The amendment addresses the charging regime. I am worried that, if we leave the Bill unamended and do not listen to the common sense of my hon. Friend the Member for Runnymede and Weybridge, we could have a Minister who authorises charges in the awful circumstances that I described.

Richard Younger-Ross: How can the right hon. Gentleman justify his statements, given that his party's policies resulted in charging people for eye and dental check-ups?

Mr. Redwood: All parties have gone along with that policy, and this Government have gone further than the previous Government in privatising dentistry. I am sure that Madam Deputy Speaker would regard that as way wide of the amendment, which relates to the idea that a Minister could impose charges in the difficult circumstances that we are discussing.

The Minister will also argue that he aims to charge insurance companies rather than the victims of the accidents. My hon. Friend the Member for Runnymede and Weybridge explained that the people most likely to get into accidents are those who steal cars or drive without proper licences and insurance, and they will not be covered by the proposal. That is grossly unfair, especially if the innocent victim of such an accident is on the road legally and has insurance. Would the innocent victim's insurance company end up paying for that accident and would his no-claims bonus disappear?

Mr. Hammond: Equally bad is the Government's plan to extend the levy that insurers have to pay to meet the costs of uninsured drivers to cover this scheme, imposing a still greater burden on law-abiding drivers. Perhaps my right hon. Friend will contemplate that.

Mr. Redwood: My hon. Friend is right. I was about to say that the burden will undoubtedly fall, as it always does, on the law-abiding decent motorist, who will pay the bill one way or another.

The Minister will know of the proposals before the European Union, which will doubtless come into effect, that will force up the price of insurance for younger women and middle-aged men, who have better driving records than others, in the false name of equality. He is asking us to approve another proposal that will sandbag and increase insurance costs for all motorists on top of the dangerous legislation that is about to come into effect that will tackle two groups that, on average tend, to drive rather better than others—something that should be reflected in their premiums. I hope that he understands just how badly motorists will view a further major increase in their premium cost, which will be a direct result of the Bill if he is foolish enough to reject my hon. Friend's excellent amendment.

Motorists have had enough of this Government. They have been sandbagged, taxed and treated extremely badly by them. This is yet another measure in that campaign. If the Minister wishes to win the votes of motorists at the election, he should back off tonight and support my hon. Friend.

John McDonnell: I take up where my hon. Friend the Member for Stroud (Mr. Drew) left off and seek clarity on the document circulated by my right hon. Friend the Minister. The letter to my hon. Friend the Member for Knowsley, South (Mr. O'Hara), the co-Chairman of the Standing Committee that considered the Bill, includes the consultation paper on secondary legislation. Item 8 of the annexe on page 13 deals with a critical issue that will cause consternation across the country. It could make or break a Government, let alone an individual Minister. It is the issue of cats up trees.

On the rescue of animals, it is current practice in the majority of authorities for the rescue of animals to be effected free of charge. Item 8 states:

"Current practice in the majority of authorities that do charge for animal rescues" is that

"some draw a distinction between domestic animals and livestock but as this is not universal practice we do not propose to include such a distinction in the Order."

So the person to be charged is the owner or keeper of the animal concerned. That introduces a charging policy for fire brigades that, altruistically and with clear commitment to animal rights and good husbandry, turn up to remove a cat from a tree. What happens if the cat does not have a collar? Do we impound the cat? If we impound it, at what point does it become dispensable—

Mr. Drew: Disposable.

John McDonnell: Indeed. When does the cat become disposable? What happens when we cannot identify who has called the fire brigade? What if there is no owner or keeper? Does the onus fall on the person who made the emergency call-out for that fire service?

Mr. Redwood: The hon. Gentleman puts his finger on an important point. What if the cat did not need or want rescuing? The cat may not be able to explain that to the fire brigade in attendance. The owner might be traced later and he could take exception to paying to rescue a cat that was perfectly happy up a tree.

John McDonnell: The proposal clearly contradicts the new line of policy of choice developed at the Labour party spring conference over the weekend and completely contradicts the policies pursued by the Office of the Deputy Prime Minister. We need clarity on the matter. It is one of the anomalies on charging policy that will cause consternation and political reaction across the land.

Mr. Raynsford: I shall try to bring us back to a calm environment after the flights of fantasy of the right hon. Member for Wokingham (Mr. Redwood), who took us into a distant land. I noted his kind remarks about my position. I am grateful for them. On the day that the right hon. Member for Skipton and Ripon (Mr. Curry) has, for whatever reason, sadly resigned from the shadow Cabinet, taking a great chunk of expertise, skill and decency from that body, I suspect a touch of frustration on the part of the right hon. Member for Wokingham that he has not been offered a promotion as part of the consequent reshuffle. He must feel very unloved by his party.

Amendment No. 2 would remove the prohibition on charging for extinguishing fires and protecting life and property in the event of fire. The Fire Services Act 1947 prohibits fire authorities from charging for their response to fires. We have sought to continue such a prohibition in clause 19(2). To do otherwise would be to extend significantly the scope of the charging arrangements. I am sure that the hon. Member for Runnymede and Weybridge (Mr. Hammond) intends that his amendment should be read with new clause 4, in which he seeks to extend the range of services for which a charge cannot be levied.

New clause 4 would extend the restrictions on the services for which a charge might be made. Subsection (1)(a) replicates the restriction that the Government included in the Bill when it was introduced. However, subsections (1)(b) and (1)(c) would also apply to road traffic accidents at which there was no incidence of fire and to a variety of other emergency situations.

The new clause would not cover the circumstances that my hon. Friend the Member for Hayes and Harlington (John McDonnell) mentioned relating to animal welfare. We debated those in Committee, but the amendments do not cover that subject. We propose to make no change to existing arrangements under which some fire and rescue authorities make charges for animal rescue. We do not think that it is right to make arbitrary changes without full consultation and discussion. I assure him that we are essentially preserving the status quo.

With the passage of time, from the position that existed under the 1947 Act, the fire and rescue service has acquired a great deal of experience and skill in dealing with the effects of road traffic accidents, even though there has been no obligation on the service to render rescue assistance. We have introduced a new duty for the service to respond to such incidents in clause 8, recognising the reality and putting on a proper statutory footing the responsibilities of the fire and rescue service.

At the same time, we have recognised that fire authorities already have a power to charge for dealing with the non-fire assistance rendered at such an incident, although to the best of our knowledge they have not made use of it. The order-making provision in clause 19 will allow us to ensure that there is no move towards charging for road traffic accidents or other incidents without further detailed consultation, while preserving the principle of being able to charge for such incidents if it is appropriate. That is entirely consistent with my explanation that we are simply preserving the status quo.

It is pure scaremongering on the part of the Opposition to imply that we intend to sting motorists. We have no such intention. As I have emphasised, we are simply preserving the status quo. What we will not do is rule out any arrangements similar to those operated by ambulance trusts to recover some costs in some circumstances—generally, of course, from insurers. That policy might come forward as a result of further consideration. We certainly would not want to rule it out if there were strong, sensible reasons for adopting it. We have no plans to do so; it is not part of our agenda, but we will not rule out arrangements that might command support in the wider fire community.

I am not clear why the Opposition believe that, in all cases, including those where there is clear fault, the cost of dealing with such incidents should always be borne by the taxpayer rather than the responsible party. That is a recipe for increasing the costs to be met by council tax payers. People thinking about factors behind rising council tax will draw conclusions from the Opposition's stance on the issue. Conservatives Members may complain about council tax levels, but in trying to make it impossible for fire and rescue services to recover the costs of certain incidents, some of which I shall explore in a moment, they are essentially proposing the transfer of costs in some circumstances from the polluters, insurers or parties responsible for those costs to the general taxpayer. I should not have thought that such a principle would be easy for Conservatives to defend in the wider debate about keeping down council tax. I look forward to engaging with them in that debate.

[Mr. Raynsford]

The hon. Member for Runnymede and Weybridge may claim that we are proposing changes that could result in considerable increases in insurance premiums for 27 million motorists, but I must tell him, as I did in Committee, that Transport 2000 has estimated that the impact on the average premium of arrangements to mirror those operated by the NHS would be around £3 a year. He is really wide of the mark in scaremongering on that.

The recent Select Committee report on the fire service noted the potential for authorities to recover from compensators the costs of dealing with traffic accidents in a manner similar to that in the NHS. We believe that further work is needed on how any such scheme might operate for the fire and rescue service, and on the impact that it would have on authorities, the insurance industry and the public. Those further investigations should be conducted before any proposal is made, let alone introduced. In the light of that, we do not think that it would be appropriate to close off the possibility of charging, as countenanced in new clause 4. I hope that that gives my hon. Friend the Member for Stroud (Mr. Drew) the reassurance that he is seeking. We certainly have no plans to extend charging for services delivered by fire and rescue authorities, but we are aware that some authorities currently levy charges for certain activities and we are certainly not going to cut off those options arbitrarily, as the new clause proposes.

We are equally aware that some fire and rescue authorities have given thought to when they might wish to charge for various activities. The independent report on the fire service—the Bain report—gave some impetus to that thinking. Any such proposal should be very carefully evaluated from an operational and a financial point of view, and we should consider taking it forward only if its introduction could be carried through without in any way compromising public safety. Public safety will always remain our absolute priority and the overriding consideration. Nevertheless, we certainly would not want to close off options entirely.

Mr. Drew: I am largely reassured, but let me give the Minister one example of how we could get into difficulty. On nice summer afternoons, at the many fêtes and bazaars that we all attend and open, there is often a fire engine, which is usually popular with children. We will surely never get into the realms of charging for the presence of such appliances, which is often the most effective education about the fire service. That is the danger if we consider charging for things that are not deemed emergencies. Will my right hon. Friend clarify that?

Mr. Raynsford: I am sure that we would want fire and rescue authorities to continue precisely such activities free of charge for public education purposes, but my hon. Friend will know that fire and rescue services might be asked to provide water-pumping facilities for some commercial activity, for which it is entirely reasonable to recover a charge. We would not want to rule that out. If authorities are not promoting public safety but providing a useful ancillary service, recovering costs would be entirely proper and reasonable.

I put it to the hon. Member for Runnymede and Weybridge that the range of incidents that may fall within the provisions of clause 9 is not confined simply to the new terrorist threat. It can include major incidents of flooding or damage caused by accidental or negligent discharge by a company of a large volume of harmful chemicals. New clause (1)(c) would exclude such incidents from the scope of charging. Is it right that a major commercial undertaking that is responsible for massive pollution and consequent disruption should escape any possibility of being charged for the work of the fire and rescue service in dealing with such an incident? What message would such a prohibition on cost recovery give to potential polluters and to council tax payers? Is the hon. Gentleman so confident that, as he said, it is unthinkable for charges to be levied in such circumstances? If so, would the Opposition spokesman for environmental protection agree?

The hon. Gentleman and the right hon. Member for Wokingham asked about the possibility of charging in an emergency. There is absolutely no intention of charging to extract payment before taking emergency action to save life or prevent serious harm. On the possibility raised by the hon. Gentleman that, owing to the Government amendment, a road traffic accident victim would hope that the fire service would attend first, neither the fire and rescue service nor the ambulance service charges for medical assistance. The ambulance service charges for conveyance to hospital. That is its appropriate role, and not one for the fire and rescue service.

Mr. Redwood: Will the Minister write that assurance into the Bill so that all can see that authorities will never charge in such circumstances?

Mr. Raynsford: That assurance has been given on the Floor of the House and previously, and will remain the case. The right hon. Gentleman knows, as he referred to it, that the Bill contains powers under which the Secretary of State must authorise any extension of charging, so if there were any question of varying from that principle, we would be open immediately to scrutiny of whether we were upholding it.

I understand that Conservative Members may fear that every person unfortunate enough to suffer a tidal surge may find themselves confronted with a bill for pumping out, but in many cases such people will have building and contents insurance. If it is felt appropriate to charge for such activity, clause 19(3) might be used to allow authorities to recover from insurers the costs of responding to flooding incidents.

Mr. Hammond: The Minister is talking about pumping out. Is he giving a categorical assurance that the powers will never be used to levy a charge for rescuing people from flooded buildings?

Mr. Raynsford: Yes.

Mr. Hammond: Will the Minister give a similar categorical assurance that the provisions will never be used to levy a charge for rescuing people from cars after a road accident?

Mr. Raynsford: I have already made that absolutely clear and I am happy to do so again. As I have repeatedly said, all that we are doing is preserving the status quo under which, as the hon. Gentleman knows because he has studied the matter carefully, the 1947 Act, which prohibits charges, applies only to the extinguishment of fires. As he rightly pointed out, there is scope for charging for other services. In general, fire and rescue authorities have not levied charges—some have for certain activities—and we are not intending to cut across those arrangements. We are implementing a framework that will ensure that, if there are to be charges for any service, they should be determined by the Secretary of State and subject to the Secretary of State's agreement by order, which can be considered by this House. That is the proper and necessary safeguard.

Mr. Hammond rose—

Mr. Raynsford: I ask the hon. Gentleman to bear with me and to listen. It has always been our intention that there should be no question of charging for rescuing people from road traffic accidents or, indeed, from life-threatening situations, including flooding.

New clause 4(2) is designed to ensure that fire and rescue authorities are not empowered to charge for providing emergency medical assistance where there is no corresponding power for an NHS ambulance trust to impose such a charge. I agree with the sentiment behind the provision. In Committee, I offered to table an amendment to that effect if the hon. Gentleman would accept that there were situations in which it was right for fire authorities to levy charges. He declined my offer. I think that he is wrong, but I have tabled the amendment none the less and in terms that offer greater reassurance to the public than would his own, which I ask him to withdraw.

Government amendments Nos. 12 and 13 correct an omission from the Bill. The 1947 Act was amended, with effect from September 2003, to allow fire and rescue authorities to charge for firefighting activities at sea. The power of an authority to respond to such a request for assistance had been introduced under the Merchant Shipping and Maritime Security Act 1997. The 1947 Act as originally enacted did not allow for a charge to be made for any firefighting purpose, but nor did it enable an authority to use its resources to assist in dealing with a fire offshore. There was considerable concern among salvage operators that such a power should exist and they and marine insurers were content to bear the cost. It is not surprising that they should prefer to pay for a service that an authority was not obliged to provide than risk the total loss of a vessel. It is right that the Bill should contain a similar provision and that the cost of such an intervention should not be expected to fall on the budget of an authority as a normal expense.

The hon. Member for Runnymede and Weybridge mentioned the channel tunnel. As I pointed out in Committee, the tunnel is in the happy position of being notionally part of Kent for firefighting purposes—it is not treated as a place under the sea. The Government amendment makes no change to that conceptually difficult position.

Government amendment No. 12 also fulfils an offer made in Committee and goes further than the amendment tabled there by the hon. Gentleman. It prohibits charging for any emergency medical assistance and requires no linkage to NHS arrangements. I commend the Government amendments to the House.

Mr. Hammond: I have sought to protect the interests of 27 million motorists in Britain, but must admit that I have been clearly trumped by the hon. Member for Hayes and Harlington (John McDonnell) defending the interests of animal lovers in Britain. God knows how many millions of those there are—certainly more than there are motorists.

I am not entirely clear about what the Minister just said. I sought a commitment that the powers under clause 19 would never be used to authorise charging for the discharge in an emergency of any of the statutory functions of a fire and rescue authority, and I thought that the right hon. Gentleman confirmed that in the last few minutes of his speech. If he can now confirm that he will never, in any circumstances, use clause 19 to authorise charging in an emergency for the discharge of any of the statutory functions of a fire and rescue authority, I shall be happy to withdraw the new clause.

Mr. Raynsford: No, I cannot do so. As I clearly explained, we can envisage emergencies, such as pollution incidents, arising in circumstances in which we believe it would be entirely appropriate to charge. My point, which I repeat, is that we do not in any circumstances envisage fire and rescue services failing to take action to rescue someone in an emergency, such as road traffic accident or flooding, simply because a charging regime has been introduced. That is unthinkable. The services will rescue people immediately—that will be their primary priority. If there were a charging regime, that would come into effect afterward, but it would certainly not affect the decision on whether to effect a rescue.

Mr. Hammond: The Minister has clearly been called to order by voices off. That is not what he said a few minutes ago, when I understood him to have given us the reassurance that we sought—that there would never be charges for emergency intervention. If he is saying only that the services will not ask for a credit card before carrying out the rescue, that is wholly inadequate.

On behalf of this country's 27 million motorists and all those who live in low-lying areas and have to worry about flooding, we seek an assurance that they will not be charged for the discharge in an emergency of the statutory functions of fire and rescue authorities. The Minister told my right hon. Friend the Member for Wokingham (Mr. Redwood) that it is difficult to square our insistence that emergency services be provided free with concerns about increasing council tax. I say to him that I suspect that most of our constituents would put emergency response in such situations very high on the list of things that they feel should be provided free of charge by a public service.

The Opposition believe that it is fundamentally wrong to introduce any possibility of charging for emergency response in the discharge of a statutory function. I urge my right hon. and hon. Friends to support the new clause and to protect motorists throughout the country.

Question put, That the clause be read a Second time:—

New Clause 5

REGIONAL MANAGEMENT STRUCTURES

'(1) The Secretary of State shall within 12 months of the coming into force of any part of this Act:

(a) commission an independent study to establish the optimum geographical areas within England for the organisation of fire and rescue services; and

(b) commission an independent study of the impact of any existing regional management structures on:

(i) operational effectiveness of fire and rescue services, and

(ii) cost-effectiveness of fire and rescue services, and

(iii) management capability of fire and rescue authorities.

(2) Upon receipt of the reports of the studies referred to in subsection (1), the Secretary of State shall cause those reports to be published.'.—[Mr. Hammond.]

Brought up, and read the First time.

Mr. Hammond: I beg to move, That the clause be read a Second time.

Madam Deputy Speaker: With this it will be convenient to discuss the following:

New clause 9—Limitation on power of Secretary of State to appoint members of a combined fire and rescue authority—

'(1) Where a scheme made under section 2 provides for members of a combined fire and rescue authority to be appointed by the Secretary of State the provisions of this section shall apply.

(2) Before making an appointment to a combined fire and rescue authority the Secretary of State shall invite each of the existing authorities with power to appoint members to the combined fire and rescue authority to submit to him a list of nominees for consideration for appointment by the Secretary of State.

(3) The Secretary of State shall appoint from the lists of nominees received those persons who appear to him to be best qualified to serve as members of the combined fire and rescue authority unless there are an insufficient number of persons on the lists appearing to the Secretary of State to be suitable for appointment.

[Madam Deputy Speaker]

(4) If the Secretary of State considers that there are an insufficient number of suitable persons on the lists to make all the necessary appointments he shall advise each of the existing authorities of his reasons for considering each of their unsuccessful nominees as unsuitable for appointment and shall indicate the qualities, experience and other relevant factors required for appointment by the Secretary of State in the particular case.

(5) Each of the existing authorities shall then be invited to submit a further list of nominees fulfilling the criteria set down in accordance with subsection (4) by the Secretary of State.

(6) Upon receipt of the further lists referred to in subsection (5) the Secretary of State shall appoint from the lists those persons who appear to him to be best qualified to serve as members of the combined fire and rescue authority.

(7) If there are insufficient numbers of persons appearing to the Secretary of State to be suitably qualified for appointment on the lists submitted, the Secretary of State may appoint such other persons as he considers suitable to fill any remaining vacancy.

(8) On the occurrance of any casual vacancy for membership of a fire and rescue authority which falls under the terms of the scheme to be filled by an appointment by the Secretary of State the procedure set out in subsections (2) to (7) shall apply.'.

Amendment No. 21, in clause 2, page 2, line 14, after 'Act', insert

'that one or more fire and rescue authorities are failing to discharge their duties and this Act and'.

Amendment No. 14, in page 2, line 16, leave out from 'area' to end of line 18.

Amendment No. 3, in page 2, line 17, leave out from 'constitutes' to end of line 18 and insert

'an area identified by the study published by the Secretary of State in accordance with section [regional management structures] as an optimum geographical area for the organisation of fire and rescue services.'.

Amendment No. 22, in page 2, line 18, at end insert—

(c) that a draft scheme has been submitted to him by two or more existing authorities and it appears to the Secretary of State that for the purposes of this Act, in the interests of greater economy, efficiency and effectiveness, there should be a single fire and rescue authority for the combined area.'.

Government amendments Nos. 7 and 8.

Amendment No. 23, in clause 3, page 3, line 40, leave out 'half' and insert 'one third'.

Government amendments Nos. 9 to 11.

Mr. Hammond: This wide-ranging group of amendments deals with combined fire authorities and much more besides. New clause 5 is drawn widely and touches on all fire authorities in England with the exception of the London Fire and Emergency Planning Authority. It addresses the compulsory and arbitrary regionalisation of fire and rescue services on the basis of the existing regional development agency or Government office regions. The Select Committee looked at the Government's proposals on regionalisation and said in paragraph 81 of its report:

"The draft Framework emphasises the importance of local solutions to local needs, and highlights that there is no national blueprint. Yet Fire Services and Authorities appear to have no choice about adopting a regional approach."

We have always accepted that there is a case for harvesting the efficiencies of co-operation by doing certain things at supra-brigade level, but that must be a bottom-up process that starts with individual fire authorities collaborating together, not a top-down process in which the Secretary of State directs fire authorities to work in certain ways. It must be driven, not by the Secretary of State's demands but by the accountability of fire and rescue authorities to local taxpayers and by their best-value obligations. That is already happening, but not necessarily on the geographical boundaries that Ministers seek.

We accept the case for common procurement to ensure interoperability and the need to co-ordinate the response to non-conventional threats at a higher level than that of the individual brigade. None of those arguments, however, points to the Government-dictated organisation of fire and rescue services along the geographical lines of Government office regions. Fire and rescue services are a local government function and, under modernisation, are charged with becoming more of a community service. They must be managed and run closer to, not further away, from the local community that they serve. We must never forget that even in the environment in which, sadly, we now find ourselves, at least 90 per cent. of a fire and rescue authority's work will continue to be performing community-based traditional roles as well as the new, important role of fire prevention and education.

The Government have not produced a shred of evidence to establish the benefit to public safety of choosing the structure of existing Government office regions as the basis for imposing regional management boards, the use of those regions as the basis for the combined fire authorities of the future or, indeed, the reduction of the 49 existing control rooms to just nine in England. The Select Committee report, with which the Minister will be familiar, makes that clear at paragraph 79, which states:

"The key argument in the White Paper for a regional approach appears to be cost efficiency".

It goes on to say at paragraph 80:

"The White Paper does not explain how a regional approach would improve public safety, and help Government achieve its Service Delivery Agreement targets. Nor does it provide evidence that a regional approach would reduce bureaucratic overheads."

We need convincing evidence that the regions chosen by the Government are the optimum regions for fire and rescue purposes and will not merely reduce costs but meet the Government's avowed criterion of improving public safety.

The report on control rooms does not look at the possibility of any other configuration of those rooms. If a control room can handle adequately the entire south-east of England, with a population of 8 million, why has the Minister not considered combining the north-east region with Yorkshire and the Humber to create a region with a population of about 7.5 million? The Government have not explained why is it right and appropriate to have one control room in the north-east region with a population of 2.5 million spread over 8,000 sq km, and one control room in the south-east region with a population of 8 million spread over 19,500 sq km?

Resilience, which the Minister often talks about, will be achieved by common equipment and operating standards. The reduction of 49 control rooms to nine is about saving costs. There is nothing wrong with saving costs—I am not suggesting for a moment that that is not a good objective—but it is not the Secretary of State's role to deal with such matters in a locally based, locally accountable service. He should deal with resilience, but economy of operation should be dealt with under the best-value arrangements and through the accountability of democratically elected fire and rescue authorities to their local electorates. The truth is that the Deputy Prime Minister has been scratching around to try to find some powers for his pet regional tier to counter the repeated accusation that it is a hollow promise or empty box. The fire and rescue services are being regionalised by stealth through the regional management boards, the inevitable withering of the management capability of individual fire and rescue authorities and by the regional fire authorities that the Secretary of State will impose on any region that elects to have a regional assembly in a referendum. Incidentally, that demonstrates the untruth of the Government's repeated statement that any extra powers given to elected regional assemblies will be handed down from central Government, not drawn up from local government. Those extra powers will clearly come from a diminution of local government power and responsibility.

It is not appropriate to organise a vital, front-line emergency service around the political whim of a politician. We will never accept that public safety should be subordinated to the Government's regional agenda through the imposition of a sub-optimal regional structure. I emphasise again that we object not to the introduction of a supra-brigade level for certain purposes but to the transparently political use of existing Government office regions—[Interruption.] The Minister says that it is a lot of nonsense, but he has not produced a shred of evidence to support the argument that those are the optimum regions for the operational delivery of fire and rescue services.

Mr. Raynsford: I repeatedly told the hon. Gentleman in Committee—I am surprised that he did not hear—that in each of the Government office regions we have regional resilience forums, which ensure that we have the best possible resilience to cope with terrorist threats and other emergencies. How can he possibly suggest that it does not make strong operational sense to align the boundaries of the fire and rescue services' work in that regard with those of the regional resilience forums?

Mr. Hammond: What the Minister is seeking to do is reorganise the work of fire and rescue authorities, 90 per cent.-plus of which will be carrying out the community-based role that they have to perform along Government office region lines. He has never sought to evaluate—I stand to be corrected if he can produce some evidence, but I have never seen it—the most appropriate geographical arrangements for the delivery of a supra-brigade level.

Mr. Raynsford: If the hon. Gentleman had read the White Paper, he would know that we spelled out very clearly a definition of what responsibilities needed to be discharged at a national level, a regional level and a local level, including the community fire safety work. That underpins our proposals.

Mr. Hammond: That is very interesting, but it does not answer the accusation that the regions that have been selected for political purposes are self-evidently not the most appropriate ones for the delivery of fire and rescue services.

Mr. Raynsford rose—

Mr. Hammond: If the Minister wishes to intervene again, perhaps he will explain why the most appropriate unit for organisation of the fire and rescue service in the north-east has a population of 2.5 million spread over 8,000 sq km, while in the south-west, it is a unit with a geographical extent of 23,000 sq km, and in the south-east, it is a unit with a population of 8 million.

Mr. Raynsford: I repeat to the hon. Gentleman that it is because it is essential for operational needs that there is clear contiguity between the regional resilience forums and the fire and rescue service. That is very much about public safety. Will he now please withdraw the entirely unjustified allegation that this is a political arrangement? It is not such an arrangement because it is about public safety and the best arrangements that we can make to guarantee us against the risk of terrorism and other serious incidents.

Mr. Hammond: I do not remember the Minister rushing to the Dispatch Box to withdraw the inappropriate accusation that he made against me earlier in the debate, and I did not press the point at the time. I shall not withdraw my concern that one of the driving forces for the Government in taking this route and using the organisational units is that that approach fits extremely well with another important political initiative by the Department—the promotion of the regional structure in Britain.

If the Minister were to commission from Mott MacDonald or whoever else an independent report of the sort suggested by new clause 5, asking what the optimal sub-national organisation of England would be—we are now talking only about England—for operational fire and rescue purposes, it is theoretically possible that the answer would be a structure of 8,000 sq km in the north-east and 23,000 sq km in the south-west, with 2.5 million people in the north-east and 8 million people in the south-east. However, I very much doubt that that would happen, as it flies in the face of all intuition and logic. In the absence of such a report, I am deeply sceptical. That is why new clause 5 seeks to require that an independent study be carried out on the optimal organisational units for fire and rescue purposes. If those units are the Government office regions, fine, but I am prepared to bet that an independent report would find otherwise.

The new clause would also require an independent study to be carried out on the impact of the existing regional structure. That will be a structure of regional management boards and any regional combined fire authorities that the Minister has created at the time when the study is conducted. That is the best that we can do within the structure of the Bill, as the regional management boards are not created by the provisions, but are part of the national framework document.

If the proposed reports were carried out, they would show whether there is a better way of organising supra-brigade level activity and whether the Government office regions structure is really a cost-effective way of organising fire and rescue services, as well as what impact it is having on fire and rescue authority management capability, which appears likely inevitably to wither as a result of the transfer of responsibilities up to regional management boards.

That process would be entirely objective. If the Minister is confident that the best interests of public safety are served by the Government office regions and that they are the best and most appropriate units of organisation, he has nothing to fear in accepting the new clause and commissioning an independent report, so that we can all see some independent underpinning of the Government's position and some basis for his repeated assertion, which flies in the face of intuition, that this structure of organisation has not been adopted because it ties in with the ODPM's other agenda of regional government. The public would then be able to see for themselves whether the structure is designed primarily to enhance public safety rather than to advance the Deputy Prime Minister's regional agenda.

Amendments Nos. 3 and 14 address another frankly outrageous or preposterous—I shall put it that way, as that is the Minister's favourite word—provision: clause 2(2)(b). That provision allows the Secretary of State to create new combined fire and rescue authorities if efficiency, effectiveness and economy demand that he does so. That is fine, but it is not the case if the combined fire and rescue authority that he wishes to create is one whose boundaries coincide with those of a regional development agency region. In that case, he does not have to demonstrate that creating the authority will be in the interests of efficiency, effectiveness and economy; he can proceed with no hurdles and no best value criteria to be met. That seems a scandalous misuse of public responsibility, and amendment No. 3 would allow a combined fire authority for a region to be created without hurdles only if it was for a region identified in the report that would be required under new clause 5 as an optimum region—a region that, by definition, is the most appropriate one for the delivery of fire and rescue services.

If the Government reject new clause 5, amendment No. 14 offers an alternative route, as it seeks to delete all together the special treatment for a regional combined fire authority and to make all new combined fire authorities subject to the criteria set out in clause 2(2)(a).

New clause 9 addresses a different issue. It seeks to limit one of the extraordinary powers of the Secretary of State under the Bill. The power to create a combined fire and rescue authority mirrors the power under the 1947 Act to create a combined fire authority, but the power to appoint 50 per cent. of the members of that authority, minus one, is new. While protesting that fire and rescue remain a local service, the Government are not only grafting on a regional structure, but displaying their usual centralising instinct by taking draconian powers to appoint the members. Deployment of the power will fundamentally alter the nature of democratic accountability in these local services. If the Secretary of State can deploy the power to appoint 49 per cent. of members, the political balance in a combined fire authority, which might be an elected regional assembly area fire authority, will always be capable of being overturned by the Secretary of State's appointments. That seems a step too far in what is still supposed to be a democratically accountable service.

The Secretary of State will say that he needs the power to appoint as a reserve power in case fire and rescue authorities do not nominate people of what he considers high enough calibre.

Mr. Raynsford: Yes.

Mr. Hammond: Well, that is a bit of an arrogance. These are democratically elected local authorities.

7.30 pm

Mr. Raynsford: The hon. Gentleman will recall that, on Second Reading, my hon. Friend the Member for Denton and Reddish (Andrew Bennett), the Chairman of the Select Committee, whose work the hon. Gentleman so frequently quotes, made very early the point that the calibre of members appointed to fire and rescue authorities was not always of the highest. Does he recognise that there may be some truth in that, and that if there is a problem, it is appropriate to think about how the calibre of fire authorities could be enhanced?

Mr. Hammond: The Minister puts his point in very reasonable terms, and if he listens, he will see that I recognise the possibility of his needing the reserve power. That does not alter the preposterousness of suggesting that whenever the electorate choose badly Ministers can intervene. Where will it end? If people choose duff councillors, does he want to be able to intervene and replace them? That is the clear implication. What about duff MPs? Those are not unknown. Does he want to intervene and appoint new Members of Parliament?

The Minister quoted the Select Committee Chairman on Second Reading and in Committee and said that he thought there was a problem, and I aired those concerns at the recent LGA fire conference—they did not go down very well with the local government members there.

New clause 9 sets out a procedure to ensure that any Secretary of State appointment is only a last resort, when no appropriate nominees are offered by the appointing authority. We may have an objection in principle to such a power of appointment, but the new clause is drafted in a spirit of compromise, recognising the argument that reserve powers may be needed. Combined fire authority members are appointed by the authorities that would be fire authorities if not for the existence of the combined fire authority. Under the new clause, in circumstances in which the scheme gives the Secretary of State powers to appoint, he has to exercise them by taking names from lists submitted to him by those underlying authorities. Furthermore, if he does not believe that there are sufficient suitable people on the list, he can specify reasons for rejecting any of the nominees and ask the authorities to submit a further list, reflecting criteria that he has set down in his rejection.

I honestly do not think that I could have been more accommodating in wording new clause 9. Only if the second set of lists that the Secretary of State receives from the appointing authorities contains insufficient numbers of what he believes to be suitable candidates can he use the reserve power to appoint someone who is not on a list. That introduces some objectivity, local input and transparency to the process, because he has to account for his rejections. As rejection can be made only on grounds of suitability, there is scope for a challenge to his decisions.

The Minister is no doubt preparing a defence that this is all impossibly complex and will take too long, but there is a good analogy with the arrangements in the Police and Magistrates' Courts Act 1994, under which the Secretary of State selects a shortlist from a longlist submitted to him by local bodies, and then refers that shortlist back to the police authority to make the final appointment: a three-stage process that has not proved impossibly cumbersome but ensures proper interaction between the powers of the Secretary of State and the important role of local stakeholders.

The Minister has made it clear that if an elected regional assembly is set up in any region, he will appoint a combined fire authority for that region. I understood him to intend that it would be members of the elected regional assembly who would effectively make up the combined fire authority, but clause 3(3)(a) refers only to "the appointment of members by the existing authorities"— that is, the existing fire and rescue authorities as defined in clause 1—

"or by the Secretary of State".

There is no reference to elected regional assemblies having the power to appoint. Will he clarify the mechanics? I hope that the idea is not that the Secretary of State will simply make the appointments on some informal consultation.

Government amendments Nos. 7 to 11 give effect to a concession that the Minister made in Committee. They impose a requirement for an inquiry prior to the creation of a new combined fire authority or the variation or revocation of an existing authority established under the 1947 Act, except where the underlying authorities are all in agreement, or the combined authority is created as a result of local government reorganisation, or the Minister considers that the need for reorganisation is urgent.

Of course we accept that things can be urgent and that circumstances can change quickly, but it is difficult to envisage a situation in which public safety would require a management restructuring without delay. The Secretary of State has many powers under the Bill to intervene in an emergency or where an authority is failing. He can direct them to do or not do things, to share equipment and to take responsibility for each other's functions. It is almost inconceivable that in a real emergency the solution would be to alter the management structure and change the shape of the authority. That cannot be done overnight, and frankly a new fire authority cannot be instantly effective just because a Minister says that it should be.

Does the Minister have examples that support the need for that final exemption from the requirement for a public inquiry? I should say, however, not to be churlish, that this concession is worth noting as one of the few positive changes that the Government have been prepared to accept, and we are grateful for what we consider a significant additional protection.

Amendment No. 21 would introduce a test of failure by a fire and rescue authority before the Secretary of State can create a combined authority. With the exception of the circumstances of local government reorganisation, which is a pretty big exception, I agree with what the hon. Member for Teignbridge (Richard Younger-Ross) is seeking to do through that amendment. I also agree that there is no such requirement in the Bill. However, the amendment does not address the fact that most if not all combined authorities to date have been created as a result of local government reorganisation, which clearly should be recognised.

The hon. Gentleman is right to point out that there is a difference between failing in discharging statutory functions and the Secretary of State perceiving that there may be additional things that could be done differently or something that he does not like about how the authority operates. It is a difference of degree, and intervention by the Secretary of State is appropriate in the one case but not in the other. I therefore have a great deal of sympathy with amendment No. 21.

Amendment No. 22 sets out the voluntary route to a combined fire authority. Let me put a difficult case to the hon. Member for Teignbridge. If an elected regional assembly were established in any of the English regions, some fire authorities in the region might try to create a combined authority as an alternative to a regional combined fire and rescue authority. How would the hon. Gentleman respond to such an initiative? Would he support it in the interests of localism or abandon Liberal Democrat principles of many years to support the party's more recent desire to snuggle up to the Government as they promote their regional agenda? Does he support local authorities' right to retain their independence if they choose to do that? Amendment No. 22 could be used to achieve that.

I hope that amendment No. 23 is not an attempt at compromise. If it is wrong for the Secretary of State to appoint half the members of an authority, it is wrong for the Secretary of State to appoint a third. Since I am feeling charitable, I shall interpret amendment No. 23 as being complementary to and not a substitute for new clause 9 so that when all its safety-net provisions were accepted, the hon. Gentleman would still like the Secretary of State to be limited to appointing a third of the members of a new combined fire authority. I hope that that interpretation is correct. I am sure that the hon. Gentleman will reassure hon. Members about that.

Richard Younger-Ross: First, let me emphasise that Liberal Democrats have a clear commitment to the regions. That is why we tabled an amendment in Committee to give broader powers to an elected regional assembly. We would give the powers for fire services to such an assembly. The Bill makes such provision for Wales but, sadly, the Government and Conservative Members decided to reject a measure to devolve power from the centre to the regions in England. As the hon. Member for Runnymede and Weybridge (Mr. Hammond) pointed out earlier, there is a tendency to take powers up to regional level rather than from the top down.

Mr. Hammond: We could not support the amendment that the hon. Gentleman tabled in Committee partly because it would have given each region a responsibility for preparing a national framework.

Richard Younger-Ross: It dealt with a regional framework, but there may have been glitches in the parliamentary language. The hon. Gentleman was always quick to point out that the Government have far more resources to spend on drafting than Conservative Members do. I never complained in Committee about our lack of resources or the Short money that the Conservative party receives to help it. I simply stress that it is important that powers come downwards and do not necessarily go upwards.

In the context of new clause 5, the hon. Member for Runnymede and Weybridge made some extremely good points about existing boundaries. The points that the Minister made in his interventions were not especially strong. Existing boundaries were established for entirely different purposes. Their use for constructing regional assemblies is a mistake. I shall not repeat previous arguments about the great variety of area sizes and populations.

When preparing for the Bill, I visited several fire authorities. One of the control centres emphasised to me why a single control room for a region the size of the south-west would be inappropriate. In one control room, a tape was played of a small boy who dialled 999 to say that he could smell smoke. His mother was asleep upstairs on the bed with the baby.

The controller asked the child where he lived. He could give the house name and the street name, but not the name of the town. The controller spent approximately 15 minutes talking matters through with the child. When the child named his school, the control room was able eventually to determine where the town was. It would be far harder for a single regional control room to work out such detail—not street names or the location of the chippie, as we discussed in Committee, but basic knowledge about where schools are—and thus identify the location of the incident. In the case that I mentioned, the child, the mother and the baby were all saved. I am not sure that that would have happened if there had been a regional control room.

Mr. Swire: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for giving way, especially as I have had to be absent from the Chamber for a little while, for which I apologise.

The hon. Gentleman makes a good point. When I visited the Devon fire rescue services centre, which he has visited often, I was impressed by its ability not only to locate a fire but to determine the equipment that was required to deal with it. For example, a specific number of vehicles and personnel would be sent to a burning timber yard. Of course, information is held on a computer, but local knowledge is also built up over many years. Anything that undermines that will disadvantage both the service and local people.

Richard Younger-Ross: The hon. Gentleman makes a good point well and I do not need to add to it. Conservative Members and Liberal Democrat Members accept that there does not necessarily have to be one control room to one authority, as currently happens. We accept that there might be some efficiency savings in combining some control rooms. However, the boundaries that the Government propose are fundamentally flawed. The Minister argued that there is currently a resilient regional network. That is a strong argument, but, if it is so strong, why will not he allow it to be tested? New clause 5 calls for a review—it states not that the boundaries should be changed but that they should be reviewed. If the review found that the Minister was correct, we would have to say, "Fair enough." However, he insists on forcing through inappropriate boundaries.

Let us consider amendments Nos. 21, 22 and 23. I thank the hon. Member for Runnymede and Weybridge for his broad support and I shall answer his questions. The Bill causes concern to the general public and especially those in the fire services because it states that "it appears to the Secretary of State that for the purposes of this Act, in the interests of greater economy, efficiency and effectiveness, there should be a single fire and rescue authority for the combined area".

People outside the Chamber may read into the phrase, simply economy savings. Those conditions are not strong enough to force authorities to combine. An authority should be forced to combine only if it is negligent or failing. Amendment No. 21 would ensure that authorities that function well could continue to provide the service that the public require. Only if they are failing will the Minister be able to cast them aside and force them to combine.

"greater economy, efficiency and effectiveness"

I take the point made by the hon. Member for Runnymede and Weybridge about reorganisation. In my haste to redraft clause 2, I assumed that, under clause 22, a combined authority would follow a voluntary request, as long as there had been a reorganisation. Perhaps something should have been added, but I think that clause 22 would cover the situation.

Clause 23 is complementary to new clause 9 rather than being an alternative. I think that new clause 9 has failings, but they are minor and not worth discussing in detail. The principles are broadly right.

The proposal in amendment No. 23 for "one third" rather than "half" is intended simply to limit the Secretary of State's powers. Let us suppose that he has decided to combine the authorities, and to appoint up to 49 per cent. of members. How easy would it be for those so appointed to find one person elected from the authorities to take their side? I suspect that it would not be very difficult—and if they could do it, in effect the Government would control the committee. Reducing the Secretary of State's say to a third would allow the Government to have a say, but would prevent them from controlling the authority. Local authorities must be trusted; if we cannot trust them, there is no point in having them. Democracy relies on that trust.

As for Government amendments 7 to 11, I too am thankful that there was something on which the Government were prepared to concede, and I am glad that it was a Liberal Democrat amendment, supported by the Conservatives. I am not sure whether they proposed the same amendment and it went in after ours, or whether they added their names to ours, but the fact remains that the need for change was accepted in principle.

The hon. Member for Runnymede and Weybridge made a very good point about the meaning of the word "urgent". I need to do some things urgently, but some things need to be done more urgently than others. The definition of the word "urgent" is like a piece of elastic. The Minister must tell us in what circumstances he would need an urgent management arrangement. Management reorganisation, by its very nature, takes time. I am not certain that urgency is required in this case. We will not be churlish, though. We are thankful for the concessions that have been made, although they may be small pickings.

Mr. Parmjit Dhanda (Gloucester) (Lab): I am going to be parochial, and talk about control rooms or call centres rather than the more general subject of regionalisation. Although the Bill does not refer to control rooms in depth, they are a constituency issue.

In some ways, Gloucestershire has been penalised for being somewhat ahead of the game. Not so many years ago, the thinking tended towards tri-service rather than regional arrangements. My right hon. Friend the Minister will know how difficult it was to get an arrangement up and running in Gloucestershire involving three services in one building, control rooms working together, and a level of integration that has not been achieved elsewhere in the country. I gather that as recently as last week there was an attempt to integrate the three services in Wiltshire, but so far it has not proved possible to integrate the fire service with the other two. In our case, members of the fire service said that the arrangement could prove difficult and dangerous, and there was even talk of loss of lives. I am pleased to say, however, that at local level all three services have been pragmatic enough not just to do this but to make it work, in a £6 million centre.

Mr. Hammond: The hon. Gentleman mentioned the threat of a loss of lives, but let us talk about loss of money for a moment. As far as he is aware, has anyone told the authorities in Gloucestershire and Wiltshire how they will cover their financial exposure to the tri-service control centres that they have set up, at the Deputy Prime Minister's exhortation, when the regional control rooms go ahead?

Mr. Dhanda: The hon. Gentleman is getting very excited. I shall deal with his point shortly.

It would be helpful to know whether the Minister can give Gloucestershire certain assurances, not least an assurance that the £6 million tri-centre building and its facilities will survive.

In Gloucestershire, the extent of integration has gone beyond call centres. We now have a tri-service workshop. The three services work together to ensure that their equipment, machinery and vehicles are worked on not by the same set of engineers but under the same roof. Much can be learnt from that model. We do not want the region to lose it. As the Minister knows, the services have also set up a "blue skies group", which thinks through problems and does what it can to bring about even more integration. I hope that before any decisions are made about regional control centres the Minister will visit that centre, and take a good look at it.

I am trying to be pragmatic, as the hon. Member for Teignbridge (Richard Younger-Ross) has been, especially in Committee. I note that, whether deliberately or otherwise, he proposes in amendment No. 22 the insertion of paragraph (c) in clause 2 in addition to paragraphs (a) and (b) rather than their replacement by it. In other words, he is creating circumstances in which a more regional or consolidated structure would exist. That is certainly pragmatic.

If a regional structure is adopted for call centres and control rooms, I do not think there is a better example of best practice in the south-west than what we have managed to achieve in our tri-service centre. I should be interested to hear the Minister's view on our chances of ensuring that it remains in Gloucestershire and that the three services can continue to learn from the three levels of integration. I think that Gloucestershire is an ideal location, given the way in which they have worked together and made things happen.

Mr. Drew: I entirely agree with my hon. Friend the Member for Gloucester (Mr. Dhanda) that there is no better place in which to continue the experiment than the Gloucester tri-service centre.

Let me repeat what I said on Second Reading. In many respects this has been seen as the most controversial part of the Bill. Although we had our differences in Committee and although there have been disagreements about emphasis, there has been a good deal of consensus. It is about evolving change, and the same is true outside of this place. Both management and those working in the service have to a large extent agreed on the best way to make progress.

However, this issue gives rise to some controversy, and I reiterate what I said on Second Reading. I have no fear about the way in which regional management boards would operate, in terms of the degree of strategic thinking and the need, in these days of terrorism and counter-terrorism, to consider how best we can operate and deploy our forces, but if we are talking about the making of decisions at a local level, the provision is not appropriate. Given the Gloucestershire experience—as my hon. Friend the Member for Gloucester said, the same attempt is being made elsewhere with varying degrees of success—it is somewhat short-sighted to throw everything away, in the hope that we can improve delivery by assuming that the regional structure is the only structure. There are all manner of problems in the south-west, but they are not just a south-west phenomenon; they are likely to arise elsewhere in the country. The strategic direction is right, but operational delivery, including the most important elements of call centre work, should remain as local as possible. We need also to consider how to improve the relationship between the three emergency services.

[Mr. Drew]

We must also consider the system of accountability. I make no apology for saying again that if we are to do the job properly, we must begin by considering the three emergency services with a blank sheet of paper. What is the best form of accountability? If the Opposition are arguing that accountability is best fulfilled through a modified police authority system, they can count me out because it does not work. We have too many authorities and in many respects we have the worst of all worlds. People are appointed as part of their county councillor functions, and magistrates are appointed through a system that anyone outside the political classes would find difficult to explain. Such authorities do not consist of happy people, and if Gloucestershire is anything to go by, the rate of inflation of police expenditure is far greater than that of any other authorities.

Mr. Hammond: All systems have their flaws, but is the hon. Gentleman suggesting that a police authority-style approach would work better if the Secretary of State simply appointed members, rather than receiving a long list from the local area and sending back a shortlist for local appointment?

Mr. Drew: What I am saying is that the proposed system—be it the Government's version or the Opposition's—is deeply flawed and is antagonising local people. The previous Conservative Government thought that they were being clever in taking the police out of local authorities' remits, but that decision has rebounded, in that there seems now to be a total lack of accountability to the wider populous.

We have an opportunity to consider how to deal with the three emergency services. If the Gloucestershire trust is anything to go by, we should consider the dilemma of the ambulance service. The Gloucestershire trust is the smallest trust. It is undermanned and underfinanced and regarded as very vulnerable. I urge the Government to consider carefully the arrangement between the three services in the context of our strategic direction. It will not help if we simply assume that fire authorities will deliver better services, while allowing the other two emergency services to drift in the wind. That is not acceptable. It will not constitute good delivery or build good relationships, and it will lead to greater confusion.

Mr. Raynsford: This has been an interesting debate on an even more interesting group of new clauses and amendments, which deal with combined fire and rescue authorities.

In order to understand part of the overall intention of new clause 5, which was tabled by the hon. Member for Runnymede and Weybridge (Mr. Hammond), it must be read in conjunction with amendment No. 3. It seeks to turn the clock back on the modernisation agenda, and to delay the action that both the Bain report and the White Paper argued were long overdue. I shall deal separately with two strands of the argument, the first of which is the impact of new clause 5(1)(a) in conjunction with amendment No. 3. The overall effect would be simple. First, it would remove clause 2(2)(b), which allows fire and rescue authorities to be combined so that their boundaries align with those of the English regions, and replace it with a requirement that within 12 months of any part of the Bill being enacted, an independent study be commissioned into the "optimum geographical areas" for organisation of the fire and rescue service.

Mr. Hammond: The Minister is surely wrong about that. All that amendment No. 3 does is to remove the exemption for CFAs that constitute a region coterminous with regional development agency regions, in order to satisfy the criteria under clause 2(2)(a). If the Minister is proposing a CFA for an RDA region and it meets the criteria under clause 2(2)(a), he has no difficulty.

Mr. Raynsford: My understanding is that amendment No. 3 would substitute the concept of a region as constituted for the purposes of regional development agencies legislation—in other words, a region as defined in terms of Government office regions—with a body that has emerged from the hon. Gentleman's review of the optimum geographical areas. If I am incorrect in that assumption I shall withdraw my remark, but that is my understanding of the affect of his amendment, and I shall proceed on that basis, assuming that he concurs.

There are a number of things wrong with the proposal, the most important of which is that it appears to take little account of the explanation and assurances that I gave to the hon. Gentleman in Committee. During those discussions, I made it clear that the only circumstances in which I envisaged using the provisions of clause 2(2)(b) were ones involving public safety, in which the fire and rescue authorities had failed successfully to work together to ensure resilience. The obvious example of that is a failure to agree on the siting of, or the operational arrangements necessary for the introduction of, a regional control room.

The context is important, because contrary to the claims made by the Opposition in Committee, we do not have an agenda of regionalisation through the back door. What we do have is an agenda of civil resilience, to ensure that the fire and rescue service is equipped to meet the challenges posed by the new dimensions of the terrorist threat and environmental disasters. To meet these challenges, the service must be closely integrated into the work of the regional resilience teams, which are based in the Government offices for the regions. These teams, in their turn, operate on a regional basis because it is a key principle within emergency planning that response structures should mirror emergency planning structures.

I should tell the hon. Member for Runnymede and Weybridge and the hon. Member for Teignbridge (Richard Younger-Ross) that it is preposterous—to use the word that the former has used a lot today—to suggest that there should be separate regional structures for the fire and rescue service and for the regional resilience arrangements. That could not work. It would be neither effective nor sensible, and it would not give us the protection that we need.

We could no doubt debate at length whether the Government office boundaries established by the previous Administration, which underpin the whole infrastructure, were the right ones.

Mr. Hammond: The Minister says that it would be preposterous not to organise the fire and rescue services on the same geographical basis as the resilience structure. According to that logic, will we have regional police management boards and regional health service management boards?

Mr. Raynsford: No, the logic is that in terms of the geographical arrangement for the discharge of the responsibilities of the fire and rescue service, it is absurd to suggest another regional alignment that is entirely separate from the existing one. That would create confusion rather than coterminosity. I accept entirely that police authorities do not operate on that basis at the moment, but they are closely engaged in the regional resilience arrangements, and are putting arrangements in place to ensure that they can discharge their regional resilience responsibilities. As I have said, those are organised through the Government regional offices on the basis of the existing administrative regions—which, incidentally, were introduced by the Conservatives when they were in government.

On Second Reading on 26 January, the right hon. Member for Suffolk, Coastal (Mr. Gummer) acknowledged that the existing Government office regions were

"a compromise that fitted most of the Departments that then had regional organisations".—[Official Report, 26 January 2004; Vol. 417, c. 92.]

If we had time, an independent study such as that which the hon. Member for Runnymede and Weybridge suggests in new clause 5 might be an interesting activity in which to engage although, as he knows only too well, boundary debates tend to be long drawn out, fractious and unproductive. It is usually the Liberal Democrats who suggest such arrangements, which are a recipe for constant talk and debate, and no action. That is the key to why the hon. Gentleman has tabled the new clause. He wants long, protracted talk and delay, with no action, to avoid anything ever happening, because he is obsessed with the view that we are somehow committed to imposing regions by the back door, which is all part of some kind of European plot.

Mr. Hammond rose—

Mr. Swire rose—

Mr. Raynsford: I see the lemmings rising as one to rush over the cliff in their Europhobia.

Mr. Hammond: I am stunned that the Minister has gone off at a tangent on a completely different subject. I was rising simply to ask him whether he would be good enough to acknowledge that the Government office regions were created for an entirely different purpose, and that no one ever asked whether they would be the most appropriate unit for the delivery of an operational fire and rescue service.

Mr. Raynsford: As the hon. Gentleman knows only too well, the Government office regions were established by the previous Government on the basis—as I have quoted his right hon. Friend the Member for Suffolk, Coastal as recognising—that they were a compromise that fitted most of the Departments that then had regional organisations. Since then, they have developed considerably. They have taken on new functions, and new institutions have been created, such as regional development agencies, that follow the same regional boundaries. We are seeing a consolidation of arrangements within those regional structures and, most importantly, regional resilience is being organised on that basis. We have had the regional resilience forums for almost a year now. They are based in the Government offices, and it would be wholly counterproductive now to suggest alternative boundaries for one element—one emergency service—with an important contribution to make to that overall resilience.

Mr. Hammond rose—

Richard Younger-Ross rose—

Mr. Raynsford: I shall give way first to the hon. Member for Runnymede and Weybridge and then to the hon. Member for Teignbridge.

Mr. Hammond: The Minister says that we are seeing a consolidation of regional functions within those regional boundaries. A moment ago he denied that any regionalisation by stealth was taking place, but we see that consolidation as being precisely such regionalisation by stealth.

Mr. Raynsford: The hon. Gentleman must not confuse two matters. He will recognise that there has been administrative regionalisation, which his party, when in government, introduced on a substantial scale and which this Government have consolidated. A separate issue is the introduction of elected regional assemblies to allow a democratic—

Mr. Hammond: What about RDAs?

Mr. Raynsford: I have already said that we introduced regional development agencies, which consolidated the arrangements operating on a regional basis that the Conservative party set up. The Conservatives seem absolutely hellbent on disowning their own legacy, the things they thought appropriate when in power. That is an interesting insight, but I tell the hon. Gentleman once again that there is no agenda to impose elected regional assemblies by stealth. If people vote for them, there will be elected regional assemblies; if they do not, there will not be. What a marked contrast that is—

Mr. Swire rose—

Mr. Raynsford: I shall not give way to the hon. Gentleman at the moment, because I have already said that I will give way to the hon. Member for Teignbridge. I shall give way to him later, but I just want to make this point. As the hon. Member for Runnymede and Weybridge would do well to remember, his party did not give people any choice. It abolished regional tiers of government such as the Greater London council and some county councils, giving people absolutely no say. This Government are giving people choice. If they vote in favour of the regional assemblies, that will be their choice, and it is quite right that we should honour it.

Richard Younger-Ross: I shall not get drawn into the regional assembly argument at the moment. The Minister mentioned delay, and said that he opposed the Conservative new clause 5 and amendment No. 3 because they would cause a delay in forming combined fire authorities. Is there something that the Minister needs to tell us? If he is talking of a delay, that must mean that he is thinking of combining fire authorities now. Is that the case, and which fire authorities is he thinking of combining?

Mr. Raynsford: The hon. Gentleman has got that wrong. I have already made it quite clear that the only circumstances in which we would use the clause 2(2)(b) powers—I said this about 10 minutes ago—would be in the interest of public safety where there had been a failure to put in place adequate arrangements to ensure regional resilience. That is an issue of public safety, and in those circumstances, we clearly could not delay while there was a long-drawn-out debate about the optimal regional boundaries. There would be an overriding priority to provide effective arrangements to ensure that the resilience that we have been talking about was in place. I hope that the hon. Gentleman recognises that.

Richard Younger-Ross rose—

Mr. Raynsford: I have undertaken to give way to the hon. Member for East Devon (Mr. Swire), but I shall give way once more to the hon. Member for Teignbridge.

Richard Younger Ross: I am sorry, but the Minister has mentioned delay. New clause 5 calls for a review of the boundaries within 12 months. The Minister appears to be saying that he can envisage a circumstance in which the resilience is deemed not to be in place and, within 12 months, he will therefore be forcing a combination of authorities.

Mr. Raynsford indicated dissent.

Richard Younger-Ross: The Minister is shaking his head. If that is not the case, he cannot use the excuse that the proposal in new clause 5 would delay the process.

Mr. Raynsford: No, I am afraid to say that the hon. Gentleman is getting more confused. We have said clearly that we will use the powers in clause 2(2)(b) only in the interests of public safety where there has been a failure to put in place arrangements that guarantee resilience. Those are the only circumstances in which we will use those powers, and if we have to use them, it is important that we should do so reasonably swiftly. I should have thought that the hon. Gentleman would agree with that. The amendment and new clause, however, would essentially mean that no progress could be taken until the body that was carrying out the independent review had not only been set up but had reported. As the new clause allows only that that would be set up within 12 months of the Bill's receiving Royal Assent, there could be years of delay during which there were inadequate public safety arrangements in a particular region. I cannot believe that the hon. Gentleman is seriously advocating that we should tolerate that position.

Mr. Hammond rose—

Mr. Raynsford: I have undertaken to give way to the hon. Member for East Devon, but I shall then give way to the hon. Member for Runnymede and Weybridge.

Mr. Swire: I am grateful, and I shall try to be quick. The Minister is entirely right in saying that people will be consulted democratically on whether they want regional assemblies, and I do not take issue with that. However, he does not say whether, if people vote against having elected regional assemblies, the Government will give them the option of disbanding the existing unelected regional assemblies. Will he assure us that, should people not vote for elected regional assemblies, there will be an option of doing away with the unelected regional assemblies?

Mr. Raynsford: That question is very wide of what we are debating tonight, and I think that you would call me to order, Mr. Deputy Speaker, if I moved into that territory. We have already made it quite clear that we will follow the views of the electorate on elected regional assemblies and that there will not be an assembly if the electorate vote against it. There will then be a continuation of the status quo.

Mr. Hammond: The Minister has been very generous in giving way. Given that he has been prepared to state categorically that he will use the powers in clause 2(2)(b) only in the event of a failure of regional resilience, how has he been able to give an unequivocal undertaking that if an elected regional assembly is created in any region, he will create a combined fire authority for that region? He cannot know in advance that the hurdle set by clause 2(2)(a) will be cleared.

Mr. Raynsford: No, but as I was intending to say to the hon. Gentleman later, the power to create a regional fire and rescue authority in the event of an elected regional assembly coming into existence will be provided in the relevant legislation—in the elected regional assemblies Bill. He will recall that in just the same way, the London Fire and Emergency Planning Authority—LFEPA—was established under the Greater London Authority Act 1999, which created the Greater London authority. That is the appropriate way of establishing such bodies, but it would not happen under these powers.

I hope that that puts the hon. Gentleman's mind at rest. I realise that he is living in a realm of paranoia because of the word "region" and the effect that it has on his party, but I assure him that there is clear logic behind our proposals, and that they fit together consistently.

Mr. Hammond: It is not paranoia; it is just a concern about the propriety of the Government giving unequivocal commitments that they will do something that, on the Minister's own admission, they do not even have the power to do. They are depending on some future legislation to give them that power.

Mr. Raynsford: As the hon. Gentleman knows only too well, we have published a White Paper and given a commitment to publish draft legislation, which we hope to do in July this year. There will also be a vote in a referendum at some subsequent date, probably in October. That, of course, is dependent on good progress being made with the other matters that have to be dealt with before the referendums can take place.

We have strayed far from the provisions of the Bill, and I would like to come back to the matters in hand. I have given assurances about the use of clause 2(2)(b); they are on the record. If we need to act on grounds of public safety, it will by definition be something that has to be done quickly, so I cannot accept the constraint that subsection (1)(a) and amendment No. 3 would place on the ability of the Secretary of State to take urgent action to protect the public.

Subsection (1)(b) has a rather different objective from subsection (1)(a). It seeks again to require the Secretary of State to commission an independent study, but this time into the success of regional management boards—including, if I read the intent of the hon. Gentleman correctly, any negative impact on the management capability of individual authorities of having some of their functions pooled at regional level. Here, I can reassure him that we are thinking along similar lines.

Of course any responsible Government will want to assess and evaluate the impact of their policies, including those required under the fire and rescue national framework. But the independent evaluation that the hon. Gentleman suggests need not await a study commissioned "within 12 months of the coming into force of any part of this Act".

That role has already been given to the independent Audit Commission, which has agreed to take on the task. Indeed, it has already published, on 25 February, a consultation paper setting out its draft comprehensive performance assessment framework for fire and rescue authorities. It proposes to implement the framework early next year, with outcomes publicly reported before autumn 2005.

As the hon. Gentleman would expect, value for money will of course be to the fore, but the commission also specifically plans to assess the effectiveness of the work undertaken through regional management boards and to report on the management capability of individual fire and rescue authorities. It plans, in other words, to address the very issues about which he expressed concern, and it plans to address them sooner rather than, as the amendment envisages, later. Additionally, we are required by clause 24 to report periodically to Parliament on the delivery of the national framework, which of course includes regional collaboration. There will therefore be every opportunity for Parliament to keep a close watch on this matter. Because they are on the one hand damaging, and on the other unnecessary, I therefore ask the hon. Gentleman not to press his new clause and the linked amendment to a vote.

Mr. Hammond: Will the Minister explain to the House what form that reporting to Parliament will take?

Mr. Raynsford: As the hon. Gentleman knows, we are committed to report on the national framework and to lay it before Parliament. Indeed, any significant amendments to it will be laid before Parliament as well. It will of course be open to Parliament to decide how, or if, it wishes to take these matters up and to scrutinise them. I have no doubt that the Select Committee may wish to consider some of the issues involved; it has shown a keen interest in them. Indeed, it will also be open to Opposition parties to seek debates on relevant matters if they choose to do so.

Turning to new clause 9, also tabled by the hon. Gentleman, we find a solution in search of a problem. It sets out in elaborate detail a process for the appointment of members of fire and rescue authorities when the Secretary of State chooses to exercise the power in clause 3(3)(a). I am not going to dwell too long on the detail of that process, although I point out in passing that it could involve no fewer than six distinct stages, and that at its heart is a transparent attempt to create a stand-off between individual fire and rescue authorities and the Secretary of State over who should form their number.

Instead, I shall focus on the substance. The issue of Secretary of State appointments was debated in Committee, although, as I recall, debate was curtailed when the hon. Gentleman moved rather swiftly to a vote. I acknowledged then that there were concerns, but I emphasised that the motivation was not to enhance central control but to improve the delivery of a vital public service. Clause 3(4) makes it clear that Secretary of State appointees—if they are made—will be a numerical minority, and will not be allowed to take part in votes on precepting. Only elected members will be able to make decisions about how resources are allocated.

When appointment is considered necessary, however, those elected members will make decisions with the benefit of expertise that they themselves may not possess. I was frank and honest in Committee that, when combination is undertaken to tackle failing authorities it could well, in our view, be contradictory and counter-productive to restrict appointments to existing authority members. When capacity is needed to deliver improvements and modernisation, clause 3 could be used to bring into the new authorities the wider experience and expertise—be it managerial, financial or professional—that the existing authorities may lack. But to guarantee that the experts will be chosen for their ability, these will be open, advertised appointments made in accordance with the principles of public life that underpin the code of practice of the Commissioner for Public Appointments. Thus they will be made on merit, with openness and transparency and with full regard to equal opportunities. But in line with the seventh principle, they will also be proportional; they will not involve the endless to-ing and fro-ing advocated in new clause 9.

Given all those safeguards, it should be clear to the House that we will use the power carefully and responsibly—if ever we come to use it. I must once again stress that we have these powers available only for circumstances in which there may be a failing authority and it is necessary to achieve a combination to tackle the problems relating to it, and when sufficient expertise is not otherwise available.

Mr. Hammond: The Minister describes this as a reserved power, but does he envisage that power being built into the scheme for the CFA, so that, if there were to be a 49 per cent. Secretary of State appointment, it would be within the scheme rather than applying only in specified circumstances—for example, when the CFA has demonstrated a failure such as that of which the Minister speaks?

Mr. Raynsford: As I have already made very clear, these are reserve powers that we would use only in certain rather limited circumstances. It is certainly not our intention to put a scheme in place that would provide for such arrangements to be made according to a prearranged plan. As the hon. Gentleman knows only too well, we have set maximum limits on the number of appointees. That does not mean that we would appoint that number of people, however. In certain cases, it might be appropriate to make only a very small number of appointments—if, for example, there were a serious weakness in terms of financial expertise or expertise in another area of responsibility regarded as very important. That would, however, be judged on a case-by-case basis. So far as the elected regional assemblies are concerned, arrangements for the appointment of the members of the regional fire authority will be contained in the legislation that brings the assemblies into existence.

Amendment No. 14 repeats one that the hon. Member for Runnymede and Weybridge tabled in Committee and was rejected. Indeed it repeats something that he earlier tried to achieve through new clause 5 and its linked amendment No. 3. Amendment No. 14 seeks to remove the current clause 2(2)(b), which allows fire and rescue authorities to be combined so that their boundaries are aligned with those of the English regions. As I said earlier, in tabling it again, the hon. Gentleman appears to have taken little account of the explanation and assurances that I gave him during our exchanges in Committee. I made it clear that the only circumstances in which I envisaged using the provisions of clause 2(2)(b) were ones of public safety.

Mr. Hammond: I apologise to the Minister. When I intervened on him earlier to make a point about amendment No. 3, I was of course referring to amendment No. 14. I had got myself confused between the two. Given what he has just said, can he envisage any circumstances in which he could not do what he has just described under the powers granted to him in clause 2(2)(a)? Surely, in circumstances in which public safety required a CFA to be created urgently, it would be in the interests of greater efficiency and effectiveness, if not economy, to use those powers. Is it not the truth that clause 2(2)(b) is simply redundant?

Mr. Raynsford: No, it is not. It is available only in limited circumstances, but it is very important because one can envisage circumstances in which existing fire and rescue authorities were operating with a reasonable degree of economy, efficiency and effectiveness but had failed to come together on the resilience issues in a way that ensured an effective arrangement at regional level to provide the resilience that we are seeking. In those circumstances, it would be necessary for us to act in the interests of public safety.

The hon. Gentleman mentioned public safety issues, and I have just highlighted some of those. An example that I have often cited, which any Secretary of State would need to take very seriously indeed, would be a failure to agree on the siting of or operational arrangements for regional control rooms. I emphasise again that this is not a cavalier provision and that my assurances about its use are on the parliamentary record. On the basis of those assurances, I ask the hon. Gentleman to withdraw his proposal.

8.30 pm

Amendment No. 21, tabled by the hon. Member for Teignbridge, is designed to limit the use of clause 2(2)(a)—but, strikingly, not the use of clause 2(2)(b), about which he appears to have less concern—to circumstances in which one or more of the authorities concerned are failing to discharge their duties. Clause 2 as currently drafted provides the Secretary of State with the power to combine existing fire and rescue authorities into a larger single authority in the interests of greater economy, efficiency and effectiveness. In doing so, it accepts that the work of the fire and rescue service—work to which I have paid tribute on many occasions—must be performed effectively, but acknowledges that it must also be performed as economically and efficiently as possible. It is the council tax payer who funds a significant proportion of the cost of the service; it is the general taxpayer, through central Government, who funds the rest.

It is perfectly possible—indeed, independent studies confirm it—that we might have an excellent, responsive service at a local level costing significantly more than an equally excellent and responsive service elsewhere. If combination can maintain that quality at a lower cost to the taxpayer, freeing up moneys to be reinvested in fire prevention work and the promotion of community fire safety, I doubt that many in the House would wish to prevent it, but amendment No. 21 would. It says that there must first be a failing authority—one not performing its legal duties—before a larger unit can be created.

The case for combination, may be based not on failure, but on the proven ability of larger authorities to rise to the challenge of delivering the best service for the lowest cost. The Secretary of State still needs to make that efficiency case, not least at the inquiry that we will now be holding in response to the hon. Gentleman's persuasive arguments in Committee to the effect that an inquiry should be mandatory. On his restrictive and counter-productive amendment, however, we are not persuaded, and I ask him to withdraw it.

Amendment No. 22, also proposed by the hon. Member for Teignbridge, appears to be the product of a misunderstanding. The Bill as currently drafted allows the Secretary of State under clause 2(2)(a) to make a combination order on the grounds of economy, efficiency and effectiveness. Such an order may, among other things, give effect to a draft scheme submitted by the existing authorities themselves under clause 2(3)(a). Amendment No. 22 would duplicate the meaning of those provisions read in tandem, and add nothing further. I therefore ask the hon. Gentleman to withdraw it.

Amendment No. 23 was tabled by the hon. Member for Teignbridge in Committee, but circumstances prevented us from debating it. Had we done so, I hope that I would have persuaded him that it amounts simply to an arbitrary and artificial restriction on the Secretary of State's ability to appoint the necessary expertise in situations where combination has been undertaken to tackle failing authorities.

Clause 3(4) already makes it clear that Secretary of State appointees to combined fire and rescue authorities will be a numerical minority, and clause 3(5) that they will not be allowed to take part in votes on precepting. As I have already said, Secretary of State nominees will be appointed only after open advertisement and in accordance with the code of practice of the Commissioner for Public Appointments. They will also be appointed solely on merit.

With all those safeguards, amendment No. 23 really does tilt at windmills. Ensuring that Secretary of State appointees are in a minority maintains the democratic principle that local representatives should have the final say in matters of disagreement. Restricting them to one third presupposes that our objective is to have as many as possible when, in fact, our intention is to have only as many as necessary. We no more wish to appoint 49 per cent. than 10 per cent. Rather we wish to ensure that combined authorities have the skills and expertise that they need to deliver a modernised and cost-effective service. I therefore hope that the hon. Gentleman will withdraw his amendment.

I now move on to Government amendments Nos. 7 to 11. Government amendments Nos. 7 and 8 fulfil a promise made in Committee. I said then that I would further consider an amendment from the hon. Member for Teignbridge that would have made an inquiry mandatory in every case where the Secretary of Sate proposes to create a combined fire and rescue authority or to vary or revoke a scheme creating one.

I explained that we were sympathetic to the underlying purpose of the amendment, and confirmed that it was our intention in normal circumstances to hold an inquiry, as well as carrying out the specific consultation required under clause 2(5). I also explained, however, that there might be circumstances in which the needs of public safety meant that we could not await the outcome of a potentially lengthy inquiry before taking action.

The example that I gave—and have repeated today—was fire and rescue authorities failing successfully to work together to meet the demands of civil resilience by establishing a regional control room. I therefore undertook to find a form of words that embodied the spirit of the amendment while ensuring that the needs of public safety remained paramount. That is what we have tabled today. As well as an exemption for public safety, it exempts from a mandatory inquiry situations in which those affected by the Secretary of State's proposals are happy with them and those where the combination, variation or revocation is simply a consequence of a wider local or regional government boundary change. In all other cases, an inquiry will now be the norm. I hope that hon. Members will welcome the steps that we have taken to accommodate the wishes of the Standing Committee.

Mr. Hammond: Something registered an alarm bell there. The Minister spoke of what would happen as a result of a local or regional government boundary changes. My interpretation was that the Government amendment referred to local government boundary changes undertaken under the Regional Assemblies (Preparations) Act 2003 rather than to the regional boundary changes themselves. I had interpreted the provision as meaning that things could proceed where there was a change in local government boundaries—nothing to do with regions.

Mr. Raynsford: I think that the hon. Gentleman is right, and I will certainly check it. The wording is quite technical, so I will write to him about the point.

Government amendments Nos. 9 to 11 also fulfil a promise that I made in Committee to reflect further on the circumstances in which holding an inquiry might not be possible or appropriate. The amendments apply to existing combination schemes—that is, schemes made under the Fire Services Act 1947. I have already outlined our approach towards new schemes and to their future variation or revocation.

As with Government amendments Nos. 7 and 8, an inquiry will now be the norm. The only exceptions—I trust that they are not now contentious—are an exemption for public safety, an exemption in situations where those affected by the Secretary of State's proposals are happy with them, and an exemption where the variation or revocation is simply a consequence of a wider local or regional government boundary change. I trust that hon. Members will welcome our steps to accommodate the wishes of the Standing Committee, and I commend the amendments to the House.

Before I conclude, I should like to deal with some of the issues raised by the hon. Member for Teignbridge and by my hon. Friends the Members for Gloucester (Mr. Dhanda) and for Stroud (Mr. Drew).

The hon. Member for Teignbridge asked about local knowledge and the operation of a control room. He posed an interesting example of controllers talking to a young child and trying to identify the location of a call. I have to tell him that the arrangements being put in place to procure a new communications or call system for operation by the fire service—to be operated through regional control centres—will use the latest modern technology, which has the capacity to pinpoint very precisely the location from where a call has been made. That obviates the need for a lengthy process of having to talk through the problem of location.

It is fundamental to have the best modern technology, which makes it possible to identify the location of the call and then to direct and guide the fire and rescue service to that particular location. I have seen some of the best new systems being introduced, so I am well aware of the scope for improving the effectiveness of the service through the introduction of new technology.

[Mr. Raynsford]

On the notion that new clause 5 is not particularly objectionable because it requires only a review, I have to say that it does not require only a review. When linked with amendment No. 3, it would block any move to a region other than those that satisfy the conclusions of the review proposed by the hon. Member for Runnymede and Weybridge. It is not simply a benign and ideal Liberal Democrat debating chamber opportunity for endless discussion about optimal regional boundaries—and if it were, it would, as we all know, rarely, if ever, lead to conclusions.

My hon. Friends the Members for Stroud and for Gloucester made important points about regional control rooms and the possible implications for Gloucester. I recognise the achievement in creating the tri-service centre in Gloucester, which my right hon. Friend the Minister without Portfolio visited recently—he told me how impressed he was by what he saw. I have been invited to visit it, and I have indicated that I will be happy to when a convenient moment becomes available in my busy diary because I want to see more of the good work that is being done there.

I am also well aware of the anxieties in Gloucester about the implications of a move towards regional control rooms. I say to my hon. Friends that there is no reason why a move to regional control rooms would threaten the continued operation of the Gloucester centre. In the first place, Gloucester will be open to bid as a location for the regional control room. No decisions have been taken on an appropriate location, and I am sure that my hon. Friends will make a persuasive case on the merits of Gloucester.

Mr. Robert Key (Salisbury) (Con) rose—

Mr. Geoffrey Clifton-Brown (Cotswold) (Con) rose—

Mr. Raynsford: I am answering the points made by my hon. Friends.

If it were decided to locate the regional control room elsewhere—no doubt conflicting proposals will be advanced by other hon. Members, some of whom have not been in the Chamber for very long, and certainly not as long as my hon. Friends who have sat through the whole debate—only 10 per cent. of the existing tri-service centre's work load is fire-related, and 90 per cent. of it is not, and it is therefore questionable whether such a decision would threaten the continued operation of the Gloucester centre. However, we want to discuss the issue in detail with all concerned because I understand the anxieties.

Mr. Clifton-Brown: Will the Minister give an undertaking this evening on behalf of the Government that, if there is any cost involved in moving the fire element of the tri-service centre away from Gloucester, the council tax payers of Gloucestershire will not have to bear it?

Mr. Raynsford: I am delighted to see the hon. Gentleman, whom we missed in Committee because he was frequently absent. I am glad to see him this evening on this brief appearance after several hours of debate. I assure him that cost-effectiveness is one of the main considerations, and we will certainly examine the financial implications, including the potential savings that will come from the establishment of a regional control centre, for all authorities involved before final decisions are taken. I assure him that the issues will be examined impartially.

My hon. Friend the Member for Stroud asked about accountability. One existing fire and rescue authority in England, the London Fire and Emergency Planning Authority, is already constituted on regional lines, and it was created under the Greater London Authority Act 1999. It is thoroughly accountable, and, interestingly, it includes not only directly elected members of the Greater London authority but representatives from London boroughs. It is an interesting example of achieving a proper framework of accountability within the regional structure.

With those comments, I hope that the House will agree that the Government amendments should be endorsed, and I ask the hon. Member for Runnymede and Weybridge to withdraw his amendment.

Mr. Hammond: I could say a great deal, but I must speak against the backdrop of the Minister's filibuster. I shall give him the benefit of the doubt and assume that the failure of the annunciator system allowed him to go on for rather longer than he wanted to.

The Minister has not attempted to make a case for the existing Government offices for the regions being the optimum basis for the organisation of our fire and rescue services. All we have heard from him is the ludicrous charge that because we introduced Government offices for the regions in the first place, it is somehow our fault. In view of the time, I do not intend to use any more of it up, but simply urge my hon. Friends to support new clause 5 in the Lobby.

Question put, That the clause be read a Second time:—

New Clause 7

Directions Relating to Particular Classes of Fires and Emergencies

'(1) The Secretary of State may direct a Fire and Rescue Authority to take, or not to take, action specified in the direction in relation to—

(a) a fire of a type or occurring in circumstances specified in the direction, or

(b) an emergency of another kind of a type or occurring in circumstances specified in the direction.

(2) A direction under this section may require a fire and rescue authority to act outside the authority's area.

(3) A direction under this section may be varied or revoked by a further such direction.

(4) A direction under this section shall be made by order.'.—[Mr. Hammond.]

Brought up, and read the First time.

Mr. Hammond: I beg to move, That the clause be read a Second time.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Michael Lord): With this it will be convenient to discuss the following:

New clause 13—Fire safety—

'(1) The Secretary of State may give direction to a fire and rescue authority to inspect the fire safety of one or all of—

(a) schools;

(b) residential and nursing homes;

(c) homes in multiple occupation;

in the authorities' area.

(2) The Secretary of State shall give such direction to a fire and rescue authority as conferred by subsection (1) of this Clause if requested to do so by a local authority or fire and rescue authority for the area of that authority.

(3) Where inspections are made under subsections (1) or (2) the Fire and Rescue Authority shall make a report detailing, in particular how fire safety may be improved by—

(a) the installation of fire sprinkler or misting systems;

(b) alteration to means of escape;

(c) passive fire protection measures;

(d) fire and smoke alarm system.

(4) Where reports are received by the Secretary of State under subsection (3) of this Clause the Secretary of State shall consult with—

(a) the existing authorities in question;

(b) any persons he considers appropriate as to whether further legislation is required to require the retro fitting of such measures and to what extent it is practical to do so.

(5) The Secretary of State shall after such consultation as carried out under subsection (4) of this Clause publish the results of such consultation.'.

Amendment No. 5, in page 6, line 18, leave out Clause 10.

Mr. Hammond: Amendment No. 5 would pave the way for new clause 7 by removing clause 10 from the Bill. Clause 10 gives the Secretary of State the power to intervene directly in a fire or incident. I shall spare the Deputy Prime Minister's blushes, given that he is in the Chamber, and not repeat the lurid image that was painted in Committee of him sitting in the basement of No. 26 Whitehall ordering fire engines around Britain.

Conservative Members believe that that arrangement is not appropriate. Systems need to be established to allow professionals to handle operational situations through existing arrangements such as reinforcement, which the Bill provides for. The Under-Secretary may envisage a situation following an unconventional terrorist attack, but powers in the Civil Contingencies Bill provide for the direction of resources in such an emergency. [Interruption.]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. If hon. Members are not listening to, or taking part in, the debate, would they either leave the Chamber or listen quietly? I am having difficulty hearing the hon. Gentleman who is addressing the House.

Mr. Hammond: It would be more appropriate to set down procedures for co-operation and the control of major incidents than to use the ad hoc power in clause 10. New clause 7 sets out the same powers of direction, but does that in advance, and in relation to a type of fire or incident, or a fire or incident that occurs in specified circumstances. It provides that such direction would be made by order, which would enable parliamentary scrutiny of the arrangements that were put in place.

We do not understand the need for the Secretary of State's role of hot direction under clause 10. Fire and rescue authorities should be established and charged with their functions. The Bill contains provisions to put in place co-operation and reinforcement procedures, and new clause 7 would give the Secretary of State all the powers that he needs, in advance, to set out precise procedures, control arrangements and allocation of responsibilities in specified circumstances. Clause 10 confers an unreasonable and disproportionate power that will undermine the professionalism of the service and question the reinforcement and contingency arrangements that will routinely be put in place under the Bill. There is much more that I could say, but in view of the time, I shall now conclude.

Phil Hope: Amendment No. 5 would remove the Secretary of State's power to direct a fire or rescue authority in the event of a specific fire or other emergency, and new clause 7 would replace that power to direct with an order-making power similar to that in clause 9. The amendment reflects a misunderstanding of what clause 10 is intended to cover. To clarify and repeat what was said in Committee, it will be invoked only when an emergency is imminent, or upon us, and when urgent action is thus necessary.

For example, the Secretary of State will be able to direct a fire and rescue authority to respond when an unforeseen emergency occurs for which the fire and rescue service has been unable to plan and there is no time to make the necessary order under clause 9. Such a direction will remove any concern an authority might have had about a possible conflict between its local responsibilities and the need to respond to an incident not covered by its core duties.

Clause 10 will also allow a measure of central co-ordination when a fire or other emergency occurs on such a massive scale that a local or even regional response is insufficient. That might include a catastrophic fire, widespread and serious flooding or an emergency such as a terrorist event on the scale of 11 September 2001. During such an extreme or unusual event, it is vital for the Secretary of State to offer direction should circumstances dictate it so that events can be reacted to swiftly and urgently on the ground. In such circumstances, there would be no time for the Secretary of State to make an order—

It being Nine o'clock, MR. DEPUTY SPEAKER put forthwith the Question already proposed from the Chair, pursuant to Order [26 January].

POWER TO CREATE COMBINED FIRE AND RESCUE AUTHORITIES

Amendments made: No. 7, in page 2, line 40, leave out 'may' and insert 'must'.

No. 8, in page 2, line 42, at end insert—

'(8A) The Secretary of State is not required to cause an inquiry to be held under subsection (8) (but may do so) if—

(a) in a case within subsection (8)(a), the existing authorities in question agree to the making of the scheme,

(b) in a case within subsection (8)(b), the combined fire and rescue authority and any other authority which would, apart from the scheme, be a fire and rescue authority under section 1 and which would be affected by the variation or revocation, agree to the variation or revocation,

(c) in either case, it appears to the Secretary of State that the scheme, variation or revocation is to be made solely for the purpose of giving effect to an order under Part 4 of the Local Government Act 1972 (c.70), Part 2 of the Local Government Act 1992 (c.19) or section 17 of the Regional Assemblies (Preparations) Act 2003 (c.10), or

(d) in either case, the Secretary of State considers that, in the interests of public safety, the scheme should be made, varied or revoked without delay.'.—[Phil Hope.]

Clause 4

COMBINED AUTHORITIES UNDER THE FIRE SERVICES ACT 1947

Amendments made: No. 9, in page 4, line 22, after '(4)', insert 'varying or'.

No. 10, in page 4, line 23, leave out 'may' and insert 'must'.

No. 11, in page 4, line 23, at end insert—

'(7) The Secretary of State is not required to cause an inquiry to be held under subsection (6) (but may do so) if—

(a) the combined authority and any other authority which would, apart from the scheme, be a fire and rescue authority under section 1 and which would be affected by the variation or revocation, agree to the variation or revocation,

(b) it appears to the Secretary of State that the scheme is to be varied or revoked solely for the purpose of giving effect to an order made under Part 4 of the Local Government Act 1972 (c.70), Part 2 of the Local Government Act 1992 (c.19) or section 17 of the Regional Assemblies (Preparations) Act 2003 (c.10), or

(c) the Secretary of State considers that, in the interests of public safety, the scheme should be varied or revoked without delay.'.—[Phil Hope.]

Clause 19

CHARGING

Amendments made: No. 12, in page 9, line 10, leave out subsection (2) and insert—

'(2) An order under subsection (1) may authorise charging for extinguishing fires, or protecting life and property in the event of fires, only in respect of fires which are at sea or under the sea.

(2A) An order under subsection (1) may not authorise charging for emergency medical assistance.'.

No. 13, in page 9, line 29, at end insert—

'(8) The references in subsection (2) to [odq]sea[cdq] are not restricted to the territorial sea of the United Kingdom.'.—[Phil Hope.]

Order for Third Reading read.

9.13 pm

Mr. Raynsford: I beg to move, That the Bill be now read the Third time.

Let me remind the House of the key measures contained in the Fire and Rescue Services Bill that will help to make the service a better service for the public, and better for those who work within it. This is, as all hon. Members will be aware, the first major legislation on fire and rescue matters for 57 years. It comes after a long period in which the fire and rescue service performed its traditional functions with creditable efficiency, commanding the confidence of the public and ensuring a swift response to fires where they broke out. However, it was also a period in which there was a growing awareness of the need for the service to undertake a more extensive role. First, it began to be increasingly involved in other areas of emergency work, notably road traffic accidents. Secondly, it became increasingly conscious of the importance of prevention. We now know that however good a fire brigade is at responding to the threat of fires when they occur and getting to the scene of fires quickly—the brigades are extremely good and perform with commendable courage and commitment in discharging those responsibilities—we know also that in too many instances people die unnecessarily because they are overwhelmed before a fire brigade can reach them, and in many cases before the fire brigade is even alerted. That emphasises the importance of a greater focus on fire prevention and measures to avoid unnecessary fires occurring in the first place.

It is right that new legislation should put a strong focus on helping to save more lives and to create safer communities. It should contain a new duty on all fire and rescue authorities to promote fire safety. It should give greater encouragement to fire and rescue authorities to work constructively within their communities to identify risks and to ensure that effective preventive measures are in place.

It is vital also that the fire and rescue service should recognise the much wider responsibilities to which fire brigades respond as a matter of course in dealing with road traffic accidents and major emergencies alongside traditional firefighting. It is important also that we recognise the growing importance of provision to underpin national resilience, through powers to ensure a co-ordinated and strategic response by fire and rescue authorities to specific emergencies, including flooding on a massive scale, a major terrorist incident or catastrophic fires.

Mr. Redwood: Does the Minister think that the world would be a better place if more authorities charged for rescuing cats and dogs, or fewer?

Mr. Raynsford: The right hon. Gentleman has raised an interesting issue that I shall address briefly later in my speech. The world will be a better place as a result of the Bill, which will put far greater emphasis on the importance of fire safety and fire prevention work. That is the ultimate objective if we are to save lives and avoid unnecessary fires. Issues about whether charges should be made for certain relatively small aspects of the work of fire and safety services are second-order questions. I shall return to them, but the more important objectives of saving lives, of preventing unnecessary fire and of reducing the number of people whose lives are either ended or blighted by unnecessary fires or other disasters are the priorities that the Government consider to be fundamental.

The Bill will ensure that the fire and rescue service has a clear sense of direction and the means to deliver it. The measure will give statutory force to the fire and rescue national framework, which provides, as has been demonstrated in this evening's debates, the national leadership that was called for so clearly by the independent review of the fire service, which was chaired by Sir George Bain. The review highlighted the failures over many years, and of successive Governments, to address the needs for change in the service and the need to give leadership. We have recognised that responsibility to effect change and to introduce new arrangements that give a proper sense of direction and a momentum for change to the fire and rescue service.

Through our new intervention powers, we shall be able to ensure that fire and rescue authorities act in accordance with the requirement of the national framework and that there are safeguards in place against a failure to provide the necessary arrangements to underpin national resilience and public safety.

Mr. Swire: Before the Minister rubbishes the Fire Brigades Union, which I am sure that he will not, does he recognise that it says that there are some positive steps contained within the Bill? However, it goes on to say that, basically, the underlying proposals

"downgrade the rescue role of the fire service and produce cuts across the service under the guise of local Integrated Risk Management plans."

The Minister has obviously failed to convince that audience. How can he convince other people if he cannot convince the professionals within the fire service that the Bill is not about regionalisation and cost saving?

Mr. Raynsford: The hon. Gentleman is speaking as if the events of the past two years never took place. He may have been oblivious to what happened, but most hon. Members know perfectly well that there was a difficult and controversial dispute and that inevitably the FBU took up positions that were not wholly supportive of the Government's position. We nevertheless are driving forward a reform agenda that aims both to improve the quality of the fire services and their effectiveness in preventing fires and enhance their well-earned reputation for bravery and effectiveness in dealing with fires and putting them out. The Government have never done anything other than salute the courage and commitment of fire service workers who do a difficult and dangerous job very well. However, it is important to look at ways in which we can make it easier to prevent fires and, by doing so, reduce the risk that firefighters face when they respond to fires.

As for the hon. Gentleman's regional fantasies, an extraordinary characteristic of all our debates has been the Conservatives' Pavlovian response as soon as the word "region" is mentioned. They behave as if they are puppets manipulated by someone who wants to continue dancing to the UK Independence party tune, but we are sensible, pragmatic and forward-looking in our approach, and are not affected by the dogma that the Opposition unfortunately—

Mr. Hammond: Will the right hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Raynsford: I shall do so in a moment, but the hon. Gentleman should listen to what I have to say, because he is, I am afraid, equally guilty of Pavlovian reactions to any references to Europe or regions and is happy to dance to the UKIP tune.

Mr. Hammond: The Minister has added "Pavlovian" to "preposterous" and "paranoid" as his favourite adjectives to describe me. He is obviously stung by his inability to deal with the charge that inappropriate regionalisation is being imposed on the service. He has moved away from defending himself against that attack, and in the past hour or so he started to refer to Europe and the UKIP. Would he tell me when I have ever referred to Europe or, indeed, the UKIP in the context of the Bill?

Mr. Raynsford: I have a long memory, and I recall the many occasions during the passage of the Local Government Act 2003 and during our discussions on the Bill when references to regions produced the utterly predictable response that this was all a European plot to impose inappropriate structures on Britain. That response was entirely unjustified and indicative of a party obsessed with the long forgotten ideological causes that motivated it in the era when Baroness Thatcher was Prime Minister. One day, its members will wake up, realise that the world has moved on, and become a better Opposition party. Sadly, however, it will be a long time before they have the responsibility of government.

We are committed to ensuring more effective collaboration between fire and rescue authorities and more cost-effective services, which involves working together at a regional level on a number of responsibilities that are best discharged at that level. Our White Paper set out clearly the Government's view that certain responsibilities need to be discharged at a national level. We made clear our commitment to give leadership and show the way forward for the fire and rescue services in the White Paper, the national framework and the Bill, but we accept that a number of services are delivered best and most cost-effectively at regional level. Regional resilience requires co-ordination with the other emergency services at a regional level. The demands of coping with major threats such as that of terrorism require organisation on a scale that can only be discharged effectively at regional level. The introduction of regional control rooms will bring substantial benefits, including considerable gains in cost-effectiveness. The average cost of answering an emergency call in London is £18, but in the Isle of Wight the equivalent cost is £168. Such wide discrepancies are simply not sustainable, and we have to move forward in a way that guarantees an effective service that delivers the most cost-effective outcomes, but does so on the basis of the absolute underlying principle that public safety and a quick response to any emergency are fundamental.

Mr. Hammond: Does the Minister have any evidence that the closing down of 40 of the fire control rooms in England to leave only nine covering the whole country will improve public safety? If he has such evidence, why did not the Select Committee uncover it and include it in its report?

Mr. Raynsford: As the hon. Gentleman knows only too well, although he chose not to refer to it, the Mott MacDonald study looked very carefully at that issue. It concluded that the previous recommendations of some three years earlier had not been implemented and acted upon, and that there was an overriding case for moving to regional control rooms. It even suggested that there was a possibility of moving to three supra-regional control rooms for the whole of England. In the end, it decided that a basis of nine regional control rooms in the English regions was probably the best outcome.

The arguments are clear and they have been spelled out; they are to do with ensuring the most cost-effective systems, but also the most effective and up-to-date systems. That includes new technology that enables the pin-pointing of calls in order to direct fire and rescue teams in the most effective way to the location of a fire or emergency and arrangements that allow integration with the other emergency services through the new Firelink communications system. All those things are about improving effectiveness, giving a better service to the public and responding more effectively to a wide range of possible eventualities.

Mr. Flook: Has the Minister any idea which of the regions will move more quickly? Does he have any idea whether the south-west will be moving towards regional control centres more quickly than other regions?

Mr. Raynsford: I hope that the hon. Gentleman will know—we said it often in the Committee, of which he was a member—that the process has involved all regions setting up regional management boards, which are in place, and they will be considering over the next few months the detailed arrangements for implementing what is required to be implemented at a regional level. I have always made it clear that some issues need to be handled nationally, some need to be handled regionally, including regional control rooms and other things, and some need to be handled locally. Getting that arrangement right is fundamental to delivering the best possible service. Of course, response and community engagement are best handled at a local level, and that will continue to be the case in all circumstances and all parts of the country.

We also recognise that fire and rescue authorities must work with each other and other bodies to deliver their new functions. In the course of this evening's debate, we have highlighted areas where, on the fire prevention and community engagement agenda, it is clearly advantageous for fire and rescue authorities to work with other bodies, including local authorities, individuals and community groups, to ensure the most effective outcomes. The message about joint working and working across traditional barriers is also very important, and such activity will be facilitated by the Bill.

We are also ensuring that fire and rescue authorities have appropriate powers and obligations to enter into mutual assistance schemes to support the discharge of all their core operational functions. We will continue to maintain the existing ability for fire and rescue authorities to charge for particular services while continuing to exclude the possibility of charging for fighting fires and not extending charging powers other than in circumstances in which it is clear that that is appropriate and can be done in a way that in no way damages public safety and security. I have always said—and I repeat it tonight—that public safety is the overriding priority. Ultimately, that determines our whole approach to the future of the fire and rescue service.

The Bill will help to make the fire and rescue service a better place for all who work in it by repealing outdated legislation to allow a modern approach to recruitment, training and development; by bringing forward new powers to create new multiple pension schemes while protecting existing pension provision; and by taking reserve powers to ensure effective negotiating machinery for the fire and rescue service that recognises its changing role and includes representation of all its employees.

Mr. Roger Williams (Brecon and Radnorshire) (LD): I asked the Minister about devolution on Second Reading. I am still not clear whether the Government intend to devolve the setting up of pay negotiating bodies and pension provision to the Welsh Assembly. It is not clear in the Bill.

Mr. Raynsford: The hon. Gentleman makes a fair point, and I am not in the least surprised that he is confused. The provisions are governed by clause 60, which says:

"In its application to Wales, the following provisions of this Act have effect as if for each reference to the Secretary of State there were substituted a reference to the National Assembly for Wales".

On a cursory reading of the Bill, especially if they started at the front rather than the back, people might be tempted to believe that the Secretary of State has powers to determine matters in Wales. The policy objective is the devolution of all policy functions and finance matters to Wales. The one matter that is reserved is pensions, for reasons that he will fully understand.

I understand that the Welsh Assembly Government intend to continue to operate the current arrangements for negotiation and bargaining on pay and conditions at a UK level, and I know that the Scottish Executive are equally committed to maintaining that arrangement, which will continue as long as all the parties agree that it should, and it will be a voluntary arrangement reached by the constituent parts of the United Kingdom.

Mr. Williams: I thank the Minister for that clarification. Will there be any provision to ensure that Welsh fire and rescue services and employers are represented on the pay negotiating bodies?

Mr. Raynsford: That will be a matter for the national joint council, which will consider changes to the rather cumbersome existing structures.

[Mr. Raynsford]

The hon. Member for Runnymede and Weybridge (Mr. Hammond) is looking for bits of paper to prove that the Secretary of State will have inevitable intervention powers here. I remind him that we have made it clear that we have such powers but will use them only if the NJC fails to come up with satisfactory amendments to the existing arrangements to allow the whole system to operate effectively.

In June 2003, we published our fire and rescue White Paper, responding to the challenge set out by the independent review of the fire service led by Sir George Bain. It outlined our vision for a fire and rescue service better able to meet the challenges of the 21st century—a service that saves more lives by protecting the public and creating safer communities. The Bill is crucial to delivering that vision, and I commend it to the House.

Mr. Hammond: The 45 minutes that have been allocated for Third Reading constitute a totally inadequate time, so I shall be brief.

We have had our differences in these debates, but our proceedings have been generally constructive. I say to the Minister that regionalisation is an issue but Europe, in the context of fire and rescue services, thankfully, is not. I want to reiterate our strong support for the modernisation agenda as originally presented, with its emphasis on local management; its focus on prevention and education and the matching of resources to risk to life through genuine risk-based integrated risk management plans; and, critically, its reform of working practices, freeing up resources for that prevention agenda and for the new focus that we need on the response to terrorism.

We were nervous when Ministers declared the result of the IRMPs in advance by saying that modernisation would pay for the firefighters' pay settlement. We were alarmed, as the Minister knows, when the targets were relaxed last summer, as they were a key justification for the modernisation programme. We had fears about the balance between local, national and regional dimensions, especially when we read the Bill and the framework documents, but we have remained supportive throughout of the Bill's core. At its core, the programme is sound.

We acknowledge that, for exceptional circumstances, there is a need for a supra-brigade response, especially to deal with the new threat of terrorism. We have always recognised the benefits of co-operation between authorities, not only in response to unconventional threats but across the board to create appropriate units for providing the best possible service to the public. However, a balance needs to be struck between the national, regional and local tiers. We need to focus on the needs of the service, not unrelated considerations. We must also ensure that the service is driven from the bottom up, with democratically accountable local fire and rescue services working together so that the service is provided at the appropriate level.

Mr. Redwood: Is my hon. Friend worried, as I am, that regional management might mean another tier of management, with higher salaries, more inefficiency and enormous reorganisation rather than the drive for job losses and greater cost control that the Minister imagines?

Mr. Hammond: All the evidence shows that the introduction of a regional tier increases, not decreases, bureaucracy. The Select Committee report pointed out that no evidence had been presented to show that there would be a reduction in bureaucracy. I stress to my right hon. Friend that a bigger concern is that sucking away certain powers to the regional management boards will leave some smaller fire and rescue services with a management structure that withers on the vine. I wonder whether the Government's medium-term to long-term objective is to emaciate fire and rescue authorities to the point when regional combined authorities become inevitable.

We share the Government's view that the Bill recognises the wider role of fire and rescue services by including statutory functions for road traffic accidents and other forms of emergency. We appreciate and approve the focus on prevention and education. Many other aspects of the measure are long overdue acknowledgements of the work of the fire and rescue services.

The Bill suffers from two significant flaws. First, the balance between national and local powers is wrong, with the Secretary of State's huge reserve powers having the potential to undermine the role of local, democratically accountable fire and rescue authorities. The Minister is at pains to emphasise that they are reserve powers, but only time will tell.

Secondly, we are worried about the imposition of an arbitrary and irrelevant regional structure on the fire and rescue service. That structure was designed for a different purpose and no evidence has been adduced for the proposition that it is the most appropriate way in which to run a fire and rescue service. The Government's agenda is nowhere more evident than in their proposal to reduce the number of control rooms throughout England from 49 to nine. No evidence has been produced to show that that is in the interests of public safety. We believe that it will prove sub-optimal and that the motivation for the regional agenda is extraneous to the fire and rescue service.

Our preference is for a fire and rescue service that is based on the maxim, "Quality services locally delivered." We support a service that would confer clear functions and duties, including best value, on local fire authorities, which are accountable to their communities. That would lead them to work together, for example, by merging control rooms and sharing equipment, to discharge those functions, and they would always answer to their communities, not the Secretary of State.

We accept that the Secretary of State must play a role in national preparedness to deal with a terrorist or other major incident, but that must not snuff out the stand-alone capability of our local emergency services, which will surely happen with regionalisation.

At the heart of the Bill is a positive agenda, which we support. It has been spoilt by the inability to resist the Whitehall obsession with total control of every last detail, and by the subordination of its aims to the regional agenda. We will not vote against it tonight, but urge our noble Friends to try again—as we have tried—to get the Government to see the case for restoring local fire authorities' lead role in the new structure. We want a bottom-up, collaborative approach based on geographical units that are relevant to the fire and rescue service, not some other agenda, so that we end up with a service that is truly rooted in our local communities and is the stronger for it.

John McDonnell: I thank my right hon. Friend the Minister for the way in which he has handled the Bill. I thank him both for his inclusiveness in involving us in discussions, and for the open and transparent way in which he explained the details of the Bill. Much in the Bill reflects the views of firefighters, fire managers and fire authorities. It reflects a modern fire service, and the range of services that are now provided. I am grateful to the Minister for addressing continuing concerns, particularly the clear establishment of minimum standards to be set through guidance across the country but also the advocacy of maximum quality of service.

Clause 32, however, still causes concern. It relates to guidance in the context of industrial relations. Let me sound a note of caution. The Bill arrived in the climate that followed one of the bitterest disputes in 25 years. We introduced legislation giving Government powers to impose a settlement, and we introduced a sunset clause that will, we hope, reach fruition shortly as a result of the constructive discussions that have taken place. What I do not want is for clause 32 to be interpreted by this or any future Government as a way of interfering in industrial relations again, and imposing settlements on firefighters. Tonight they will be on shift—men and women who risk their lives daily to protect us and our communities. We do not want to drag them into the bitterness of another dispute like last year's.

Richard Younger-Ross: It has been a pleasure and an honour to serve on the Committee, and to lead for my party today. My father was a firefighter in the London docks during the war, and as a child I was brought up with the fire service.

As has been said, there is much in the Bill to support. As we said on Second Reading, and as my hon. Friend the Member for Kingston and Surbiton (Mr. Davey) has made clear, we wholeheartedly believe in the modernisation process. Most of our debates have been very constructive. The Minister, for instance, was able to accept an amendment that we tabled in Committee; at least, he produced a similar amendment today providing that there should—not must—generally be an inquiry, which is an improvement. Nevertheless, some parts of the Bill could do with a little more improvement. Like the hon. Member for Runnymede and Weybridge (Mr. Hammond), we intend to ask those in the other place to consider how they might be able to improve it.

I want to make five brief points. The Bill still tends towards centralisation. We reject the Secretary of State's power to force fire authorities to combine even when they are working well. We believe that if an authority is to combine with another, that must be at its instigation, because of reorganisation or because it is failing in some way. I do not believe that the Secretary of State's power to act for the sake of what are, effectively, cost savings is democratic. It pulls the rug from under local democracy.

A lot still needs to be protected in terms of democracy. The Secretary of State is taking powers to remove elected members from committees. He can determine that a person is not fit to serve. When the Secretary of State can say, "We do not think this councillor is fit to perform this duty", a stiletto is pointed at the heart of local democracy. That is not a power that the Secretary of State should ever have. Local authorities determine who should be on their committees, and it is up to them to say who is fit to perform the role; it is not a matter for the Secretary of State.

On accountability, we need still to consider what comes to this House and what does not. The Secretary of State has again turned down the reasonable request—from the hon. Member for Runnymede and Weybridge—that the national framework be considered in this House via statutory instrument. As was said earlier, it is flawed and it is very disappointing that we will be unable to consider it.

Mr. Redwood: Does the hon. Gentleman think that the Bill will entail big council tax rises to pay all the reorganisation costs?

Richard Younger-Ross: The Bill should save money, and we accept the principle that reorganisation should involve a cost saving. However, achieving parity for firefighters could involve an increase in costs, which we would support. That would be reasonable in order to secure equal pay for equal work.

Mr. Hammond indicated assent.

Richard Younger-Ross: I note that the hon. Member for Runnymede and Weybridge nods.

Some spurious arguments were advanced today in respect of a well-thought-out amendment to establish a boundary review. Most people accept that, in this context, the regions of the south-west and the south-east are nonsense. They were created for different purposes and are not suitable as fire authority regions. Regardless of whether the other place can change the Bill's wording, I urge the Minister to accept the need for a boundary review at some point.

We were nearly able to discuss sprinklers and their installation on Report, but we just ran out of time. The Minister gave a very good answer in Committee to the question of fitting sprinklers in new buildings, but we did not address their retrospective fitting. I urge those in the other place to table amendments to establish a review of existing properties, so that we can consider the practicalities of the retrospective fitting of sprinklers in schools, care homes and houses in multiple occupation. The cost of doing so could be saved through reduced insurance costs, and if we can save lives through such retrospective fitting, we should do it. That is not to say that we should give up on passive fire protection systems; rather, we see sprinklers as an additional protection. I urge the Minister to ask his noble Friends in the other place to look at the proposal sympathetically. There is a way forward, and I am sure that suitable wording and processes can be found to make it a reality.

Mr. Drew: I shall continue the process of handing out plaudits by handing out mine to Ministers. They have listened, and within reason we have made good progress. As the lack of a Division at the end of Third Reading will show, this is a consensual Bill.

I agree with what the hon. Member for Teignbridge (Richard Younger-Ross) said about sprinklers. To an extent, this has been a "something and nothing" Bill. The "something" is that at long last, we are introducing legislation that reflects a modern fire and rescue service, unlike the antiquated legislation that has been in place for so long that most people cannot remember why it was enacted. But other issues, such as sprinklers, have been deliberately avoided or regarded as inappropriate for this Bill. We had a useful debate on such issues in Committee, and my hon. Friend the Member for South Dorset (Jim Knight) spoke very knowledgeably about what needed to be done, as one would expect, given his expertise. The Bill might not be the right vehicle for such matters, but they cannot remain an off-stage discussion.

Mr. Hammond: The hon. Gentleman is absolutely right, and there has been consensus on both sides that once the research has been properly concluded, the issue of sprinklers must be addressed, if appropriate. From his discussion with his right hon. Friend the Minister, is it his understanding that the Secretary of State has the power to move forward on that agenda without the requirement for further primary legislation, or will we be waiting for a further primary legislative opportunity?

Mr. Drew: I certainly believe that that is the case, and I hope that it will be confirmed soon after tonight's debate, but I understand the problem, because that matter will affect other Departments and other Bills. I hope that my right hon. and hon. Friends on the Front Bench have heard and taken on board the hon. Gentleman's point.

Richard Younger-Ross rose—

Mr. Drew: I had better not give way, because we need to allow other people to contribute.

Another point that has been clearly made from this side is that we do not see the Bill as a cuts package in any way. Elements of it may involve a degree of rationalisation, but we have not discussed—

Mr. Redwood: Will the hon. Gentleman give way on that point?

Mr. Drew: No, but I will sit down in a moment to allow the right hon. Gentleman to contribute.

The key issue is how the resources are reallocated. If we want a modern fire and rescue service, working with the other emergency services, it is crucial for it to be properly funded. As I have said on numerous occasions, I have no problem with the regionalisation agenda as a strategic direction, but the Bill is not the way to deliver that, and it must not be used to do the work on the ground. If there are resources available, we must reinvest them not just in equipment but in the people who, as my hon. Friend the Member for Hayes and Harlington (John McDonnell) said, are there day and night, doing the work, and are to be commended. If we are to make the fire service fit for purpose in the 21st century—particularly against the background of the developments that we are, sadly, seeing in this world of ours—we must make sure that those people have the resources to do the job properly.

Mr. Redwood: The hon. Members for Stroud (Mr. Drew) and for Hayes and Harlington (John McDonnell) are being a little optimistic tonight—perhaps whistling in the dark—knowing as they do that they are under a three-line Whip to vote for the Bill, which I suspect is a harbinger of cuts and reductions in the fire service that they love and want to support.

Mr. Hammond: Just for the record, I should tell my right hon. Friend that the hon. Member for Hayes and Harlington (John McDonnell) has not been shy, when fire and rescue matters have been before the House in the past, about defying his Government's Whip and voting with the Opposition.

Mr. Redwood: I quite agree, and I am delighted that my hon. Friend has reminded the House of the hon. Gentleman's entirely honourable record. I was simply trying to persuade the hon. Gentleman that he should use his independence and freedom yet again, because I think that the Minister is selling him a pup on this important issue.

I fear that this will be a typical Labour modernisation. We will see cuts in the service on the ground, among the people who have to deliver on not-very-good pay, but a massive expansion of bureaucracy, management and the administrative cadres. We will see large-scale recruitment of extra people called regional-this and regional-that: there will be regional chief executives, regional finance directors, regional chief officers, regional deputy chief officers and regional assistant chief officers across the country, who will be on huge salaries with cars and all sorts of perks. At the same time, the Minister will want to achieve some offsetting cost reductions. He will not achieve enough, but I am sure that he will squeeze the service on the ground. He therefore wants to go ahead with the plan to cut the number of centres around the country that deal with the emergencies and allocate the work. That is why he has got it in for the counties: he hopes that he can achieve some savings from demolishing county fire administration and replacing it with much dearer, grander, more expansive and more multi-layered administration at regional level.

Mr. Hammond rose—

Mr. Redwood: I see that my hon. Friend is provoked yet again.

Mr. Hammond: I was thinking that my right hon. Friend might want to try to provoke the Minister into a response by pointing out that his Department's internal estimates are that the cost of setting up the nine regional control centres, including the cost of redundancies from the existing control centres—because there will be considerable redundancies—is in excess of £100 million. Perhaps my right hon. Friend could provoke the Minister into a denial of that figure.

Mr. Redwood: That is the sort of figure that I would have guessed, and I am delighted that my hon. Friend, who has studied this much more closely than I have, has done this very accurate costing. Of course there are going to be redundancies and cuts—I think that some hon. Members who value the fire service have been misled on this occasion—and of course there will be a massive expansion of jobs and non-jobs as the regions are set up. This is an attempt to drive England into a series of regions that are neither natural, sensible nor efficient. This is not the way in which anyone with any sense of history, tradition, business practice, efficiency or service delivery would organise things.

It makes absolutely no sense to have a fire region covering everywhere from Dover to Milton Keynes, but leaving out London at the very heart of that region, when all the main transport links go through or just round the edge of London within the Greater London area. It makes no sense to suggest that Cornwall, Devon and Somerset all wish to be lumped together. People in Exeter do not want to look to Bristol or Truro; people in Truro do not want to look to Plymouth or Bristol; and people in Bristol are not wild about either Exeter or Plymouth.

It is dangerous for the Government to think that they can impose this "redprint" for ruin, this regionalisation, on the fire service as the soft underbelly of local government in Britain. The Government hope that the counties will not regard this as such a strong attack on themselves as the complete abolition of the counties and their replacement with regional government would be. They hope that they can start the process off by tackling it service by service, and they have picked on the poor fire service in this Bill.

The Minister should think long and hard before trying to destroy the very good administration and delivery that exists in the many county fire services around the country. He should understand their esprit de corps, and their sense of loyalty, place and tradition, which are very important in a badged and uniformed service such as the fire service. He should also understand that there will be no such loyalty or sense of achievement and tradition if he insists on introducing these expensive regional quangos above the county services.

Mr. Hammond: Does my right hon. Friend agree that, as the responsible level of management is moved further from local communities to regional tiers, it is likely that local people will become more sceptical about whether the integrated risk management plan changes that are being introduced on the ground are really changes for the better and not just cuts? The further away they are, the more likely people are to be sceptical.

Mr. Redwood: My hon. Friend is right. These measures involve cuts in local democracy and accountability and in certain local jobs that need doing, coupled with the massive expansion of a new alien bureaucracy at regional level, which will be dearer, worse and less efficient, and without that sense of place, presence, tradition, efficiency and loyalty that is so important in the delivery of these services in proud metropolitan boroughs and proud counties around our country. England is a country of cities and counties; it is not a country of regions. Regions are entirely artificial constructs, and they cause anger, disagreement and dissension. I have never met anyone in Liverpool who wanted to look to Manchester for their government. I have never found people in Sunderland very willing to accept the sovereignty of Newcastle. Labour Members who represent many of those cities should understand that, and realise just how unpopular—as well as expensive and undesirable—this regionalisation will be.

Unfortunately, once again, there is not enough time to debate the intricacies of the Bill. I would, however, like to make a few comments on charging. We had a very unsatisfactory response from the Minister in our interesting mini-debate on this subject earlier today. At one stage, I thought that he was using his intelligence and common sense to accept our proposition that it would be quite wrong to start charging people who had been damaged in a serious motor accident, when the fire service turned up to rescue them. At one point, he seemed to have rejoined the human race and to be saying, "Yes, that would be inhuman, it would be wrong. I will give the House a guarantee that people will not have to reach for their credit card when the fire service turns up." I then asked him whether he would put that on the face of the Bill, but he said that there was no need, as he had given his word.

My hon. Friend the Member for Runnymede and Weybridge then tried to make the words clearer, so that he could then withdraw his amendment that would have prevented such charging, and the Minister backed off. He said that the Bill gave powers, but there was no present plan, and that after the next general election, if the Government were still in office, they might want to look at the matter again, and that perhaps studies would soon emerge that would mean that they would want to do that. He suggested that the power was there, but that perhaps local discretion had to be exercised.

The Minister used weasel words. He left open the possibility that people will be charged when they have had a serious accident. I would be happy to give way if the Minister wants to revise his view and categorically state that that there was never any intention whatever to charge people when they had been involved in accidents in their cars. I see from the Minister's—

It being Ten o'clock, MR. SPEAKER put forthwith the Question already proposed from the Chair, pursuant to Order [26 January].

Bill accordingly read the Third time, and passed.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Motion made, and Question proposed,

That, at the sittings on Tuesday 16th, Wednesday 24th and Thursday 25th March—

(1) consideration of any Lords Message relating to a Government Bill may be proceeded with, though opposed, until any hour; and

(2) the Speaker shall not adjourn the House until any Lords Message relating to such a Bill has been received or any Reasons Committee appointed at that sitting has reported.—[Mr. Ainger.]

Hon. Members: Object.

NORTHERN IRELAND AFFAIRS

Ordered,

That Mr Harry Barnes be discharged from the Northern Ireland Affairs Committee and Mr Stephen Hepburn be added.—[Mr. John McWilliam, on behalf of the Committee of Selection.]

PETITION

Muscular Dystrophy (Research Funding)

10.1 pm

Bob Spink (Castle Point) (Con): A bid submitted to the Department of Health for research funding could provide treatment that would substantially extend life and improve the quality of life of those who suffer from Duchenne muscular dystrophy. The bid was co-ordinated by the Right to Survive Campaign—a coalition of the Muscular Dystrophy Campaign, Parent Project UK and the Duchenne Family Support Group. Hon. Members will be aware of the terrible impact of the disease on individuals and their families, and they will understand my constituent's motives for compiling a petition.

I wish to present a petition, which states:

To the Honourable the Commons of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland in Parliament Assembled

The Humble Petition of Mr. and Mrs. Luxton and others of like disposition sheweth

That a consortium bid to the Department of Health for "molecular patch" Duchenne research, in the amount of £2.4 million, for funds under the White Paper on genetics for research into gene therapy for single gene disorders, has been submitted in October 2003.

Wherefore your Petitioners pray that your Honourable House shall urge the Government to bring pressure on the Secretary of State for Health to support the bid, but in any event, to ensure that the research is funded and goes forward.

And our Petitioners, as in duty bound, will ever pray.

To lie upon the Table.

MMR Vaccinations and Autism

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. Ainger.]

10.2 pm

Dr. Evan Harris (Oxford, West and Abingdon) (LD): I wish to discuss issues around clinical ethics and research ethics in the work done at the Royal Free hospital by the inflammatory bowel disease group since 1995. Before I start, I would like to declare my interests. I was a member of an all-party group that recently visited the American society of clinical oncology conference for four days in Chicago, which was organised and funded by the pharmaceutical company Aventis. I am a member of the British Medical Association medical ethics committee, although I am not speaking for that body. I also spent a number of years as a member of the central Oxford research ethics committee, which gave me direct experience of many of the issues that I will deal with tonight. I am a member of the all-party group on autism, and my father is a recently retired professor of paediatrics.

Autism is a serious condition, and all of us in the House need to be aware of how distressing it is to parents and other family members and how challenging and troubling autistic spectrum disorders are to the children and their families. The controversy surrounding the work of the inflammatory bowel disease group at the Royal Free should not detract from the need to improve the health and social care provided to the children or the need for more research into causation, diagnosis and treatment of developmental delay or regression in children. None of the criticisms that I make of the researchers, the ethical regulators and the Legal Services Commission should be taken to extend to the parents who gave their consent and co-operation to those studies in good faith. As we know, many of them still support the individuals involved and perhaps see no problem in what they did.

In the scandal over Dr. Andrew Wakefield's failure to declare financial and conflicts of interest when his research group's article was published in The Lancet six years ago, the welfare of the children who were his research subjects seems to have been forgotten. Documents revealed by the investigative journalist Brian Deer and by The Sunday Times raise major doubts about a far more serious matter than publication misconduct. By that, I mean doubts and allegations about whether children were exposed to unacceptable risks and unnecessary procedures.

I do not make those allegations lightly, conscious as I am of the need to avoid the abuse of parliamentary privilege, but there is very clear evidence pointing towards unethical conduct by the researchers—or by one or some of them—and equally strong evidence of failure and incompetence by the research ethics committee. The papers to which I refer are published on Brian Deer's website: www.briandeer.com

In 1996, and subsequently, researchers in the inflammatory bowel disease study group subjected children to a battery of invasive tests. Those included upper GI endoscopy, which is passing a flexible telescope down the throat into the stomach and upper gut through the mouth or nose; ileo-colonoscopy, which is passing a flexible telescope through the anus and rectum right round the large intestine and into the small bowel; and spinal taps, which is passing a needle into lower back to drain some of the fluid that bathes the brain and spinal cord. Those procedures are not trivial on consenting adults, let alone on autistic children, who must be heavily sedated or even anaesthetised. In addition to those tests, the children underwent blood tests, brain scans and monitoring of electric currents in the brain.

Glenda Jackson (Hampstead and Highgate) (Lab): Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Dr. Harris: I shall certainly give way to the constituency MP for the Royal Free hospital.

Glenda Jackson: I am delighted that the hon. Gentleman remembers that the hospital is in my constituency. Is he disputing the fact that the hospital's ethics committee was concerned, particularly about the fact that the project required children to undergo, as he has just pointed out, an intensive regime of investigation? The hospital's ethics committee put that point to the senior clinical investigator, Professor John Walker-Smith, who replied:

"I can confirm that the children would have these investigations even if there were no trial."

Dr. Harris: That is the key question, which I shall deal with. If that were the case, there would be less of a problem, although there would not be no problem at all. I do not believe that that was right then or that it is now.

In 1996, just as now, there were tough rules to protect children from being exposed to risk for research purposes. We are not judging this case by the standards of today but by the standards of 1996, when four separate sets of guidelines applied. The guidelines were published and circulated by the Department of Health in 1991, the British Paediatric Association—now the Royal College of Paediatrics and Child Health—in 1992, the General Medical Council in 1994 and the Royal College of Physicians in 1996. The guidelines made it clear that children should not be exposed to anything more invasive or risky than a blood test unless certain conditions—likely specific clinical benefit to the child—were met; that proper approval be sought in advance from a research ethics committee; that the advice and instructions of the research ethics committee be followed to the letter; that changes to the agreed arrangements be agreed in advance by the research ethics committee; and that patients or their parents be given all the necessary information about risks for them to able to give adequate and adequately informed consent.

The research ethics committee was bound by the same guidelines to refuse permission for any tests or procedures that were more than minimal risk if they were not in the best interests of the individual child. That means that so-called non-therapeutic research—as it was called at that time—where there was no likely clinical benefit to the child in terms of therapy, was not allowed to involve anything worse than a blood test.

I shall quote some of the guidance that existed around that time. The BPA guidelines 1992 state:

"Children are unique as a research group for many reasons. They are the only people, in British law, on whose behalf other individuals may consent to medical procedures. Many children are vulnerable, easily bewildered and frightened, and unable to express their needs or defend their interests . . . The physical integrity of children, as of all other people, is protected by law. Unless they, or their parents or guardians acting on their behalf, agree to it, nothing can be done lawfully that involves touching them . . . Parental consent will probably not be valid if it is given against the child's interests. This means that parents can consent to research procedures which are intended directly to benefit the child, but that research that does not come into this category can only be validly consented to if the risks are sufficiently small to mean that the research can be reasonably said not to go against the child's interests."

The Department of Health guidelines 1991 are similarly clear:

"Where the proposal is for non-therapeutic research, all of the above applies"— criteria for other patients—

"but in addition the child must be subject to no more than minimal risk as a result of his/her participation."

The local research ethics committee

"should note that those acting for the child can only legally give their consent provided that the intervention is for the benefit of the child."

The BPA was very clear about what sort of procedures were considered minimal risk, low risk and high risk:

"High risk procedures . . . should be carried out only when research is combined with diagnosis or treatment intended to benefit the child concerned. It would be unethical to submit child subjects to more than minimal risk when the procedure offers no benefit to them, or only a slight or very uncertain one."

Glenda Jackson: Is the hon. Gentleman disputing what Professor Humphrey Hodgson, the vice-dean and campus director at the Royal Free and University college medical school, said in a statement issued on behalf of the school and the Royal Free Hampstead NHS trust:

"The committee, after clarifying a number of issues . . . and having taken expert advice, approved the protocol submitted.

The clinical management and the investigation of these children was performed at the Free by a dedicated team of consultant paediatric gastroenterologists, in full consultation with and agreement of the parents of the affected children."

Dr. Harris: I disagree with the Royal Free when it says that the protocol was subject to rigorous ethical analysis, and I shall say why I do not think that the necessary requirements were met.

Glenda Jackson: Will the hon. Gentleman give way again?

Dr. Harris: I wish to make some progress, if I may.

According to papers released to The Sunday Times by the strategic health authority, the research ethics committee did not appear to ask an independent outside expert—that is, someone who is independent and outside and expert—whether the battery of tests could be considered of therapeutic value to the children. In fact, after publication of the paper, the research ethics committee tried to claim that it was not even its job to make a judgment about whether procedures were in the children's best interests. That in itself is a shocking admission of incompetence, so the Department of Health should investigate every ethics approval that the committee has ever given for research on children, to see whether anything else was allowed through—in effect, on the nod.

The published paper stated that the investigations had been granted clinical ethical approval by the ethical practices committee of the Royal Free, but the research ethics committee says, in a letter from the chairman to the dean, dated 24 July 1998:

"On 9th July you wrote to me for my comment on the letter of Professor David Hull. In his letter Professor Hull states: 'I see that the investigations were approved by the Ethical Practices Committee of the Royal Free Hospital NHS Trust.' This is, of course, incorrect. We did not approve the investigations."

However, the paper says clearly that the investigations were approved by the ethical practices committee of the Royal Free hospital. They cannot both be right. I suspect that both are wrong, in some ways, but one at least is wrong.

As it happens, the researchers had submitted their application in a form to which approval might have been given, even if the research ethics committee had looked at it properly. The researchers asked for permission to carry out the tests on 25 children with a condition known as disintegrative disorder, which is also known as disintegrative psychosis or Heller's disease. DD is a much worse form of developmental disorder than autism, and the researchers stressed in their application that it is separate from autism. They said, in paragraph 5, "Scientific background", that "disintegrative disorder differs from autism in the loss of motor and self-help skills and usually, too, in the lack of more complex stereotype behavioral patterns".

The researchers were clear on that point, and it is still the accepted view today. DD is of later onset and involves significant loss of acquired skills. DD is rare and, in a few cases, can be caused by a metabolic disorder that can be detected by high lactate levels in the cerebrospinal fluid. It could be argued that doing spinal taps on such children would allow doctors to diagnose a metabolic disorder, or to rule it out. Since such diseases are not treatable, generally speaking, the benefit is limited, but at least a benefit can be argued. However, no major group of doctors in the UK argued at the time, or argues now, that spinal taps be performed on children with autism for any clinical benefit, and certainly not as an excuse to obtain cerebrospinal fluid for private research contracts.

Despite getting research ethics approval to perform the tests only on children with disintegrative disorder and despite the researchers stating that the tests were clinically necessary to benefit the children, the published research shows that not one of the 12 children had DD. One was diagnosed "Autism? DD?", but not one had DD. Most had autism. In another paper published later in 1998—an abstract in Gut—the authors admit to carrying out the tests on 30 children, only two of whom had DD. By 2000, some 60 children had been subjected to endoscopies, according to an article in The American Journal of Gastroenterology, of whom only two had DD. When the research ethics committee gave approval for the application it saw, it made it clear that any changes to the proposed tests or the group of children should be cleared with it in advance. That is standard, and it is written in the letter of approval. The research ethics committee received no such request to change the protocol, so up to 30 children were experimented on with no proper ethical approval and with no likelihood of individual clinical benefit.

Glenda Jackson: Is it not the case that, in the initial request, the criteria for investigation were that children "should have disintegrative disorder; have symptoms and signs of intestinal dysfunction, and there was a parental request for investigation to be undertaken"?

Is it not also the case that disintegrative disorder is a syndrome that is part of the autistic spectrum?

Dr. Harris: The selection criteria at paragraph 7 of the protocol application include "presence of disintegrative disorder"; the applicants state that the syndrome is separate, and it is established in their argument that it could be caused by something that would make a CSF test worth doing, but not by autism. Autism was not mentioned in the scientific background; had it been, I suspect that the procedure would rightly not have been permitted. When CSF tests on autistic children were required for Legal Services Commission purposes, no hospital in the UK gave ethics approval and children had to be taken to America for the tests. I hope that the hon. Lady understands the point that I making—[Interruption.] I want to continue.

It turns out that Dr. Wakefield was receiving undisclosed funding for at least four of the children from the Legal Aid Board for some of the results. A central component of the deal was genetic analysis of fluid collected from those spinal taps, with further undisclosed payments for genetic analysis of biopsy samples from the bowels, following endoscopy. The evidence strongly suggests that, from start to finish of his research, Dr. Wakefield withheld the information about his legal aid board funding interest from the REC.

The question in the protocol application under paragraph 10 was,

"How are the substances for the study being provided, and how is the study being funded?"

The reply was

"Clinical research at the Royal Free Hospital (ECR)".

There was no mention of any Legal Aid Board funding. The failure to disclose that information suggests that even the approval Dr. Wakefield received for 25 children with DD may be invalid. It also seems clear that he had no ethical approval to carry out those procedures on any child who did not have DD.

Without ethical approval, the consent that the doctors obtained from the parents may not be valid. Without a valid consent, doctors could face action for assault. I do not dispute that the parents gave consent in good faith, knowing that there was REC approval for the study—albeit apparently for a different study from the one that was carried out—but even valid parental consent does not make it lawful to conduct high-risk research procedures on children with no likely clinical benefit.

Glenda Jackson: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Dr. Harris: I must conclude, so that the Minister has time to reply.

The whole affair seems dubious. It is not just that there was non-declaration of interest, nor that up to 30 children were exposed to invasive procedures under those tests, but that many more may have been thus exposed in tests agreed and funded by the Legal Services Commission with no ethical oversight at all.

The GMC—currently the Government's favoured path—cannot investigate or judge the LSC. It cannot look into the actions of non-medically qualified management. It cannot make recommendations to prevent any such practices from happening again, nor can it look for similar acts. That is why an independent inquiry is needed—not a hospital inquiry. The accused cannot investigate themselves, especially because, as the letter read out by the hon. Member for Hampstead and Highgate (Glenda Jackson) shows, they have already declared themselves not guilty.

An independent inquiry is needed and the Government must order one. After all, such activities could still be going on at the Royal Free or elsewhere. Children need protection from that sort of research behaviour. If the Government cannot guarantee that it is no longer happening at the Royal Free or anywhere else, they have no choice but to order an independent inquiry.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Health (Miss Melanie Johnson): I congratulate the hon. Member for Oxford, West and Abingdon (Dr. Harris) on securing a debate on this important subject.

Like all Members, I care greatly about the health and safety of children and I am reassured that some of the infectious diseases that used to be devastating in childhood are now seen only rarely, if at all in some cases. It is easy to forget the impact that some of those diseases had. Nowadays, parents in the UK never see their children crippled by polio. Diphtheria and tetanus are exceptionally rare in children. Since the meningitis C vaccine was introduced in the UK in the 1990s, it has cut the rate of that terrible disease by 95 per cent.

Immunisation in the UK has been greatly successful at protecting children against preventable diseases, and all those achievements have happened because of effective vaccination programmes. In particular, measles cases fell from more than 70,000 a year in 1987—before MMR was introduced—to fewer than 100 per year in 1999. Before MMR, there were between 15 and 20 deaths each year, but no child has died of acute measles for a decade.

One of the greatest achievements was the prevention of congenital rubella syndrome and the avoidance of rubella-associated terminations of pregnancy. In 2001, there was not one single case of congenital rubella syndrome in England and Wales in which a woman acquired the infection in this country. Let us not forget mumps. Before MMR, it was the commonest cause of viral meningitis and lead to around 1,200 hospital admissions a year. The MMR vaccine has dealt a hammer blow to these three serious diseases of childhood and has released children from the risk of death and disability as a consequence, which is something with which I know that the hon. Gentleman and my hon. Friend the Member for Hampstead and Highgate (Glenda Jackson) agree.

The hon. Gentleman indicated that he is well aware of the significant media interest in MMR following the findings of an investigative journalist, Mr. Brian Deer, from The Sunday Times. Mr. Deer raised several concerns about the research carried out at the Royal Free hospital that first claimed a link between MMR and autism. The first concern was an alleged conflict of interest, and the editor of The Lancet has made it clear that the information now makes the original Lancet paper "fatally flawed". The second concern is about ethics approval for the research carried out at the Royal Free hospital, and I shall address that matter next.

As the hon. Gentleman emphasised, ethical approval, especially regarding children, is an essential part of medical research, and such medical research involving children is a matter of increasing concern. It can be an important means of promoting child health and well-being, but as the Royal College of Paediatrics and Child Health clearly recognises in its "Guidelines for the ethical conduct of medical research involving children",

> "Children are unique as a research group for many reasons. They are the only people, in British law, on whose behalf other individuals may consent to medical procedures. Many children are vulnerable, easily bewildered and frightened, and unable to express their needs or defend their interests."

The importance of evaluating the possible benefit, harm and cost of research on human beings, and the possible ways of carrying out that research, are key issues. The benefits of research can be great, especially if the condition being investigated is common or if the research has a high chance of success. Possible harm must be assessed with equal care, and possible considerations of harm include questions of how invasive the type of intervention is, how severe the risks associated with the research procedures are, and how likely damage is to occur. These are common-sense issues that are difficult to question. Any parent would expect that research carried out on their children should have addressed those issues thoroughly and carefully, but balancing the pros and cons of research is often complex, as I know that the hon. Gentleman appreciates. Research ethics committees play a vital role in considering the issues and advising on what is acceptable and what is not.

Ethics committees are faced with the paradox of trying to be both stringent assessors and an approachable forum to help researchers to resolve problems. They have to compromise between aiming for the perfect protocol in advance and encouraging researchers to respond to families' unpredictable responses, which might require changes to research design later on.

Questions have been raised about whether the lumbar punctures and colonoscopies that were carried out on children at the Royal Free were justified. Both interventions are invasive and are not undertaken lightly. Lumbar puncture—during which cerebrospinal fluid is extracted from the spinal cord for examination—is undoubtedly unpleasant and is not risk-free. Colonoscopies are unpleasant and distressing to the patient, and carry the risk of complications, such as perforation of the bowel.

Should children at the Royal Free have undergone such investigations? Professor Sir David Hull and Professor Brent Taylor raised concerns in 1998. The research team believes that the investigations were justified, but I cannot say what was clinically justified for each of the children in the study. However, that shows why the approval of research proposals by ethics committees is so important.

Glenda Jackson: Is it not also the case that the independent ethical committee raised those very issues in 1996, before permission was given for the investigations to proceed?

Miss Johnson: I am not an expert on all the details of the arrangements and I would not want to disagree with what my hon. Friend suggests, but we need to be certain that the right processes are being carried out. Ethics is about good practice. As the Royal College of Paediatrics and Child Health recommends, each research ethics committee that considers a project involving children should be advised by people with a close practical knowledge of babies and children. The ethics committee also needs to have, or to have access to, the appropriate expertise to cover the breadth of issues dealt with by the research proposal. That is demanding because of the complexity of much of the research undertaken. Input from independent experts is a means of ensuring that the committee can cover all the issues.

The hon. Gentleman made an important point about the management of research at the Royal Free. I am sure that the hospital and my hon. Friend, as the local MP, will take careful note of his points and that the hospital will consider his concerns in the light of the statements it has made.

The General Medical Council is considering serious matters of research and ethical conduct. We must await its deliberations and its indication of how it intends to take them forward in using its statutory powers. I assure the House that should aspects of the case require further scrutiny or investigation at that point, we will give them the most serious consideration and act appropriately. I assure the hon. Gentleman that we are waiting for the outcome of the GMC's deliberations and will give them careful consideration. I trust that the Royal Free will also look at what he said and think about the appropriate response.

Dr. Evan Harris: I am grateful to the Minister for her considered response. I raised my concerns with her some days ago. Does she accept that the GMC cannot consider the conduct of, and the procedures that were funded by, the Legal Services Commission because that is not part of the inquiry? Does she also accept that there may be other practices elsewhere of which she and the Department of Health may wish to take note? Are there not grounds for considering a wider inquiry, because there may be another form of investigation—by the Crown Prosecution Service—for which the GMC would want to wait?

Miss Johnson: It is conceivable, although perhaps not likely—it is not for me to comment on the likelihood either way—that the case has not been brought to a final conclusion. The LSC has refused to grant further financial support for the litigants' case and it appears that it will not continue. However, notwithstanding the privileges that the House enjoys, it would not be appropriate for us to comment on something on which theoretically, if not practically, legal proceedings were still pending.

I take the hon. Gentleman's point about the ethics committees. I am sure that the Royal Free has listened carefully to what he said.

Question put and agreed to.

Adjourned accordingly at twenty-eight minutes past Ten o'clock.

Oral Answers to Questions

SCOTLAND

The Secretary of State was asked—

Common Fisheries Policy

1. Mr. Alex Salmond (Banff and Buchan) (SNP): What recent representations he has had from the Scottish fishing industry on the common fisheries policy; and if he will make a statement. [160301]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Scotland (Mrs. Anne McGuire): My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Scotland and I have had no specific representations from the Scottish fishing industry recently, but as Scottish Members we have received written communications from the Scottish Fishermen's Federation. We are fully aware of the industry's concern and I am a member of the ministerial steering committee for the UK-wide fisheries study undertaken by the Prime Minister's strategy unit.

Mr. Salmond: Is the Minister aware that, as of today, if half the Scottish white fish fleet goes to the major haddock fishing area at a time of record haddock stocks, it will be forced to discard the fish caught dead over the side into the sea? Everyone knows that the map on which the regulations are based is wrong—it is admitted by the European Commission, the Scottish Executive and fisheries Ministers here—and over the past four weeks we have been promised appropriate changes within days, so as of today what is the Minister going to do to prevent thousands of tonnes of quality fish being used to feed seagulls? What exact intervention does the Secretary of State propose to make to prevent that fishing disaster and environmental obscenity?

Mrs. McGuire: The hon. Gentleman, as usual when he tries to advocate a case, goes into hyperbole. I think that references to an environmental disaster, which I have read in this morning's press, do no credit to his case. However, there is no need for the Secretary of State to step in because, as the hon. Gentleman knows, the fisheries Department has been in weekly contact with the Commission since the beginning of the year to deal with the variations that he has raised. We hope that those outstanding issues will be resolved soon. The Under-Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs, my hon. Friend the Member for Exeter (Mr. Bradshaw), the Minister with responsibility for fisheries, is awaiting the proposals from the Commission, and I understand that it is treating it as a matter of some urgency.

Dr. Gavin Strang (Edinburgh, East and Musselburgh) (Lab): Has my hon. Friend had time yet to read the report of the Royal Society of Edinburgh inquiry into the future of the Scottish fishing industry? Does she support the recommendation that the International Council for the Exploration of the Sea should consider abandoning virtual population analysis as the principal method of determining stock sizes? Those are, of course, the stock sizes that the European Union uses to determine the total allowable catches and quotas for our fishermen.

Mrs. McGuire: I thank my right hon. Friend for the question. The Royal Society of Edinburgh has published an authoritative report over the past couple of days. It would be premature for me to comment on any one of the 35 recommendations, but I know that the acting fisheries Minister in Scotland has already said that he welcomes the report and, obviously, we will take those recommendations into consideration when looking at the strategy unit report. It is also worth highlighting, however, that the Royal Society of Edinburgh has clearly indicated that there is absolutely no merit in our withdrawing from the common fisheries policy and that we have to resolve these issues within the framework of a reformed common fisheries policy.

Mr. Peter Duncan (Galloway and Upper Nithsdale) (Con): The Minister will recall that in January I asked her whether she could give me one positive result arising out of Scotland's membership of the common fisheries policy over 30 years. She has had nine weeks to consider the matter. Can she give me one positive outcome?

Mrs. McGuire: The hon. Gentleman is being naive or disingenuous or both, because the reality is—he and his party need to realise it—that, if we did not have a framework for fisheries management in the North sea under the common fisheries policy, we would have to invent one. We share our fisheries stock and our fisheries area with other members of the European Union, so the question that he asks is totally naive.

Mr. Alan Reid (Argyll and Bute) (LD): Does the Minister agree that the common fisheries policy has failed because it is over-centralised, and that it needs to be replaced by a new system managed by regional management committees, involving fishermen working with Government and scientists in order to produce a policy that is both sustainable and fair in enforcement?

Mrs. McGuire: The hon. Gentleman will be aware that one of the platforms on which we conduct our negotiations in the European Union is that we are keen to have reform of the common fisheries policy, with more decentralisation of stock management. We are probably nearly, if not totally, at one on that.

Whisky Strip Stamps

2. Pete Wishart (North Tayside) (SNP): When he last met the Chancellor of the Exchequer to discuss the introduction of whisky strip stamps. [160302]

The Secretary of State for Scotland (Mr. Alistair Darling): I have regular discussions with my right hon. Friend the Chancellor on a wide range of matters.

Pete Wishart: I get a strong sense that the Chancellor intends to pursue the introduction of these costly and fraud-prone strip stamps in tomorrow's Budget, which would have a dramatic effect on the whole Scotch whisky industry, including Dewar's, Blair Atholl and Edradour in my constituency. Will the Secretary of State urge him, at the eleventh hour, to consider properly the National Audit Office report that concludes that the financial basis for strip stamps is at best unreliable? Will he also ensure that the Scotch whisky industry's own sensible counter-fraud proposals are once again thrust in front of the Chancellor before he brings that red box into the Chamber tomorrow?

Mr. Darling: I have seen the NAO report, and the hon. Gentleman is right in that it says that far more work needs to be done on the exact figures, but what is not in doubt is that fraud is a problem. Having spoken to the Scotch Whisky Association, I know that it is aware of that. He will appreciate that, as the Budget statement is just over 24 hours away, it might be best to wait and see what the Chancellor proposes, and I do not think that I should say any more in advance of that.

Mr. Michael Connarty (Falkirk, East) (Lab): First, I want to put on record my thanks to my hon. Friend the Economic Secretary for meeting Mr. Vivian Imerman, the owner of Whyte and Mackay, at my request to discuss the problems that may arise with strip stamps on whisky bottles. At Grangemouth in my constituency there will be an added cost to the production process, putting an extra £4 million on top of the £20 million that is being invested there, but the biggest problem is the pay-back time for the excise duty. It is possible to have a fiscally neutral pay-back time, above 140 days. Will my right hon. Friend take that up with the Chancellor to ensure that, if the system is to be introduced, it is at least fiscally neutral and the tax does not cripple the industry?

Mr. Darling: My hon. Friend is right in that there have been many discussions, including the meeting to which he referred. However, I repeat that, with the Budget statement so imminent, it would not be wise for me to speculate about what might be in it.

John Thurso (Caithness, Sutherland and Easter Ross) (LD): May I first draw attention to my entry in the Register of Members' Interests?

The Secretary of State will be aware of the pitfalls of unintended legislation. Perhaps he will recall the advice given two years ago by many Members of Parliament to the Treasury in respect of the oil industry—advice that went unheeded, with the result that many jobs were lost. As the Scotch spirits industry represents about 68,000 jobs in Scotland, will he urge the Chancellor not to play fast and loose with this important industry and to listen to the wise counsel from throughout the House, that strip stamps will not produce the revenue gains that he intends and could have serious consequences for the industry?

Mr. Darling: I was not aware of the hon. Gentleman's entry in the Resister of Members' Interests, but I will have a look at it. If he is pleading guilty to liking the stuff, I expect that a few more of us could join him. He mentioned the oil industry and the whisky industry. Of course, the Government are alive to the importance of both, but we must also be alive to other considerations for the wider public good. I assure him that, whatever the Chancellor announces, he will have had regard to all the relevant factors. Normally, I like to be helpful to the House, but at this stage, having been a Treasury Minister, everything tells me that I should say nothing further.

Mr. Ian Davidson (Glasgow, Pollok) (Lab/Co-op): While not wishing to say anything further, will my right hon. Friend none the less take into consideration the fact that the National Audit Office, in examining the statistical evidence of fraud, accepted that there was a possible variation in its scale between £10 million and £1 billion? Given that wide range, does he accept that more work needs to be done before a final decision is taken, and that that would allow more time for the industry's own proposals to be examined more rigorously?

Mr. Darling: There is a limit to how many more times I can say nothing in particular, despite seven years' experience of trying very hard. The point that my hon. Friend makes about fraud is similar to the one made by the hon. Member for North Tayside (Pete Wishart). What is beyond doubt—here, there is common ground—is that fraud is a problem in the spirits trade. The question is how best it can be dealt with. As I have said many times—subject to you, Mr. Speaker, I may do so on a few more occasions—given that the Chancellor is making his Budget statement tomorrow, I cannot usefully or prudently add anything to it.

Mr. Peter Duncan (Galloway and Upper Nithsdale) (Con): I doubt whether the House has quite grasped the notion that the Secretary of State describes. Last month, we established that he was not consulted before the Government again raised the spectre of whisky strip stamps, so he may not have heard the Economic Secretary to the Treasury confirm that the industry's counter-proposals were received in time for consideration, and that their timing should not of necessity rule them out. Given that they were submitted in time and would eliminate more fraud more quickly, what is the basis for the Chancellor's not being persuaded by them?

Mr. Darling: As I said just a few moments ago, the Chancellor is coming here tomorrow afternoon—perhaps that fact has passed the hon. Gentleman by—to deliver something called the Budget, in which he sets out his proposals and takes into account all the matters that have been raised. In order to vary my answer, I ask the hon. Gentleman to reflect on the fact that, had Conservative policies continued during the past seven years, an extra £1 in duty per bottle of whisky would have been charged.

Mr. Duncan: Perhaps I can elicit a further response from the Secretary of State. Whose side is he on in this debate? Will he stand up for the 40,000 Scots jobs that are at risk, or is he the new "Gordon's gopher" in the Scotland Office, doing the bidding of one who would be future leader? By way of observation, whose side is he on?

Mr. Darling: The hon. Gentleman is confused as to just how many jobs there are in the industry, which does not surprise me. As I discovered the other day, this is the man—a member of the Conservative and Unionist party—who has predicted that if it is elected, it will destroy the Union of the United Kingdom. This is the same man who thinks that the Mersey Tunnels Bill is Scottish business, so it is hard to take him entirely seriously. But as I have said on many occasions, I am in the very happy position of always being in complete agreement with whatever the Government happen to be doing.

Electoral Arrangements

3. Mr. George Foulkes (Carrick, Cumnock and Doon Valley) (Lab/Co-op): When he expects to announce the membership of his commission on common boundaries and electoral systems. [160303]

The Secretary of State for Scotland (Mr. Alistair Darling): The process to establish an independent commission to look at boundary differences and voting systems in Scotland is under way. I hope to announce its chairman and membership shortly.

Mr. Foulkes: I welcome the setting up of this commission, not least because I was one of the people who suggested that it be set up. The Secretary of State can answer this question directly as it does not relate to the Budget or any other such matters. Can he get the commission up and running as soon as possible, and will he ensure that it reports in time for us to legislate for common boundaries for the Scottish elections in 2007?

Mr. Darling: I doubt whether this issue will be covered in the Budget, so perhaps I can be a little more helpful. As I told the House when we discussed these matters, I am anxious to get the commission up and running as quickly as possible. The question of voting systems is a live issue in Scotland, and no good would be served by simply letting things drift. I have written to the leaders of all the parties in this House with Scottish representation, asking them to put forward names for consideration. That process is under way, but I am anxious to get the membership established as quickly as possible, because I want the commission to start its work and to reach its conclusions as quickly as it can, insofar as that is consistent, of course, with its obligation to look at all these matters thoroughly.

Mr. James Gray (North Wiltshire) (Con): It is now more than a month since the Secretary of State announced—on 9 February—that the commission will be set up and will start work "straight away", and that he will consult the other parties about its chairmanship and membership. More important, will the Secretary of State confirm what he meant when he said that the commission

"will consider the case for change"?—[Official Report, 9 February 2004; Vol. 417, c. 1151.]

Is it possible that it will conclude that there should be no such change? Could it perhaps agree with the hon. Member for Cunninghame, North (Mr. Wilson), who said of the Bill in question:

"I cannot find any conceivable public interest that will be served by it. On the contrary, it is, as we all know, simply the legislative follow-up to a political fix."—[Official Report, 9 February 2004; Vol. 417, c. 1180.]

Could the commission come to that conclusion?

Mr. Darling: What the commission will not be able to do is to reopen the question of whether there will be a reduction in the number of Members of Parliament representing Scottish constituencies. If I remember rightly, that is one of the matters that my hon. Friend the Member for Cunninghame, North (Mr. Wilson) was concerned about. It cannot do that, but it will examine the consequences, assuming that the changes to Scottish local government go through, of having four different systems for electing people in a comparatively small country. As to the hon. Gentleman's first point, I am anxious to make progress in setting up the commission. In that respect, if he would like to have a word with the leader of his Scottish party about replying to my letter, that would be most helpful.

Mr. Mark Lazarowicz (Edinburgh, North and Leith) (Lab/Co-op): When the commission meets, will my right hon. Friend ensure that it reflects not just on the problems caused by having five different electoral systems in Scotland or the problems of having different boundaries for MSP and MP constituencies, but on the fact that different boundaries will apply—as well as to MSPs and MPs—to local authorities, local enterprise companies, health boards and many other aspects of government? Will the Secretary of State work with the First Minister to ensure that the commission begins to tackle those problems, too?

Mr. Darling: It will certainly look into the problems that arise from the lack of coterminous boundaries between Westminster parliamentary constituencies and those that apply in Holyrood, but I am anxious not to pile too much work on the commission. Otherwise, the point made by the my right hon. Friend the Member for Carrick, Cumnock and Doon Valley (Mr. Foulkes) is relevant, and we will end up with the commission never reporting, which would not be helpful. There is some concern about the fact that, for the next few years, boundaries will not be coterminous, which can lead to all sorts of difficulties and misunderstandings. This is a matter on which there is almost a parliamentary consensus that something must be done, but probably no consensus on what precisely should be done. I have explained what issues need to be examined and I should like, through you, Mr. Speaker, to urge party leaders who have yet to reply to me to do so rather quickly if they have any names to recommend.

Heroin Addiction

4. John Mann (Bassetlaw) (Lab): What assessment he has made of the use of (a) subutex, (b) naltraxone and (c) methadone in the treatment of heroin addicts in Scotland. [160304]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Scotland (Mrs. Anne McGuire): The specific forms of treatment for individuals are regarded as a decision for medical practitioners and the treatment regimes for heroin addicts in Scotland are devolved and a matter for the Scottish Executive.

John Mann: It is unusual for Scotland to keep its achievements under wraps, but the methadone programmes in Scotland are significantly more advanced and better than those in England and Wales. Does the Minister agree that, having been ahead of the game by some 10 to 15 years, Scotland should now catch up with other countries, such as Sweden, France and Australia, that are even further ahead? They not only have effective methadone programmes in place, but have moved on to even more successful programmes using buprenorphine and naltraxone.

Mrs. McGuire: I thank my hon. Friend for his interest in the way in which we have tackled this terrible blight in Scotland. I know that he has actively campaigned on the issue of drug misuse and treatment in his own constituency and that he facilitated a recent heroin inquiry, which has driven some of the agenda in his own area. He is right to say that we have invested significant energy and resources in tackling drugs in Scotland: additional resources have certainly been invested in recent years. I will draw my hon. Friend's comments to the attention of my colleagues in the Scottish Executive.

Financial Sector

5. Jim Sheridan (West Renfrewshire) (Lab): What assessment he has made of the recent performance of the financial sector in Scotland. [160305]

The Secretary of State for Scotland (Mr. Alistair Darling): The financial services sector in Scotland remains of crucial importance to the health of the Scottish economy. Output has continued to grow in recent years and the sector currently employs more than 100,000 people in Scotland.

Jim Sheridan: I thank my right hon. Friend for his answer, but does he share my concern that despite the excessive profits, which of themselves are welcome, the workers who have generated them are worried about losing their jobs through outsourcing? Some of the profits should be reinvested into training employees who are rightly concerned about losing their jobs.

Mr. Darling: I fully understand people's concern about the outsourcing of some jobs within the financial services sector, particularly in call centres. However, it is encouraging that some institutions—the Royal Bank of Scotland, for example—examined the position and decided to keep the work in-house. In any growing and dynamic economy, some jobs will be relocated elsewhere in Europe or other parts of the world, but it is encouraging that more jobs are being created in Scotland, including in some call centres. I notice that a recent independent survey found that many people in the financial services sector expected to be recruiting this year. That is encouraging.

Finally, in relation to the general profitability of Scottish companies, it is a very good thing that there are so many profitable institutions in Scotland. If we want a growing economy and more employment in Scotland, we need to encourage the growth of profitable companies. That is the best way for our economy to thrive in the future.

Mr. David Marshall (Glasgow, Shettleston) (Lab): I welcome the success of the Scottish financial sector, but does my right hon. Friend accept that most people would agree with my hon. Friend the Member for West Renfrewshire (Jim Sheridan) that some of the profits are excessive and unfairly distributed? Those profits benefit the few, not the many, and employees and consumers should get a fairer and better deal from the financial sector. Will my right hon. Friend convey to the Chancellor of the Exchequer the suggestion that a windfall tax be levied on excessive profits?

Mr. Darling: No. I have to tell my hon. Friend that I am not attracted to that. The distribution of a company's profits is a matter for its shareholders or members, and employees must sort out their remuneration with their employers. However, the problem in Scotland has too often been that we have not had enough companies that were profitable. More people would be employed if we had more profitable companies, and such companies would expand and continue to do well. Scotland happens to be the home of some of the largest banks in the world. I, for one, would like to encourage that. I am sorry that I cannot agree with my hon. Friend's proposal. Instead, we should concentrate on trying to get more profitable sectors in the Scottish economy, because that is the way to achieve long-term success.

ADVOCATE-GENERAL FOR SCOTLAND

The Advocate-General was asked—

Devolution

15. Mr. Alan Reid (Argyll and Bute) (LD): What devolution issues have been raised with her since 10 February. [160317]

16. Annabelle Ewing (Perth) (SNP): What devolution issues have been raised since 10 February. [160318]

17. Miss Anne McIntosh (Vale of York) (Con): What devolution issues she has considered since 10 February. [160319]

The Advocate-General for Scotland (Dr. Lynda Clark): Since 10 February, there have been 39 devolution issues intimated to me. Almost all related to criminal matters, including pre-trial delay, the system for setting the punishment part of life sentences, failure to communicate information required by sea fishing measures, and self-incrimination. In the civil sphere, minutes related to the refusal of scheduled monument consent and breach of prison rules.

Mr. Reid: The Advocate-General referred to sea fishing measures. I draw her attention to the Fisheries Jurisdiction Bill. Does it contain anything that she believes would be incompatible with European law? If so, why? What consequences would there be for the UK if the Bill were to become law?

The Advocate-General: I have a copy of the Bill, and have even read it. I hate to disappoint the hon. Gentleman, but it is not really for me to advise him about the Bill. The Bill is interesting, but has one or two obvious problems.

Annabelle Ewing: The Advocate-General is Scotland's senior Law Officer at Westminster. Has she seen the full advice from the Attorney-General on Iraq?

The Advocate-General: The hon. Lady is right to say that I am the senior Scottish Law Officer here, but I remind her that the convention means that it would not be appropriate for me to give any information about that.

Miss McIntosh: This is the first Question Time since the Advocate-General gave notice that she is to leave the House at the next election, so it is appropriate to pay tribute to the work that she has done. Her close neighbour the Secretary of State has distanced himself from her on the Front Bench today. I should have liked there to be a contest between them, but I am sure that the right hon. Gentleman will wish her well in her career.

The Advocate-General said today, for the second consecutive month, that one of the devolution issues raised with her was pre-trial delays. Will she put my mind at rest that she will preserve the 110-day rule to the best of her ability? It has served extremely well to protect people accused of a crime from unnecessary delays before their cases are brought to trial, but I gather that it may be at risk. I hope that she can assure the House that the matter will be resolved, and that the 110-day rule will be kept in Scotland.

The Advocate-General: I am grateful to the hon. Lady for her good wishes and hope to be with her for a little longer. She knows that the 110-day rule is a matter of criminal procedure that falls within the remit of the Scottish Executive. It has been an admired feature of the Scottish system for many years and ensures that accused are tried within a reasonable time and not kept in prison. It has been changed in the past, however, and the European convention on human rights bears upon trial within a reasonable period. The Scottish Executive have examined the matter and will consider it in the round, and we will see the results in due course.

CONSTITUTIONAL AFFAIRS

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State was asked—

Supreme Court

18. Mr. Tam Dalyell (Linlithgow) (Lab): What representations the Department has had from Scottish lawyers on the establishment of a supreme court. [161258]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Constitutional Affairs (Mr. Christopher Leslie): The Department for Constitutional Affairs received responses from eight people readily identifiable as Scottish lawyers and, separately, from eight Scottish legal organisations in response to the Department for Constitutional Affairs consultation paper on the creation of a supreme court for the United Kingdom.

Mr. Dalyell: What contribution will be made from Scottish resources—court fees paid by civil litigants in Scotland—to the running of a supreme court?

Mr. Leslie: The question of running costs will be scrutinised during the passage of the Constitutional Reform Bill. In England and Wales, costs are recovered by full-cost recovery from the fees imposed on litigants. That would obviously make sense in other jurisdictions but it is clearly a devolved matter for Scotland, and we will continue to discuss it with the Scottish Executive.

Mr. Nick Hawkins (Surrey Heath) (Con): After that non-answer, which reveals that the Minister does not know the answer to the question, perhaps the Minister will acknowledge the huge concern north of the border at the lack of consultation by the Government on the supreme court and its creation. He mentioned that he has received representations, but will he have the grace to acknowledge that there is strong concern within the Scottish Parliament, which was not consulted properly, the Scottish media and all the Scottish legal organisations? This is yet another Government shambles—they do not consult properly and just indulge in constitutional vandalism.

Mr. Leslie: I do not know whether the hon. Gentleman noticed that when the Scottish Parliament debated many of those issues the motion was passed overwhelmingly. We have discussed the fee issue with the Scottish Executive. As I have said, we have full-cost recovery in England and Wales for civil litigation, and it would make sense in other jurisdictions too. However, the matter is devolved, and it is therefore important to discuss it with the Scottish Executive so that they can help to resolve it, which is a straightforward process.

Annabelle Ewing (Perth) (SNP): Will the Minister accept that if the UK Government bulldoze the proposals through, it will, as senior legal figures in Scotland have stated on numerous occasions, be at the expense of the independence and integrity of the Scottish legal system?

Mr. Leslie: No, not at all. It is right that the Bill is scrutinised properly, and the other place has made it known that it would prefer more scrutiny. I hope that the concern about scrutiny is genuine and not just a mechanism to oppose the Bill wholesale. The principle—separating the judiciary from the political realm—is simple and important, and I would have thought that the hon. Lady would welcome it.

19. Kevin Brennan (Cardiff, West) (Lab): If he will make a statement on the progress of plans to establish a supreme court. [161259]

20. Mr. David Kidney (Stafford) (Lab): What the timetable is for establishing a supreme court. [161260]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Constitutional Affairs (Mr. Christopher Leslie): The Government are committed to the objective of the Constitutional Reform Bill being enacted in this Parliament.

Kevin Brennan: I thank my hon. Friend for that answer. I understand that the objection to the supreme court by Lord Chief Justice Woolf, which might have caused some delay, is not based on the principle of whether we should have a supreme court. Indeed, he might be in favour of it if it has a new building. On that basis, will my hon. Friend draw the attention of Lord Chief Justice Woolf to the Lyons report on the devolution of jobs away from London and suggest using a building such as Cardiff city hall? That building would be available for use, and the Government could house the supreme court there and satisfy Lord Chief Justice Woolf at the same time.

Mr. Leslie: My hon. Friend is right in that many hon. Members and noble Lords are keen to know the location of the proposed UK supreme court, and we are working on those proposals. However, it would be wrong and potentially commercially prejudicial to our case if we were to start disclosing preferred options. My hon. Friends might seek to locate such a body outside the capital city, but I personally think that it would be best to have a UK supreme court based in the UK's capital city.

Mr. Kidney: This is not a bid for Stafford to host the new supreme court's building, welcome though justices of the supreme court would always be in Stafford if they chose to visit. As the House has modern procedures for pre-legislative scrutiny, including ad hoc Joint Committees with members of the other place, and for the carry-over of Bills from one Session to the next, would it be possible to withdraw the Bill in the other place and start again here?

Mr. Leslie: Following the vote that took place in the House of Lords last week and the Lords' decision to have a Select Committee scrutiny process, we are in discussion with other parties about exactly what that would entail. Our intention is to ensure that the legislation is enacted in this Parliament, and we do not see any reason why that should not be possible. We are happy to discuss the scrutiny process as long as it is not just a device to prevent progress.

Mr. David Heath (Somerton and Frome) (LD): Now that we have this delay—occasioned entirely by the incompetence of the Bill's genesis—will the Government use it profitably by engaging with the Select Committee in the other place to find satisfactory means for judicial appointments, to satisfy the requirement for judicial accommodation and to strengthen judicial independence? When the Bill comes to this House, whether carried over or not, will the Minister ensure that it is debated on the Floor of the House, as befits a major constitutional issue, and that we have sufficient time to examine all the consequences of one of the most important Bills in this Parliament?

Mr. Leslie: I realise that the hon. Gentleman is cynical about our desire to see scrutiny of the proposals, but we do want to engage in dialogue, here and in the other place, about the Constitutional Reform Bill. It is an important measure, and because of its constitutional nature it would be subject to special scrutiny arrangements, including proceedings on the Floor of the House. We want to ensure that we have a genuine measure of scrutiny of the proposals, but if Opposition parties are really intent on killing the Bill they should say so, instead of hiding behind the cloak of scrutiny.

Mr. Alan Duncan (Rutland and Melton) (Con): Let me say in passing that the Appellate Committee of the House of Lords can sit wherever it wants, even now. I echo the question from the hon. Member for Somerton and Frome (Mr. Heath). Our view is that there is no need for a supreme court, and we are pleased that ill-conceived legislation to set one up and abolish the position of Lord Chancellor will receive some much-needed scrutiny. In the other place, the Constitutional Reform Bill will now be thoroughly analysed and dissected, but the danger is that when it arrives here it will receive less mature study. Indeed, it may simply be rammed through. I am afraid that the Minister's answer was unsatisfactory. Will he give a firm undertaking—which he did not give a moment ago—that the Bill, as with every constitutional Bill in the past, will have all its legislative stages taken on the Floor of the House? All the Minister did was refer to special scrutiny arrangements. What might those be, in terms of parliamentary procedure? Will he also confirm that all stages will be handled by a Secretary of State?

Mr. Leslie: I am not quite sure what the hon. Gentleman's last comment means, but it is important that we have good scrutiny in both Houses. The House has devised thorough and long-standing mechanisms for scrutinising all Bills, and I do not think that there would be any specific need to change completely the way in which we scrutinise this Bill compared with other Bills. We will obviously listen to all Opposition parties' views on, and proposals for, the Bill's scrutiny requirements through the usual channels. However, let us be absolutely clear that the proposals are quite simple. On the supreme court, for example, do we want our judiciary to be in the political realm or not? I do not know whether the hon. Gentleman needs to think about that for several years. I suspect that he is opposed to the proposal, and if he is, he should say so. I think this House's scrutiny capabilities are quite adequate.

Mr. Dennis Skinner (Bolsover) (Lab): Is it not becoming increasingly obvious that the Tories, with only a tiny proportion of democratically elected Members of the House of Commons, are using their in-built majority in the House of Lords to scupper proposals such as the Constitutional Reform Bill, as they did a few days ago? Will my hon. Friend convey the impression of a lot of people on our side of the House—the democratic side of the House of Commons—that Labour MPs in increasing numbers are fed up to the back teeth with the shenanigans of the Tory majority in the House of Lords, and that the proposal to abolish the House of Lords is gaining strength week after week? Let's get on with it.

Mr. Leslie: It is difficult to follow the emphasis that my hon. Friend put on the point, but he is right to say that the Conservatives have more peers than there are Labour Members of another place. That is clearly a situation that the Conservative party would wish to preserve for ever, hence its opposition to change—that is the nature of its conservatism. I hope that the Constitutional Reform Bill will have the chance to be scrutinised in this House. It would be wrong for the other place to prevent the House from scrutinising the Bill, because this House is clearly supreme in our Parliament.

Sir Patrick Cormack (South Staffordshire) (Con): Will the Minister now confirm precisely who was consulted, and by whom, before the reshuffle last July when we were suddenly told that there was going to be a supreme court? When he answers, will he confirm that the Tories do not have a majority in the upper House?

Mr. Leslie: On the hon. Gentleman's latter point, if he had been listening to my words, he would know that I said that the Conservatives have more peers in the other place than the Labour party. If that is not clear enough for him, I do not know what is. I was not a Minister at the Department for Constitutional Affairs before the reshuffle, so I was not personally involved in the discussions in the lead up to that. I suspect that that is probably a question for the Prime Minister.

Courts (London)

21. Simon Hughes (Southwark, North and Bermondsey) (LD): What plans there are for the amalgamation of courts in London. [161261]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Constitutional Affairs (Mr. David Lammy): I am advised by the Greater London Magistrates Courts Authority that it proposes to amalgamate the Barnet and Hendon magistrates courts, and also the Bow street, Horseferry road and Marylebone magistrates courts, although no date has yet been set for completion of that. The Court Service is investigating the co-location of West London county court and West London magistrates court.

Simon Hughes: I am grateful for the Minister's helpful reply. He may be aware that there was a great outcry last year when there was a proposal for three family court centres in London, but none in south or west London. The Greater London Magistrates Courts Authority changed its mind and provided five, which was welcome. Will he ensure that before any decisions are agreed, there is careful consideration of whether all parts of London, and all Londoners, can get relatively easy access to the courts? Will he ensure that the courts are cheaper for the authorities to attend and that there is a fair distribution of courts of all sorts throughout the whole of London so that justice can be done not only for all, but in all parts of London, all the time?

Mr. Lammy: Access to justice was at the core of the Courts Act 2003, which passed through the House towards the end of last year. The unified Court Service will ensure that differentiation between the magistrates courts committees on one hand and the Court Service on the other will be brought to an end. We are able to get that flexibility so that justice is seen to be done locally throughout London and, indeed, the rest of the country.

Electoral Register

22. Dr. Alan Whitehead (Southampton, Test) (Lab): What plans the Department has to undertake a review of the current arrangements for recording those eligible to vote. [161262]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Constitutional Affairs (Mr. Christopher Leslie): Although my Department has no plans to carry out such a review, the independent Electoral Commission has reviewed electoral registration procedures, which formed part of the proposals in its "Voting for Change" report in June 2003. The Government are currently considering the recommendations made by the commission.

Dr. Whitehead: Does my hon. Friend accept that if we look at the latest returns for registered parliamentary electors we see what is effectively a slow collapse of registration in a number of urban and inner-city areas? Does he accept that if that trend continues, it will in the long term undermine the integrity of the electoral process? Will he consider measures targeted on urban areas to rectify the problem?

Mr. Leslie: My hon. Friend will know that my hon. Friend the Member for Vale of Clwyd (Chris Ruane) recently held a debate on this matter in Westminster Hall. I know that it is of concern to a number of colleagues who have noticed changes in the electoral register, either inflating or decreasing the numbers. In many cases, that is due to population change, but perhaps local returning officers are being more accurate and assiduous in putting names on the register, ensuring that there is no duplication and so forth. We have new powers for rolling registration, and we have given returning officers extra powers to canvass, making sure that our registers are accurate. I hope that that gives my hon. Friend the Member for Southampton, Test (Dr. Whitehead) some assurance.

Sir Nicholas Winterton (Macclesfield) (Con): Does the Minister accept that the integrity of the electoral register is vital, and that there should be safeguards so that when people register—people have registered cows, dogs and children—checks are undertaken by the appropriate officer to ensure that all those who are registered genuinely have the right to vote? Bearing in mind that we are moving towards having more postal voting, what additional safeguards will be introduced to ensure the integrity of the electoral register?

Mr. Leslie: I agree: the sound integrity of our electoral register is important. I have not visited the hon. Gentleman's constituency and seen any instances of cows and dogs being registered, as he suggests, and to my knowledge they are not on the register in my constituency. We want to make sure that the new powers available to registration officers are used to ensure, by door-to-door canvassing as well as the paper canvass process, that we get the best possible electoral register.

Jury Service

23. Mr. Gordon Marsden (Blackpool, South) (Lab): What assessment has been made of the adequacy of employee protection for those called for jury service. [161263]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Constitutional Affairs (Mr. David Lammy): The Government strongly support the idea that people should feel secure in the workplace. The Minister with responsibility for courts is in discussion with the Minister for Work to ensure that adequate protection is put in place for those employees summoned for jury service.

Mr. Marsden: My hon. Friend is aware of the case of my constituent who was employed on a construction site when he was summoned for jury service. He accepted, and informed his employers. They wrote direct to the Court Service without his knowledge in an attempt to have him excused, and when that request was refused, they sacked him. Does my hon. Friend agree that that raises disturbing questions about employee protection, particularly when employees have not been employed long enough to have recourse to an employment tribunal? Will he, his colleagues and officials look at other mechanisms, such as temporary protection and the arrangements that I understand pertain in Canada?

Mr. Lammy: My hon. Friend is right. The Contempt of Court Act 1981 can be brought to bear where it can be seen that an employer has interfered with the judicial process, but we need to do more in this area, particularly as we begin to implement the Criminal Justice Act 2003 to ensure that more people on the electoral roll are able to do jury service. People need to feel secure in their employment when they are doing jury service. We have undertaken to do more; conversations are going on within government, and I hope that we will be able to come forward with something shortly.

All-postal Voting Pilots

24. Angela Watkinson (Upminster) (Con): What action has been taken to prevent fraud in all-postal voting pilots. [161264]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Constitutional Affairs (Mr. Christopher Leslie): Any electoral system is potentially open to fraud, but it is important to remember that a number of electoral offences and safeguards are already in place, including an offence of applying undue influence on a voter and the offence of personation. The European Parliamentary and Local Elections (Pilots) Bill builds on existing sanctions so that, for example, it would be an arrestable offence to cast a postal vote as someone else without their consent in the pilots. Other measures are being used, including measures to combat ballot paper forgery and the use of secrecy warnings on postal voting literature.

Angela Watkinson: I thank the Minister for his reply, but he will be aware of the opportunities for fraud in houses in multiple occupation, where there is a frequent turnover of occupants, all of whom receive their mail through the same letter box. Will he therefore consider introducing special safeguards to ensure that the declarations of identity that accompany ballot papers from those properties relate to the person named on the ballot paper?

Mr. Leslie: It would not be right to inflate the notion that there is a big problem with houses in multiple occupation and postal voting, because there is no specific evidence that there is. However, I accept the hon. Lady's concerns, which she shares with other hon. Members, about a single letter box serving a number of flats. Recently, in Brighton and Hove, a team visited houses in multiple occupation to make sure that ballot papers were properly delivered, and we want to build on that, possibly in the all-postal pilots.

LEADER OF THE HOUSE

The Leader of the House was asked—

Members' Services

32. Mr. Eric Illsley (Barnsley, Central) (Lab): What proposals he has submitted to the Select Committee on the Modernisation of the House of Commons on the provision of personal digital assistants to hon. Members. [161273]

The Deputy Leader of the House of Commons (Mr. Phil Woolas): My right hon. Friend the Leader of the House has submitted no such proposals—

Mr. George Osborne (Tatton) (Con): Why not?

Mr. Woolas: Hang on! However, my right hon. Friend welcomes the fact that the Information Committee has looked at personal digital assistants and other hand-held technology, and has already made recommendations to the advisory panel on Members' allowances, which, for the benefit of the House, was formerly known as the Speaker's advisory panel.

Mr. Illsley: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for his reply. He will be aware, as most Members are, of the huge growth in e-mail to Members and the time needed to deal with the vast amount of electronic correspondence. Does he agree that the provision of hand-held personal digital assistants will enable Members to access the PDVN system remotely, provided that the two are linked, giving them more time to deal with that growing electronic mail?

Mr. Woolas: My hon. Friend is a technophile, and is using the new technology to the advantage of his constituents. I am pleased to tell the House that my right hon. Friend the Leader of the House is also a technophile, and is keen to make progress on the matter. As I said, proposals have been submitted to the advisory panel, and I invite my hon. Friend to write to the Senior Salaries Review Body and put the case for the new technology.

Sir Patrick Cormack (South Staffordshire) (Con): As someone who is not a natural technophile, may I ask the Minister whether he is aware that Members can become so submerged in information that they are unable to make decisions?

Mr. Woolas: It is patently obvious to all Members of Parliament that it is entirely possible to become submerged in information and not get on with the job in hand. However, in response to the hon. Gentleman's serious point, Members of Parliament, whatever their party, are better able to serve their constituents if they have access to new technology. I am sure that he agrees that the new provisions that have been introduced have benefited our constituents.

Human Rights Act

33. Mr. David Heath (Somerton and Frome) (LD): Whether the ministerial statement under section 19 of the Human Rights Act 1998, of compatibility with the European convention on human rights, is reviewed at each stage of consideration of a Bill. [161274]

The Leader of the House of Commons (Mr. Peter Hain): The Minister's statement of compatibility with the ECHR is formally reviewed when a Bill passes to the second House. However, it is intended that Parliament should be able to take the convention rights into account as part of normal debate. For this reason Ministers in charge of Bills will wish to be as forthcoming as they can in replying to questions from any Member about compatibility at any stage of the Bill's passage.

Mr. Heath: I am grateful to the Leader of the House for that answer, but I am not sure that the process is sufficiently complete. We have a certificate from a Minister when a Bill is published, but it is nonsense that is not repeated at any stage, despite the fact that a Bill can be almost entirely rewritten during consideration in Committee or on Report. Surely it would be more appropriate if, at each stage, a Minister said that the Bill still complied with the Act and, if it did not, explained why not. I remind the Leader of the House that the amendments may not be in the name of the Minister. They may have been tabled by others who do not have access to the same legal advice as Ministers.

Mr. Hain: I understand the hon. Gentleman's point. He is aware that the Joint Committee on Human Rights monitors legislation that is before Parliament and plays a valuable role. If any incompatibility issue arose, it would spot that. Equally, the hon. Gentleman will understand that it is an obligation under the Act that we come into line with ECHR compatibility, unless a statement is made giving very good reason why we should not. So there is no way in which any Minister will find himself or herself out of compliance with that requirement of the legislation.

Mr. Oliver Heald (North-East Hertfordshire) (Con): I am glad that the Leader of the House mentioned the Joint Committee on Human Rights. I wanted to ask him about the Committee's report published today, which states that there is a risk that emergency regulations made under the Civil Contingencies Bill would violate the European convention on human rights. The Government have promised that an amendment will be tabled so that the maker of regulations under the Civil Contingencies Act would have to make a section 19 statement. Does the Leader of the House plan to spread that principle more widely to other secondary legislation? What happens if the statement says that the regulations are not compatible? Would they still be legally enforceable?

Mr. Hain: I think that the answer to the hon. Gentleman's last question is yes. I will look afresh at the points he makes, but, as I say, it is a requirement on all Ministers to inform the House about compatibility, and in the event that there are very good and persuasive reasons for incompatibility, that must be explained to the House as well. I do not think that that arises in this instance.

Standing Committee Papers

34. Kevin Brennan (Cardiff, West) (Lab): If he will propose to the Select Committee on the Modernisation of the House of Commons that it examine ways of simplifying Standing Committee papers. [161275]

The Deputy Leader of the House of Commons (Mr. Phil Woolas): My right hon. Friend the Leader of the House accepts that the provision of information to Members—those serving on Standing Committees and others—may benefit from some modernisation.

Kevin Brennan: I thank my hon. Friend for that encouraging answer. Is it not the case that the purpose of the Modernisation Committee is not to deal with the trivial issues that are sometimes debated such as hours, but to improve the opportunities for Members to scrutinise the Executive? Is it not daft that in Standing Committees Members have to consult at least four different bits of paper when they are trying to follow a Bill's progress, including the explanatory notes to the Bill, the selection list and the amendment paper? Could not all that be on one screen, on which hon. Members could see what was being discussed, what difference the amendment would make and what the explanation for it was? Why cannot we get on and modernise, as has been done in other institutions, such as the National Assembly for Wales?

Mr. Woolas: I saw the frown of the Chairman of the Procedure Committee deepen with every question. The answer to the question from my hon. Friend the Member for Cardiff, West (Kevin Brennan) is yes. My right hon. Friend the Leader of the House accepts that there is a case for reassessing from time to time the form of all our Committee papers, and if there is a way of making the scrutiny of Bills easier for all Members in all parts of the House through modernisation, that should be considered. I suggest that my hon. Friend write to the Leader of the House in his capacity as Chair of the Modernisation Committee to ask how that may be taken forward.

Sir Nicholas Winterton (Macclesfield) (Con): I am grateful to the Deputy Leader of the House for mentioning the Procedure Committee. I personally believe, as I think the Leader of the House might, that the matter may well be one for the Procedure Committee. Bearing in mind the fact that Members chosen by you, Mr. Speaker, chair Standing Committees, I should have thought that the Chairmen's Panel should also discuss the matter. The hon. Member for Cardiff, West (Kevin Brennan) asked a very good question. Will the Leader of the House discuss the matter with me and consider which bodies of the House could take it forward?

Mr. Woolas: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for that question. I can confirm that my right hon. Friend the Leader of the House would wish to do that. We all recognise the difficulties that arise in relation to amendments in Standing Committees, especially when several are tabled overnight. I am sure that all Members are grateful for the guidance of the Chairmen of Standing Committees on discussing amendments in accordance with the right procedures. It therefore makes sense, as the hon. Gentleman suggests, to consult them.

Mr. Paul Tyler (North Cornwall) (LD): Does the Minister recognise that it is not only the hon. Member for Cardiff, West (Kevin Brennan) who finds the proceedings of Standing Committees incomprehensible? There is a great deal of evidence that the public find those proceedings completely beyond them. Given that they are the people who send us here, and that they are often interested in the way in which we deal with legislation, do the Minister and the Leader of the House propose to consider the problem from the point of view of accessibility to the public? The proceedings of Standing Committees contrast sharply with those of Select Committees, which the public do find comprehensible.

Mr. Woolas: I thank the hon. Gentleman for that question. The Modernisation Committee has been taking evidence from members of the public around the country, and one of the findings of that consultation exercise exactly confirms his point. If it is sometimes difficult for Members to understand these procedures, they are often impenetrable to members of the public. The thrust of the Modernisation Committee's work is accessibility to, and understanding of, this House; that is one of the prime goals of this Government. I am grateful for the hon. Gentleman's support for that goal as a member of the Modernisation Committee. In achieving it, however, we must not forget the checks and balances of our system that give rights to Back Benchers: that would be like throwing the baby out with the bathwater.

Developments in vCJD

12.32 pm

The Secretary of State for Health (Dr. John Reid): With permission, Mr. Speaker, I should like to make a further statement about the action that Government are taking following a blood transfusion incident involving variant Creutzfeldt-Jakob Disease—VCJD. On 17 December last year, I informed the House about the implications of the incident and gave an undertaking to keep it informed of any major developments. As you will know from our conversation last night, Mr. Speaker, I regret that an inaccurate press report appeared before I was able to make this statement to the House. I believe that it has been replicated in another inaccurate press report this morning.

The House may recall that my Department had become aware of a patient who had contracted variant CJD after receiving a transfusion of blood from a donor who went on to develop variant CJD himself. That is a possible, not a proven, causal connection. I told the House that a further 15 patients had been identified who had received transfusions from donors who had gone on to develop variant CJD. I said in my statement of last December that the Health Protection Agency, working with the National Blood Service, was in the process of contacting the individuals concerned. I can now report that all surviving individuals have been contacted and informed about the circumstances of their case.

As on previous occasions when we have become aware of new information about blood and variant CJD, we have ensured that action has been taken on a precautionary basis to reduce the risk of a transmission of the disease. I stress that we are acting on a precautionary basis—the basis on which we have introduced a range of measures since 1997. For instance, since 1998 we have ensured that blood products are made only from plasma imported from countries that are free of, or have very few cases of, variant CJD. We introduced leucodepletion—removal of the white cells—of all blood for transfusion from 31 October 1999. Two years ago, in 2002, we instructed the National Blood Service to use only imported fresh frozen plasma for the treatment of children born after 1996. That will come into effect for newborn children this month, and will be extended to older children as soon as is practicable.

In the light of the transfusion incident that I reported last December, the chief medical officer asked the expert Advisory Committee on the Microbiological Safety of Blood and Tissues for Transplantation to consider whether there was a need to take any further measures on a precautionary basis. That request was made with the proviso that such measures should not have an unmanageable adverse impact on the safety or availability of blood. We are therefore talking about a balance of risk, given that, with a need for about 800,000 transfusions and 3 million blood components a year, the dangers of a shortage of blood are obvious to all.

Our experts met on 22 January to discuss a number of options for further strengthening the protection of the blood supply in addition to those that I outlined to the House in December. On the basis of all the information available, and taking a precautionary approach, our experts concluded that the United Kingdom should exclude from donating blood people who have previously received transfusions of whole blood components since January 1980. They also advised that additional measures should be introduced to improve further the effectiveness of the use of blood in hospitals.

I have accepted the chief medical officer's advice to accept that recommendation of the advisory committee. The group of people excluded from donating blood will therefore be limited to those who confirm that they have received a transfusion in the UK since 1 January 1980. It is generally accepted that there would have been no exposure to BSE—bovine spongiform encephalopathy—in the UK before that date.

I stress that the risk attaching to that group of blood donors is uncertain, but we are taking those measures as a precaution because the risk may be slightly higher among that group than among the population as a whole. Excluding those donors will inevitably lead to a reduction in the supply of blood available for transfusions. Although the National Blood Service estimates a loss of 52,000 donors, I am pleased to report that it has put in place measures to help to compensate for those losses, and hospitals are being encouraged to make the best possible use of blood. In the meantime, I should like to take the opportunity to thank the blood donors in the group affected by the change for their contribution towards saving and improving patients' lives.

At the meeting on 22 January, the Advisory Committee on the Microbiological Safety of Blood and Tissues for Transplantation acknowledged that a period of some weeks would be needed to allow the blood services to put in hand the preparation of communication material for donors and the setting up of training programmes for blood service staff. It recommended 5 April as the date for implementation, and the National Blood Service asked us to time our public announcement to coincide with a point three weeks before implementation. That is why I am making this statement to the House today. Those steps are being put in motion as I speak.

The advice of the Advisory Committee on the Microbiological Safety of Blood and Tissues for Transplantation and the National Blood Service is that we should identify people who have received a previous blood transfusion by self-reporting, using questionnaire screening, when they come forward to give blood. That action is being implemented now. Another group of potential donors will be people who had an operation in the past but are unsure whether they had a blood transfusion at that time. I have asked the advisory committee to consider whether any further action is required as part of the general review of the measures, and to report back to me.

Earlier in this statement, I mentioned that this process was about balancing risks. I now turn briefly to the other part of the process, which involves ensuring that blood in hospitals is put to the best possible use. I consider blood that has been donated voluntarily to be a precious resource for our health service. We therefore have a responsibility to donors and patients alike to ensure that it is used to the best possible effect. That said, it is clear that the best-used blood is often the unit of blood that is not used when it is not needed. I am, therefore, concerned that blood transfusions should be made only where there is a clear clinical need.

[Dr. John Reid]

It has been widely acknowledged that more blood is ordered and more is used than is clinically necessary. Considerable efforts have been made over the past five years to encourage more efficient use of blood in clinical practice. In 2002, all four of the United Kingdom's chief medical officers launched an initiative to ensure that the "better blood transfusion" strategy is an integral part of NHS care, to make blood transfusion safer, to avoid unnecessary use of blood in clinical practice and to provide better information to patients and the public. We have seen good progress in taking this initiative forward.

I am pleased to report that NHS trusts have been introducing improved arrangements to oversee all aspects of transfusion, and developing protocols for transfusion practice, based on national guidelines. Work is also being undertaken in a number of other key areas such as the development of additional guidelines for trusts on the resources needed to implement "better blood transfusion" and the establishment of the role of specialist practitioners of transfusion. While this progress is encouraging, we cannot be complacent. The expected loss of supply as a result of today's announcement means that we need to increase our efforts in the more appropriate use of blood. The chief medical officer is producing a revised approach to push forward the "better blood transfusion" strategy.

I hope that my statement has provided the House with a clear indication of the path that we have chosen and why we have chosen it. I would like to end by stressing two things. First, as I said last December, we are following a highly precautionary approach. I understand that people may have concerns about the implications of this announcement, but I would emphasise again that this action is being taken because of an uncertain but slight risk. People should, indeed, continue to have a blood transfusion when it is really necessary. Any slight risk associated with receiving blood must be balanced against the significant risk of not receiving that blood when it is most needed.

My second point is that, particularly at this time, people who can do so should continue to donate blood. Blood donation is a safe procedure and people should continue to donate blood regularly. We place great value on those who already donate and would welcome new donors. I am sure that the whole House is deeply grateful to all of them.

Mr. Andrew Lansley (South Cambridgeshire) (Con): I am grateful to the Secretary of State for giving me the opportunity to see his statement in advance. I am sure that hon. Members are also grateful to him for returning to the House to give further details, which he undertook to do on 17 December. His statement will come as no great surprise, in the light of some of the research that has been published since his December statement. I am particularly aware, for example, that in The Lancet of 6 February, Llewelyn et al reported on the surveys of patients identified by the national CJD surveillance unit as receiving blood transfusions. Looking particularly at the case that the Secretary of State highlighted in his December statement, they concluded:

"The chance of observing a case of vCJD in a recipient in the absence of transfusion transmitted infection is about 1 in 15,000 to 1 in 30,000."

So, it clearly must be right, in the light of such an analysis, to proceed on the basis that blood transfusion was the source of infection in the case in question. Indeed, Herzog and others, in The Lancet of the same date, considered the risk of intravenous transmission, concluding that it should be treated on the same precautionary basis as the avoidance of consumption of infected beef products.

The case in question, which the Secretary of State told the House about on 17 December, arose from a blood transfusion in 1996. The precautionary process of leucodepletion was instigated, as he said, in 1999, so the first question that arises is, what has been the relevance and effectiveness of that process? The particular case in question does not tell us whether leucodepletion has succeeded in reducing or even removing the risk of infectivity being introduced through blood transfusions. What conclusions, if any, have he and his advisers reached on the effectiveness of that process over the last four and a half years?

Turning to the measures that the Secretary of State has announced, I am aware that he says that the 5 April date is intended to give the National Blood Service time to respond. Will he confirm that it will also, presumably, allow an accelerated call to donors, should that be necessary? I understand that the blood service may have about a week's supply, which is, in the circumstances, a very healthy stock of blood to have available, but it needs to be replenished continuously, so it is important to ensure that there is no drop-off in donations, even in the short run.

Can the Secretary of State confirm, as he did previously, that there has been advance co-ordination with the Scottish and Welsh Administrations? I understand that the National Blood Service looks after England and north Wales, but clearly there are separate arrangements in Wales, Scotland and Northern Ireland. Perhaps he can confirm that those Administrations are taking parallel measures.

Can the Secretary of State also explain the intentions in relation to those who have transfusions in future? Presumably, those who have had transfusions since 1980 will be excluded, but the logic of his statement is that those who have transfusions after 5 April this year will not be excluded, because they, by definition, will receive blood that we have made as safe as we can make it.

The Secretary of State talked about the measures that the chief medical officer is taking for a revised approach on "better blood transfusion". I do not wish to be difficult with the right hon. Gentleman, but I have to say that he described a process. He did not describe any outcomes, so perhaps he will tell us what progress has been made in reducing the use of blood products in the national health service to the minimum level that is clinically necessary, because we need to compare that progress inside the NHS with a reducing profile of blood donations.

The figures that I have received suggest that 2.38 million units were donated in 2001–02 and 2.365 million in 2002–03, while 2.31 million units is the estimate for this financial year and that for next year is 2.275 million. That is a 1.5 to 2 per cent. reduction year on year in the number of blood donations. What the Secretary of State has described today represents a 3.2 per cent. reduction in the donor base, so this year, other things being equal, there might be a 4 to 5 per cent. reduction in blood donation.

In those circumstances, it is important either for the marketing campaign to be able to compensate for that reduction—presumably, the Secretary of State knows that there is no certainty about that—or for NHS use of blood donations to make additional progress. However, there is no measure in the right hon. Gentleman statement of the progress made up to now.

What further research is the Secretary of State putting in hand? I understand that he has taken advice from the Advisory Committee on the Microbiological Safety of Blood and Tissues for Transplantation, but when I asked him recently about advice from the Spongiform Encephalopathy Advisory Committee he said that that body would be included, as others would. SEAC has particular expertise in the infectivity and transmission of BSE. We know that, so far, 146 variant CJD cases have been identified, so information is progressively being established about the characteristics of persons infected with new variant CJD and conclusions can be drawn. At some point, it will be necessary to balance the harm that could be done by such highly precautionary measures—even if it could be mitigated—against the unknown benefits of a highly precautionary approach.

In that context, in the past disposable instruments were used for tonsillectomies. Known harm clearly resulted from the practice for an unknown and unquantifiable benefit, and that decision had to be reversed. I would hate to reach the position where harm resulted from a persistently highly precautionary approach.

The Secretary of State said that the use of imported fresh frozen plasma that is virally inactivated is to be extended to older children. That development was first announced in August 2002, with the intention that such plasma would be used from the end of 2003. The right hon. Gentleman is now saying that virally inactivated fresh frozen plasma will be used for newborn children. Presumably a timetable exists for extending that use to children born since January 1996. When does the Secretary of State anticipate that timetable will, as a matter of some importance, be completed?

The right hon. Gentleman did not mention the infectivity of urine-derived products. In the past, the Department has said that it does not acknowledge any such evidence, but, in The Journal of Biological Chemistry in 2001, Shaked and others suggested that there was such a route of infectivity. If highly precautionary approaches are sought, perhaps the Secretary of State will comment on his attitude to that aspect.

I entirely share the right hon. Gentleman's regret at newspaper stories this morning and would not wish the Government to proceed other than on the basis of scientific evidence. Continuing research is needed because a highly precautionary approach is being taken in the absence of evidence about the true route of infectivity. If the Secretary of State is right and the public listen carefully, they will recognise that that is the right way to proceed. Blood is a vital resource for the NHS and we greatly value those persons who donate it. Blood must be used efficiently and effectively, but we must also encourage people to give blood to the NHS in the hope that that will meet the health service's continuing needs.

Dr. Reid: I thank the hon. Gentleman for his comments and particularly for his reference to the manner of publication and reporting. His reaction, as we would expect, was responsible. I hope that any reporting of this issue will be sober and non-sensational.

The hon. Gentleman referred to a series of publications and produced some statistical evidence. I will not comment on their substance, but I agree that a range of statistical evidence has been placed in the public domain, albeit not of a causal nature. We proceed with caution, despite the fact that there is no proven causal relationship between the description I reported in December of a possible link between someone who had donated blood and someone who had received blood.

At the time when leucodepletion came into effect, our experts believed that the only source of infectivity was through white cells. Leucodepletion is the removal of white cells from the plasma. More recent research suggests that there could be infectivity in other blood components, which is why we are taking further action. As the hon. Gentleman knows, we are guided by experts. We believe that leucodepletion has been effective and efficient in countering risks. I am certainly not aware of any evidence to the contrary.

The hon. Gentleman referred to the chief medical officer's "better blood transfusion" strategy, which is currently being reinforced. Hospitals are encouraged to run pre-operation assessment clinics and to advise patients of the various alternatives. Hospitals are also encouraged to use the technology that allows doctors to rescue and give blood back to patients during an operation. That technology is readily available and should be used when a patient needs more than two units of blood.

It is too early to make an overall assessment of the complete effectiveness or otherwise of the strategy but we continually monitor it and believe that it is making an improvement. When we have completed a comprehensive and robust assessment, we will place that information in the public domain.

The hon. Gentleman expressed the hope that the three weeks before 5 April will be used at least in part to encourage people to donate blood to compensate for any effect that today's statement may have. I share his hope, which is part of the reason for giving the blood service proper time to produce publications and circulars before this statement.

The hon. Gentleman is correct in stating that current blood stocks are relatively high—from memory, we have 62,000 units. This morning, I spoke with, among others, the manager of the National Blood Service, Dr. Angela Robinson, and with individuals in Scotland. My hon. Friend the Minister of State spoke to our colleagues in Wales yesterday. We confirm that we shall do everything possible to ensure that the level of blood donations is maintained.

The decision to import fresh frozen plasma from the United States to treat certain groups was taken to reduce the possible risk of variant CJD. There have been no reported cases of vCJD in the United States and we thought it important not to introduce different risks with this initiative. Viral inactivation of US-derived fresh frozen plasma was therefore introduced in this country.

We hope to complete by the end of this year our plans for ensuring that all children are treated using the fresh frozen plasma method. We hope that that timetable will not slip.

My hon. Friend the Minister responded to a recent question on urinary infection. There is no evidence of urinary infection occurring—although, as we adopt a precautionary approach, we obviously keep an open mind. I cannot report the specific contents of the discussions with the spongiform encephalopathy expert group, but I will write to the hon. Gentleman on that point.

Mr. David Hinchliffe (Wakefield) (Lab): Over the years, I have met a number of families whose members have suffered from variant CJD. The view commonly held is that Governments have not been as open and frank about the problem as might have been hoped. I want to place on record my appreciation for the fact that the Secretary of State addressed that concern in his statement before Christmas and in his statement today. Those who have had to deal with this terrible problem in relation to family members will also appreciate the fact that the Government have been open and honest and have come to the House as soon as possible to give the information that has been available.

I want to press the Secretary of State on one point. He has referred to the fact that there will be some reliance on self-reporting by future blood donors about whether they have had transfusions since 1980. My experience of self-reporting in the NHS is that it is somewhat unreliable on occasions, and I would welcome his comments on whether we have the capacity in relation to electronic records to ensure that when there is no self-reporting of previous transfusions, that fact is comprehensively checked before individuals are allowed to donate.

Dr. Reid: I give my hon. Friend a straight answer: we do not have that capacity in relation to records; otherwise, we would not be relying on the normal method of self-reporting. It is not an entirely proactive dependency, because when people currently go to donate blood, they are screened in relation to a range of issues and materials, and that is when the questioning will take place. That leaves an outstanding question, as my hon. Friend says, as some people may not intentionally deceive but may be unable to remember, perhaps in relation to the circumstances of being operated on, or may be ignorant as to whether they received blood. I have therefore asked the expert group to consider further what might be done in that respect. All this information is considered on the balance of risk.

I make no apology for stressing once again that no proven, causal connection has yet been established between blood donation and the blood recipient, in relation to the transfer by blood of variant CJD. We are taking a highly precautionary approach, however, in relation both to being as open as possible when information is given to us and disseminating it as quickly as possible, and in attempting to minimise any possibility of avenues remaining that we have not closed off.

Mr. Paul Burstow (Sutton and Cheam) (LD): First, may I thank the Secretary of State for his courtesy in allowing sight of the statement well in advance, which has provided a chance to reflect on the issues that he has brought to the House's attention? He has done that in a timely fashion, for which I am very grateful.

The Secretary of State says that he is taking a highly precautionary approach. Clearly, securing the supply of blood for transfusion is a key concern. Can he therefore amplify that part of his statement on supply, and tell us what measures he is taking now to safeguard it? What plans does he have, immediately and in the longer term, to increase the numbers of blood donors, not least because, at the moment, only about six in every 100 people in this country donate blood? Is the National Institute for Clinical Excellence to be involved in any way in undertaking work on the use of alternatives to transfusion, such as erythropoietin and the use of patients' own blood? Can he comment on the timeline that has been discussed in respect of making available US-sourced blood plasma for older children, which we hear will be by the end of the year? What about other at-risk groups, such as haemophiliacs?

Can the Secretary of State say what assessment has been made of the future availability and safety of non-UK sourced blood plasma? The right hon. Gentleman has referred to the report and work being done by the chief medical officer. Can he tell us when he expects the revised approach to the blood transfusion strategy to be published, and whether that strategy revision will include a more co-ordinated approach, involving the National Patient Safety Agency, in order to reduce risks? In particular, what plans does he have to deal with concern about the risk of the re-use of surgical instruments after brain biopsies, and is new guidance planned in respect of that, to deal not only with those cases in which vCJD has been diagnosed but in other cases?

I understand that the Department is currently undertaking work on a risk assessment of possible vCJD infection in large pools of plasma and the effects of dilution. Can the right hon. Gentleman tell us when that work will be concluded and when the results will be published?

Finally, can the Secretary of State say what support is offered to those affected donors to whom he has referred today, and to others who might be concerned? Will there be more than just leaflets and information? For example, will other services and support be offered in those cases in which it might seem appropriate?

The Secretary of State is absolutely right: blood is a precious resource; we must do everything possible to safeguard the supply in this country; and we must applaud those who give, and encourage more to do so.

Dr. Reid: On the question of whether support will be available, I certainly hope that it will be, not only from the National Blood Service but from NHS Direct and other parts of the NHS. As for the expert group, which is looking, almost incident by incident, at each of those dependent on blood plasma, many cases need to be examined. Obviously, the risk in those cases is even less than the low risk that we have discussed today, because the nature of plasma is that it is a reservoir normally constituted from plasma from a range of people rather than from one person. Nevertheless, great efforts are being made by the expert incident group to examine that risk and to see how it can reassure itself and any recipients as quickly as possible. I cannot give him a finish date for that—he will understand that it is laborious even compared with some of the other laborious work in connection with this matter—but I am sure that it is being done as fast as possible and always in a manner that is commensurate with getting the information correct.

The hon. Gentleman mentioned the question of stocks. As I said earlier, stocks are pretty healthy at present. The exclusions that I have mentioned today will, it is estimated—it is not a hard and fast number—reduce the number of blood donors by about 3.2 per cent. and the number of donations by about 3.6 per cent. In absolute numbers, that is about 52,000 people, who would give about 56,000 donations. That is comparable with the annual net reduction, and with extra publicity and extra effort, we can make sure that that stock is maintained.

In relation to the timeline on children, the only information that I can give the hon. Gentleman is what I said earlier: it will happen at the end of the year. We do not believe that any problem exists with the US-derived plasma that we have received. In common with the hon. Gentleman, I thank those who donate blood.

Mr. Tom Clarke (Coatbridge and Chryston) (Lab): I thank my right hon. Friend for his carefully considered and sensitive statement. In common with my hon. Friend the Member for Wakefield (Mr. Hinchliffe), I remind him about those of us who have families in our constituencies who have had to deal with the dreadful trauma of vCJD over a number of years, and who have now formed a network in Scotland, England, Wales and even Northern Ireland. Those families are only too happy to offer whatever experience they can and to be consulted by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State and others. They, too, will greatly welcome what he has had to say about research and blood transfusions and his appeal that people should continue to make blood donations.

Dr. Reid: Yes, indeed. I know that my right hon. Friend has taken a great deal of interest in, and given a great deal of support to, those who have found themselves in difficult circumstances because of this issue. Of course, I have spoken already to our counterparts in Scotland—I spoke to the Minister there this morning. I may, however, have given the wrong impression—I understand that the Under-Secretary of State for Health, my hon. Friend the Member for Welwyn Hatfield (Miss Johnson), was unable to contact the Minister in Wales last night, but I know that our officials have been in close touch throughout. This is an issue that does not recognise national borders within the United Kingdom, and obviously, we will work closely together on the matter.

Lady Hermon (North Down) (UUP): For the benefit of those who may be alarmed by his statement, will the Secretary of State comment on improvements in treatment of those with vCJD? Will he also reflect on the courageous decision of his hon. Friend the Member for Kilmarnock and Loudoun (Mr. Browne), who, as the then Minister responsible for health in the Northern Ireland Office, authorised a new technique for the treatment of a young man in Belfast whose condition then improved?

Dr. Reid: Yes indeed. I recall that case. While we are not entirely convinced that the treatment is truly effective, we did understand the anxiety that people would feel should there appear to be a form of treatment available that we were not testing, and we decided to carry out a pilot involving an English strategic health authority. This is a very difficult disease to come to terms with, and some of its implications are clear even from the screening technique mentioned by my hon. Friend the Member for Wakefield (Mr. Hinchliffe). There is, in fact, no test that can be applied before symptoms appear. Nevertheless, we continue to pursue treatments that might prove effective.

Dr. Brian Iddon (Bolton, South-East) (Lab): My concern is for the 15 or so individuals identified in the statement. Some have already contracted NHS blood transfusion-borne diseases such as hepatitis C, and others still require blood transfusions. Can my right hon. Friend assure us that that small number of people will continue to be monitored closely, and that if they require medical advice they will receive the best available from the NHS anywhere in the country?

Dr. Reid: Yes, I can. As my hon. Friend says, 15 recipients were identified. One is now deceased, although as far as we know there is no connection with vCJD. A further recipient has been discovered since then, in January. We do continue to monitor all those people closely. My hon. Friend is right: they deserve the support of the NHS, which must itself monitor their conditions. I promise him that that will happen.

Mr. Mark Francois (Rayleigh) (Con): The Secretary of State mentioned the importance of maintaining adequate stocks. In that context, may I raise an operational point? The right hon. Gentleman will know that the National Blood Service now employs call centres to remind donors to turn up for sessions. I understand, however, that problems have been caused when the message has not been passed on to teams going out to collect blood. When that happens, more donors turn up than the service would normally prepare for. That places tremendous strain on staff running the sessions, and also means that donors who are not covered by the new booked-appointment system must wait for an inordinate amount of time. Some become disillusioned and go home.

Next time the right hon. Gentleman has discussions with the chief executive of the NBS, will he raise that problem? If liaison between call centres and teams collecting blood is improved, staff will not be under such pressure, and donors—whom we all applaud—will not become disillusioned.

Dr. Reid: We are trying to modernise and improve the National Blood Service, along with every other part of the NHS. In view of what I have said today, it is particularly important for us to maintain the utmost effectiveness in terms of logistics and such matters as collection, and I shall ensure that the hon. Gentleman's comments are brought to the attention of those in the blood service.

Mr. Dai Havard (Merthyr Tydfil and Rhymney) (Lab): As my right hon. Friend will know, I have been concerned for some time about the supply of blood and its security. I am also concerned about the quality of care and the use of blood for the largest group of recipients, cancer patients.

We had the same discussion last time my right hon. Friend made a statement. I know that NICE is considering the use of alternatives, and that it is also being considered by the All Wales Medicines Strategy Group; but will my right hon. Friend ensure that not just an incremental change but a step change is involved, and that alternatives are immediately used as the default for cancer patients when that is possible? If that happens, my right hon. Friend need not face a crisis in blood supply. However, I echo his call for people to give blood.

Dr. Reid: I know of my hon. Friend's interest. EPO, in particular, is an alternative to blood transfusion, especially for cancer patients suffering from anaemia following chemotherapy.

My hon. Friend has done a great deal of research, and I know of the benefits that he believes this will bring to cancer patients. I also know of the knock-on effects for future supplies of blood, and for the NHS generally in terms of potential savings and bed bays, which my hon. Friend has mentioned in the past.

My hon. Friend has made a strong case for EPO, but I know he will understand that that is only one side of the argument. Some argue that EPO may only be useful to a minority of cancer patients, and may not be effective enough to be used as a standard treatment in most cases. We have asked NICE to look into the matter. It will consult on the draft scope for its appraisal by June, and the final guidance is expected to be published by the end of next year. I hope that the appraisal will be objective, and will assess various points of view.

Mr. Roger Williams (Brecon and Radnorshire) (LD): As the Secretary of State will know, the BSE outbreak and the appearance of vCJD in humans has caused a great deal of financial cost and human sorrow. Part of the financial cost has been caused by the need to invoke the precautionary principle, which is always expensive, because we do not have the fundamental scientific knowledge about the infective agent, its transmission and the way in which it carries infection. Is the Secretary of State satisfied that we are investing enough in fundamental research? Is there a balance to be struck between that investment and the cost of invoking the precautionary principle?

Dr. Reid: The pursuit of knowledge in this as in every other area is costly. Taxation is a finite resource, and there is an almost infinite demand on it. The other night I met some people whose children had cystic fibrosis, and then met others to discuss motor neurone disease. That illustrated the extent of the demand. I think, however, that we are investing as much in scientific research as is commensurate with need—some £500 million or £600 million. The Medical Research Council is investing another £500 million. We always want more, but we ascribe to this matter a degree of seriousness that is commensurate with the investigations that are taking place. That is why I have come to the House twice in the last four months to report on what some may consider relatively minor steps. Given the importance of the issue, I think it as well to be open and let all Members know what we are doing.

Mr. Henry Bellingham (North-West Norfolk) (Con): The Secretary of State said that he believed that blood transfusions should only be given in cases of clear clinical need. That struck me as a rather strange observation. Surely no blood transfusion should be given unless there is a clear clinical need. Is the Secretary of State saying that some transfusions have been unnecessary, or that medical technology is advancing?

Dr. Reid: I am saying that, although we have healthy stocks now, it is more important than ever for us to ensure that blood is being used efficiently. Indeed, the chief medical officer's strategy lately has been to inform all involved in blood transfusions that they should be given only when absolutely medically necessary. Blood is an extremely precious resource. I do not suggest for a moment that people are being comprehensively profligate in their use or expenditure of blood in operations, but we have shown in the past when seeking efficiency that we can cut down on the use of blood without cutting down on good medical practice.

Dr. Evan Harris (Oxford, West and Abingdon) (LD): I would like to ask the Secretary of State about the 15 patients who are potentially in a contactable group in respect of the risk of contracting CJD. How is he handling them? Are they on a confidential database from which they are not allowed to remove their names, as suggested by the CJD incidence panel report of October 2001? What was the result of the consultation that took place to a deadline of January 2002 on how that group was to be dealt with? What are the implications for that group in terms of being kept on a register? Indeed, what are the implications for the many more patients who are possibly exposed to a lower risk through pooled products? There do not appear to have been any further documents from the incidence panel following the consultation.

Dr. Reid: To put it simply, those people are being fully supported and fully informed. As I have said, 14 of the original 15 recipients identified are alive. An additional one was discovered in January. Five of those received leucodepleted red cells after 1999. The earliest transfusion involved in those cases was in 1993 and the latest one was in 2001. I mentioned during the previous statement that the National Blood Service was trying to trace all the patients concerned. It has now done so and the Health Protection Agency has arranged for them to be contacted.

Without going into any individual's details, I can tell the hon. Gentleman that, in conjunction with each recipient's doctor, the HPA intends to undertake a review of how the advice was communicated to each patient and to try to ensure that access is provided to expert counselling and to appropriate follow-up health checks. In response to the questions about the two reports that were published some two years before I became Secretary of State, I have to tell the hon. Gentleman honestly that I do not know the answer to his question, but I will write to him about that if I can.

Points of Order

1.22 pm

Clare Short (Birmingham, Ladywood) (Lab): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I rise to raise a point of order about a misleading report published today by the Select Committee on Defence entitled "Lessons of Iraq". Paragraph 358 of the report states:

"It has also been suggested that DfID's"— the Department for International Development—

"role in post-conflict planning was constrained by the attitude of the then Secretary of State towards the prospect of military action. Although our witness from DfID denied that this was the case, we remain to be convinced."

That assertion is completely false. I think that it is very bad practice indeed, as well as rather rude, for a Select Committee that could have asked me to provide evidence on that question to fail to do so and then to insert into its report a statement that is so inaccurate and misleading.

The reality is that DFID pressed the Ministry of Defence to prepare for its Geneva convention and Hague regulations responsibilities because, at the end of a conflict, in the absence of order, the occupying power has responsibility for immediate humanitarian needs. Those preparations were made and food and other supplies ordered and put in place shortly before military action began.

DFID also worked with the United Nations, the Red Cross, the World Bank, the International Monetary Fund, suitable non-governmental organisations and many countries that opposed the rush to war, so that we were fully prepared to support humanitarian relief as soon as there was order, and to support reconstruction efforts as soon as a UN mandate was put in place. Unfortunately, the UN and the United States State Department, which had made preparations for reconstruction, were pushed aside by the Pentagon, which took over the lead for reconstruction in Iraq—

Mr. Speaker: Order. The right hon. Lady is now making a personal statement. It is a point of order that she has raised, so I have to rule on that point of order. I have to tell her that the Chair does not have any responsibility for the content of reports from Select Committees. She may wish to take the matter up with the Chairman of the Committee.

Angus Robertson (Moray) (SNP): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I seek your advice about the rules of the House relating to Ministers making comments ahead of the Budget. At oral questions earlier, the Secretary of State for Scotland confirmed that he was opposed to the introduction of a windfall tax on the financial services industry, yet he would not say whether he supported the expensive introduction of fraud-prone strip stamps on whisky bottles. While it is clearly a matter for him whether he wants to support the whisky industry and its workers, can you confirm that no rules of the House bar Ministers from giving their opinions during debates or questions ahead of the Budget?

Mr. Speaker: My understanding is that there are conventions regarding Ministers and the lead-up to the Budget. They are not rules of the House but they are perfectly understandable conventions on matters that may have an influence on the Budget. All I can say to the hon. Gentleman is this: I was present and I am not responsible for the Minister's reply, but I have had enough experience in the House to know that that is the type of reply that we get in the week before the Budget.

Mr. Russell Brown (Dumfries) (Lab): On a point of order, of which I have given you prior notice Mr Speaker. Regrettably, like many others, I ask for your guidance and advice to hon. Members regarding parliamentary protocol. The hon. Member for Galloway and Upper Nithsdale (Mr. Duncan) has circulated literature in the town of Dumfries encouraging townspeople to bring issues to him, as an MP, including issues that could well be constituency casework. Surely, if individuals raise such matters with him, he would not be able to deal with them because of the conventions of the House, and therefore he would be misleading the public. I seek your guidance. Am I interpreting the rules correctly?

Mr. Speaker: I thank the hon. Gentleman for giving me notice of his concern. As I told the House last week, resolution of such disputes is best left to the good sense of the hon. Members concerned.

Mr. George Foulkes (Carrick, Cumnock and Doon Valley) (Lab/Co-op): What if they do not have any good sense?

Mr. Speaker: Order. All hon. Members have good sense. I understand that the particular newsletter to which the hon. Member for Dumfries (Mr. Brown) has drawn my attention was produced in the context of a prospective change of constituency boundaries that affects many constituencies in Scotland. I think that it would be unwise of me to intervene directly in such cases. I wish to make it clear, however, that regardless of proposals relating to parliamentary constituencies, the existing boundaries remain in force at least until the next general election. I therefore expect hon. Members to pay proper regard to the right of sitting constituency Members to represent their constituents. I add that, as the Member of Parliament for Glasgow, Springburn, I hold several surgeries per month. If any hon. Member wishes to do those surgeries, they are welcome.

Prevention of Homelessness Bill

1.28 pm

Mr. Mohammad Sarwar (Glasgow, Govan) (Lab): I beg to move,

That leave be given to bring in a Bill to make provision about homelessness.

We have come a long way since the first comprehensive legislation on homelessness in the United Kingdom was introduced in this House. The Housing (Homeless Persons) Act 1977 imposed substantial duties on all local authorities towards homeless people. There have been considerable developments in that area of law since 1977.

Part VII of the Housing Act 1996, introduced by the Tories, significantly reduced the rights of homeless persons in England and Wales. It was a Labour Government who reversed the negative effects of the 1996 Act by introducing a Homelessness Bill, enacted as the Homelessness Act 2002. In Scotland, where housing is generally a devolved issue, the Labour-Liberal Executive introduced their own Homelessness Bill, which was enacted in 2003. The Scottish 2003 Act seeks to abolish homelessness by 2012. It will do that by abolishing the "priority need" test. There can be no doubt that the Labour Government and the Labour-led Scottish Executive have done more to eradicate homelessness in the past two years than the Conservative Government did in 18 years in power, but there is more that we can and must do to prevent homelessness in the United Kingdom.

My Bill is relatively modest in its aims, but I sincerely believe that through these small and simple reforms we can prevent thousands of needless cases of homelessness. I hope that all hon. Members will agree that it is always better and less costly to prevent a problem from happening than to spend public money trying to pick up the pieces afterwards.

In the case of homelessness, we are talking about broken lives. I believe that we can prevent a very large number of homelessness cases with the enactment of some very minor changes. At present, tenants and owner-occupiers can resist repossession proceedings, but clause 1 would introduce a general right for any residential occupier to apply to the court for a short suspended possession order. That would include members of the tenant's or owner-occupier's family or lodgers. The intention is to provide residential occupiers with the right to ask the court for a brief period to find reasonable alternative accommodation. By providing that brief period, we could avoid families having to sleep rough or in conditions unfit for human habitation.

A recent trend in the UK has been for home owners to refinance their personal debt as consolidation loans secured on the value of their home. Such loans generally come with a much higher rate of interest than a principal mortgage. When family income drops, whether though illness or some other crisis, it is often the inability to meet consolidation loan payments that results in repossession and homelessness.

Clause 2 would enable the courts to vary interest to no lower than the average rate for a United Kingdom mortgage. The power could be used to provide a period of respite and enable families to get back on their feet and meet their financial obligations. Importantly, that could enable people to retain their homes. The local law centre in my constituency reports that families facing repossession are often told that they have mortgage arrears of £1,000 or £2,000, when in fact up to a third of the arrears are administrative charges applied by the bank. Most mortgages contain indemnity clauses that force the debtor to pay the bank's legal expenses. Govan law centre reports many cases of people being told that they must pay £1,000 or more to the bank for the cost of being taking to court, even if they win the case. Clause 3 would enable the courts to waive some of those charges when it could mean the difference between someone being able to pay the arrears or facing homelessness.

The final part of the Bill is aimed at some of the most vulnerable members of our society who are likely to face repossession and homelessness. When someone, for whatever reason, is in receipt of income support or jobseeker's allowance, they must wait 26 or 39 weeks before the Department for Work and Pensions will help to pay their mortgage interest. The fact that many families have to wait up to nine months often means that they will face repossession in the courts long before they get any help.

Of course, if such families had not purchased their home and were still renting from a social landlord, they would not face eviction and would get immediate help from the local authority. Some have argued that the position is discriminatory against low-income home owners, and I am aware of one legal challenge to the relevant social security regulation in my constituency, under articles 8 and 14 of the European convention on human rights. I understand that the case is currently before the social security commissioners.

Help with housing costs for home owners was substantially reduced by the Conservative Government in 1995. Since then, housing tenure has continued to shift generally towards home ownership. The Office of the Deputy Prime Minister reported in 2002 that only 19 per cent. of people in the United Kingdom rented their home from a social landlord, while 10 per cent. rented from a private landlord, and a massive 70 per cent. of all households were owner-occupiers, with 29 per cent. of those owning their home outright while 42 per cent. had a mortgage.

Mortgage protection insurance is important, but it has not been the answer in practice. The simple fact is that many low and modestly paid families cannot afford it, and many policies are ineffective because of exclusion provisions.

Clause 4 would enable the Secretary of State for Work and Pensions to intervene in appropriate cases in order to prevent homelessness. The stark reality is that the failure to intervene and provide additional help will cost the state more money in the long run—more money to accommodate a family in expensive temporary accommodation under the Homelessness Act 2002; more than it costs to accommodate a family in social rented housing in receipt of full housing benefit.

It is important to remember that many of the people facing repossession purchased their house because it cost less each month than renting it. That is why their eviction will be more costly to the state, which ends up paying a more expensive rent through housing benefit but does not provide any help for a cheaper mortgage. There is no policy logic in the current arrangements. I call on hon. Members to support the Bill and, by introducing some small legal reforms, help to make homelessness a thing of the past in the United Kingdom.

Question put and agreed to.

Bill ordered to be brought in by Mr. Mohammed Sarwar, Mr. Khalid Mahmood, Mrs. Alice Mahon, Angus Robertson, Jim Dobbin, Mr. Frank Roy, Sandra Osborne and Mrs. Helen Liddell.

PREVENTION OF HOMELESSNESS

Mr. Sarwar accordingly presented a Bill to make provision about homelessness: And the same was read the First time; and ordered to be read a Second time on Friday 18 June, and to be printed [Bill 73].

DELEGATED LEGISLATION

Motion made, and Question put forthwith, pursuant to Standing Order No. 118(6)(Standing Committees on Delegated Legislation),

SOCIAL SECURITY

That the draft Social Security (Basic Skills Training Pilot) Regulations 2004, which were laid before this House on 12th February, be approved.

That the draft Social Security (Intensive Activity Period 50 to 59 Pilot) Regulations 2004, which were laid before this House on 12th February, be approved.

That the draft Social Security (Intensive Activity Period 50 to 59 Pilot) (No. 2) Regulations 2004, which were laid before this House on 12th February, be approved.—[Margaret Moran.]

Question agreed to.

EUROPEAN COMMUNITY DOCUMENTS

Motion made, and Question put forthwith, pursuant to Standing Order No. 119(9)(European Standing Committees),

VALUE ADDED TAX

That this House takes note of European Union document No. 13853/03, Commission Communication on the review and update of VAT strategy priorities; and welcomes both the progress made so far and the United Kingdom Government's continued aim to ensure a fair, responsive and robust VAT system based on unanimous agreement amongst Member States.—[Margaret Moran.]

Orders of the Day

Traffic Management Bill

As amended in the Standing Committee, considered.

New Clause 11

POWER TO INSPECT BLUE BADGES

'(1) Section 21 of the Chronically Sick and Disabled Persons Act 1970 (c. 44) (badges for display on motor vehicles used by disabled persons) is amended as follows.

(2) In subsection (4B) after "a badge" there is inserted "purporting to be".

(3) After subsection (4B) there is inserted—

"(4BA) Where it appears to a constable or enforcement officer that there is displayed on any motor vehicle a badge purporting to be of a form prescribed under this section, he may require any person who—

(a) is in the vehicle, or

(b) appears to have been in, or to be about to get into, the vehicle, to produce the badge for inspection.

(4BB) In subsection (4BA) "enforcement officer" means—

(a) a traffic warden;

(b) a civil enforcement officer (within the meaning of section 73 of the Traffic Management Act 2004);

(c) a parking attendant (within the meaning of section 63A of the Road Traffic Regulation Act 1984).

(4BC) The power conferred on an enforcement officer by subsection (4BA) is exercisable only for purposes connected with the discharge of his functions in relation to a stationary vehicle.

(4BD) A person who without reasonable excuse fails to produce a badge when required to do so under subsection (4BA) shall be guilty of an offence."

(4) In subsection (4C) after "(4B)" there is inserted "or (4BD)".'.—[Mr. McNulty.]

Brought up, and read the First time.

1.38 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Transport (Mr. Tony McNulty): I beg to move, That the clause be read a Second time.

The new clause introduces a power for parking enforcement authorities to inspect disabled persons' parking badges, which we know as blue badges, to ensure that they are being used by those who are entitled to do so. My hon. Friend the Member for Milton Keynes, North-East (Brian White) tabled an amendment intended to cover this ground in Committee, where we undertook to consider how to introduce such a provision. I am delighted that we have been able to do so. Perhaps unusually, the measure had the acclamation of the entire Committee, which is why I am even more delighted, creature of consensus that I am, that we have been able to table this new clause.

The new clause addresses an issue that has been of great concern not only to those responsible for parking controls, who obviously have a particular interest in this area; significantly, it has also been of concern to many organisations of disabled people. Badge holders themselves want the disabled persons parking scheme to work effectively for those who need the concessions that it provides for their day-to-day mobility. Abuse of the scheme by those who are not entitled to its concessions undermines its credibility, but such abuse can also have a direct and immediate impact on the mobility of disabled people. Car parking places reserved for bona fide badge holders could be blocked by those who display a blue badge but are not entitled to do so. As the House will understand, such abuse can virtually destroy the entire daily schedule of the disabled person concerned.

The new clause will provide all those involved in the enforcement of parking controls with a power to require the driver or passenger—or anyone who they consider is returning to, or leaving, the car—to produce the badge for inspection. It restricts their exercising of that power to times when they are exercising their other functions. If a vehicle is displaying a parking badge but is not using the concessions that the scheme offers—for example, if it is parked in an area without parking restrictions—an enforcement officer will not be empowered to ask that the badge be produced for inspection. That is important to protect genuine badge holders from being targeted when they may have inadvertently left their badge on display.

Those required to produce the badge include the driver, the passenger or anyone who is seen to be leaving, or who is about to return to, the vehicle. So even when the disabled badge holder is not in the vehicle but the concessions are clearly being used, an enforcement officer will still be able to ask the vehicle's occupant to produce the badge for inspection.

In cases where someone unreasonably refuses to produce a badge for inspection, the clause creates an offence. Subject to conviction, a fine will be imposed not exceeding level 3, or £1,000. Guidance will be issued to enforcement officers and responsible authorities, advising them on the appropriate means of involving the police, so as to pursue a prosecution. We also intend that where a badge is not produced for inspection, the enforcement officer will treat that as a prima facie case of unlawful parking and issue a fixed penalty notice or a penalty charge, as appropriate. We do not need to provide for such circumstances in the Bill; the intention is that they will be covered in the guidance that we will produce for enforcement authorities and badge holders.

Mr. Greg Knight (East Yorkshire) (Con): A number of disabled people are concerned about what happens when the badge becomes partly obscured, perhaps because it moved while it was left in the vehicle; indeed, as a result of such an incident, many are given a ticket. If the badge is inspected and found to be in order and the disabled person is entitled to park where the car is parked, will the guidance make it clear that a ticket will not be issued if there is any possibility that such an incident might have been a mere accident?

Mr. McNulty: I undertake to make sure that, if need be, the guidance will make that clear. When it is clear that a perfectly legitimate badge has been obscured, my authority—and doubtless many others—rescinds such parking notices. But if guidance is needed I shall certainly take this issue on board.

On the subject of guidance, we will consult the relevant bodies representing local authorities, enforcement authorities and disability organisations, including our statutory advisers, the Disabled Persons Transport Advisory Committee. The guidance will be published before the power is brought into force. This is an important issue that DPTAC has brought to our attention before, and we said that we would seek to legislate at the earliest opportunity.

I am pleased that the Bill allows us to legislate on this narrow enforcement issue, and I anticipate that it will enjoy the support of the whole House. I hope that the House agrees that the new clause addresses a fundamental gap in the enforcement of the blue badge scheme, and that Members will support the Government in its introduction. It seeks to restore the scheme's legitimacy without allowing abuses, and I am grateful to my hon. Friend the Member for Milton Keynes, North-East (Brian White) and other members of the Committee for the way in which this issue was dealt in Committee. Although this measure is a small step in the wider scheme of things, in the context of making a substantive difference to the lives of disabled people, it has a significance far beyond that which we can grant it today. In that context of spirit, harmony and consensus, I commend the new clause to the House and hope to receive the House's acclamation for it, if not for myself.

1.45 pm

Mr. Christopher Chope (Christchurch) (Con): We welcome the new clause; indeed, in Committee we supported the previous new clause—new clause 23—when it was discussed. However, I have a couple of questions for the Minister. He mentions the recommendations of the Disabled Persons Transport Advisory Committee, of which the provision before us is a key example. Another issue of equal concern is when the Government will legislate to allow the issuing of blue badges for children aged under two who require the transporting of bulky medical equipment. That is a key issue—albeit for a small group of people—and I should be interested to know when the Minister will legislate on that recommendation.

Secondly, what happens when a person is asked to produce a badge for inspection by a traffic warden, civil enforcement officer or parking attendant, rather than a police officer, and the person of whom the request is made refuses to comply with it? According to the Minister's press release, such officials will have the power to inspect, but surely that is dependent on consent being given to inspection in the first place. How will it be possible to identify a person who refuses to allow the badge to be inspected, and what procedures for enforcement and penalties will flow from such a refusal?

Ross Cranston (Dudley, North) (Lab): I am very pleased that the Government have accepted this recommendation, and I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Milton Keynes, North-East (Brian White) on introducing this new clause in Committee. I declare an interest as the honorary president of the Blue Badge Network, which is based in Dudley town centre. As my hon. Friend the Minister said, the validity and credibility of the blue badge system, which is so important to disabled people, needs to be reinforced. As he rightly said, DPTAC made 47 recommendations, of which this is one. The fact that the police and enforcement officers will be able to call on those thought to be using such vehicles to produce badges for inspection is a very welcome move.

That, however, is only part of the jigsaw, and I should like my hon. Friend the Minister to say when the guidance will take effect. The DPTAC report rightly points out that powers already exist in respect of the illegal use of badges, and that penalty notices can already be issued to badge holders parked illegally on the street, and to vehicle owners parked in spaces designated for badge holders. However, enforcement is absolutely crucial, and as the hon. Member for Christchurch (Mr. Chope) said, we should consider the important issue of children aged under two. Some indication as to when the guidance will be introduced would be very welcome.

Unfortunately, there seems to be widespread fraudulent use of badges. According to one estimate, there are some 700,000 fraudulent abuses of the badge system. The chief superintendent of the Dudley, North operational command unit says that the number of badges, and the number of abuses of badges, are increasing at an alarming rate, so enforcement is absolutely crucial. An assurance from my hon. Friend the Minister on the implementation of the guidance would also be very welcome.

John Thurso (Caithness, Sutherland and Easter Ross) (LD): I, too, am pleased to welcome the new clause, which allows for the inspection of blue badges. It will be greeted warmly by all those who hold blue badges and will make a considerable difference to their lives, enabling them to avoid the frustration they often feel at being unable to use the parking spaces provided for them. It also has the benefit of making the law in England and Wales consistent with that in Scotland, which already benefits from such regulations. We supported the provision in Committee and I am pleased to confirm that we will support it today.

Brian White (Milton Keynes, North-East) (Lab): As the Minister said, I moved a similar amendment in Committee, and other hon. Members have already mentioned several of the points that I intended to raise. However, it is important for the Government to introduce the guidance as quickly as possible. I am sure that my hon. Friend will seek to do so, but it would be helpful if we had some indication of how quickly it is likely to happen.

Local authorities and the police already have a wide range of powers, and the disabled community will welcome the additional powers of inspection. Just yesterday I exchanged e-mails with one of my regular correspondents, Clive Bailey, who describes himself as a rebellious disabled member of the community. He pointed out the various problems that arise when people misuse parking bays. The power to inspect will make a major difference to the lives of people like him.

As my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Dudley, North (Ross Cranston) pointed out, there is further work to do on other elements of the blue badge scheme, and I seek the Minister's assurance that the Bill will be the vehicle through which the Government will seek to make the necessary additional changes to improve the blue badge scheme—the extension to under-twos, for example. The Bill is welcome and I congratulate the Minister on following up my original amendment.

Mr. John Redwood (Wokingham) (Con): To complete the harmony of the occasion, I, too, welcome the Government new clause, and I also urge the Minister to produce carefully worded and timely guidance and advice. The guidance needs to be tough in some parts and kind in others. The House would surely agree with me that we should be tough on the low sort of life that tries to cheat on the use of these badges. It is particularly low and dirty to try to gain a badge on false pretences or to seek to use a vehicle carrying a badge when the person using that vehicle is not disabled and is not transporting a disabled person with him. We can all agree on that, and I hope that the guidelines will be tough on such people and that the maximum penalties will be imposed where it has been clearly established that the person fraudulently obtained a badge or fraudulently used a legitimate badge for another user or driver.

I also agree with the important point made by my right hon. Friend the Member for East Yorkshire (Mr. Knight) about dealing with disabled people themselves. There will be times when the authorities will challenge a disabled person in order to check up on legitimate use or concerning the appearance of the badge. In those cases, I hope that it will be done kindly and carefully with the assumption that what really matters is the fact that the proper person was trying to use the facility in the correct way. If some mistakes in how or whether a badge is displayed are made, we should not take a dim view if the right person was seeking to use it for the right purposes.

Anyone who has suffered from temporary disabilities—broken limbs or other accidents—has just a small insight into what it must be like to have to live with even bigger hazards all one's life. We must all have enormous sympathy for such people and I hope that the measure that we are debating today will not make their lives more difficult. I do not want them to be hectored by the authorities trying to enforce the regulations against other people.

Mr. McNulty: I thank hon. Members for their kind words and their welcome for the new clause. I should like to deal with some of the points that were raised.

It was right to point out that the provision by no means exhausts all the DPTAC recommendations, and we are still reflecting on how best to deal with other outstanding matters. There are many different ways of proceeding. My hon. Friend the Member for Milton Keynes, North-East (Brian White) alluded to primary legislation, but there may be other vehicles for achieving what may appear to be only minor changes, which can be enormously important for people with disabilities. For example, we could attempt to rid the legislation of the overladen value judgment in the term "institution", in preference for "organisation". It is beyond the scope of this particular Bill, but it would also be good if we could implement a degree of reciprocity across the EU—if I may say that without provoking the current consensus—and a degree of mutual recognition of the system.

The eligibility for the scheme of children under two could be the subject of secondary legislation. We have accepted DPTAC's recommendation to extend the scheme to certain groups of children under two—not least those who constantly require bulky or life-sustaining equipment to be carried around. Draft regulations are being prepared in that regard and we will consult on them later this year—as early as we possibly can. More generally, we are seeking to issue guidance for consultation at the earliest possible juncture. We want to reach a stage where enforcement officers and disabled badge holders are able to understand the full breadth of the guidance before the new powers are introduced. Assuming that the Bill receives royal assent we hope to introduce the powers at the earliest opportunity.

The hon. Member for Christchurch (Mr. Chope) raised an important point about enforcement officers and interplay with the police. We shall seek to ensure that enforcement officers and the responsible authorities advise on the most appropriate means of involving the police in order to pursue a prosecution. The interface with the police is highly important and we want the guidance to make clear, after consultation with the enforcement authorities and the relevant police authorities, the system that will prevail to achieve that. I repeat my undertaking to try to ensure that any guidance should make it clear that, where the badge of an entirely legitimate badge holder has somehow been obscured, the provisions can be revoked.

There are other dimensions of the scheme that we need to reflect on further. We are examining the feasibility of establishing a national database of badge holders, specifying precisely who is entitled to use a badge throughout the country. We shall do some further research on that during the next couple of months. In the longer term, the advent and development of smartcard technology might provide an appropriate way to proceed.

Brian White: On that point, does my hon. Friend agree that the role of carers is crucial?

Mr. McNulty: The eligibility of carers and of people with a clear temporary but debilitating disability—the right hon. Member for Wokingham (Mr. Redwood) referred to them—will require further examination in some detail. Both in the House and beyond, people have broadly welcomed the provisions. The Bill provides a substantive advance, which should be made, but I fully accept that DPTAC's recommendations and a range of other suggestions show that there is further to go before the blue badge scheme will be fully operative in the way we all want. Abuses certainly have a profound impact.

Mr. Chope: In the press release issued today, the Minister says police and parking enforcement officers

"would have new powers to inspect blue badges", but my understanding is that the new clause will confer powers to ask to inspect. It does not give the enforcement officer the power to put his hand inside the car and seize the blue badge. If my interpretation is correct, will the Minister ensure that his press release is amended accordingly?

Mr. McNulty: I do not think I will—not least because it has gone! The release states that seeking the leave of people to inspect is the start of the process. The other end of it, assuming that co-operation is not forthcoming, is, as I have said, a prima facie case of abuse or contravention of the parking rules. In the context of both aspects, calling it a right to inspect is perfectly valid.

Ross Cranston: It may help the House to note that proposed new subsection (4BD) states:

"A person who without reasonable excuse fails to produce a badge when required to do . . . shall be guilty of an offence."

I think that the press release is therefore accurate, and that there is no need to try to retract it.

2 pm

Mr. McNulty: My hon. and learned Friend has said in elegant legal terms what I was clumsily trying to express in my own way. I think we will leave the press release as it is.

The right hon. Member for Wokingham spoke about the balance between cruelty and kindness, and called for a degree of flexibility in the guidance so that we focus on the people who transgress. Abuse in this area needs to be regarded as almost as taboo as transgressions such as drink driving. That is absolutely abhorred across the piece now, but only 10 or 20 years ago it was regarded as a bit of laugh. If a person got away with it, that was fine. It is not an overstatement to say that abuse of the blue badge scheme is an outright abuse of the civil rights and liberties of legitimate badge holders. If such people cannot park where they are lawfully entitled to, that can have a profound effect on their entire day.

With the caveat that there is still a way to go on this matter, in the sense that there are more improvements to be made through the incorporation of recommendations from DPTAC and other bodies, I commend the new clause to the House.

Question put and agreed to.

Clause read a Second time, and added to the Bill.

New Clause 1

CIVIL ENFORCEMENT OF TRAFFIC CONTRAVENTIONS (GUIDANCE)

'(1) The appropriate national authority may issue guidance to any local authority undertaking civil enforcement powers under Part 6 of this Act or the London Local Authorities and Transport for London Act 2003 about any matter relating to the exercise by it of any power to impose civil penalties for road traffic contraventions.

(2) In exercising their powers of civil enforcement of traffic conventions a local authority shall have regard to any guidance under this section.'.—[Mr. Chope.]

Brought up, and read the First time.

Mr. Chope: I beg to move, That the clause be read a Second time.

When the Minister introduced Government new clause 11, he made a slip of the tongue and talked about persecution. This new clause deals with persecution and how to prevent it. It is a plea for common sense, proportionality and reasonableness in the use of civil enforcement powers against motorists. It is a continuation of the Opposition's fight-back campaign on behalf of middle Britain. Motorists and other honest, decent and law-abiding road users are being persecuted and oppressed by unreasonable men and women in uniforms. The persecution is often carried out at the behest of local authority employers, out of greed or hatred of cars and those who drive them.

In Standing Committee, my right hon. Friend the Member for East Yorkshire (Mr. Knight) drew attention to a headline in a Hampstead local newspaper earlier this year—"Traffic Warden Boss Admits He Hates Motorists". The newspaper sent a journalist, operating under cover, for a discussion with the person in charge of the traffic warden service. That person freely admitted that he hated all motorists, and would do all that he could to get at them. It is always important to consider whether a motive is involved, and there is clearly a motive in this case. That is why the Government must act on the matter.

There was a long and lively debate on the morning of 5 February about the enforcement civil penalties for road traffic contraventions. Many examples were given to illustrate how unreasonable some civil enforcement can be. I shall not repeat them all, but earlier this year Nadhim Zahawi, the managing director of the YouGov organisation, was involved in an accident in which his scooter was wrecked. As he was lifted into an ambulance, a £100 ticket was put on his scooter. That was thought to be reasonable.

Another example occurred in the snowy weather at the end of January and the beginning of February. A local authority placed fine notices on cars that had been abandoned because of the snow. That was also regarded as perfectly reasonable behaviour.

Both those examples illustrate unreasonable persecution. The new clause would enable the Minister to protect motorists from the excesses of enforcement officers, whom my right hon. Friend the Member for East Yorkshire called

"regulation-ridden, form-filling, pen-pushing nincompoops."—[Official Report, Standing Committee A, 5 February 2004; c. 260.]

The hon. Member for City of York (Hugh Bayley) called them "over-zealous". The Minister said:

"In general, it is reasonable to ask those who enforce parking regulations to use good sense. I believe that in most cases they do: clearly, in some cases, they do not, and we all know of examples. We should encourage local authorities to promote good practice among those who enforce the regulations. For the police, that is generally the case. A police officer will use discretion and good sense, and a little bit of discretion and good sense is needed in enforcing some of the other regulations as well."—[Official Report, Standing Committee A, 5 February 2004; c. 266.]

Mr. Redwood: I am swayed by my hon. Friend's sensible arguments so far. New clause 1 states that local authorities "shall have regard" to guidance, but will he say what penalty or persuasion should be used to ensure that they follow any sensible guidance that is issued?

Mr. Chope: What I have in mind is that any statutory guidance could be taken into account by the adjudicator if an appeal is made. At present, the adjudicator must apply the letter of the law. He cannot allow the discretion that would have been exercised by a sensible police officer or traffic enforcement officer to be imposed on the tribunal. However, statutory guidance would allow adjudicators to take that into account. As a result, motorists would be protected from over-zealous enforcement.

The Minister, in the passage that I quoted, seemed to accept our point that civil enforcement officers do not always exercise the common sense, proportionality and reasonableness that we have come to expect from the police. He said that he was keen to encourage local authorities to promote good practice. The voluntary guidance published in 1995 pursuant to powers contained in the Road Traffic Act 1991 is non-statutory. It is apparent that some local authorities have little, if any, regard for it. The new clause would put that non-statutory guidance on a statutory footing.

The matter is even more important because of the proposals in the Bill to extend the civil enforcement regime to cover moving traffic offences. Some such enforcement is already beginning in London on an experimental basis, but the practice will become much more widespread nationally. That raises the need for statutory guidance.

The Automobile Association has said:

"The civil enforcement of parking and traffic offences will be discredited if motorists come to regard it as a revenue gathering exercise rather than a road safety and traffic management issue."

The British Parking Association, in a letter to the Minister dated 1 March, admitted that allegations that some penalty charge notices had been issued improperly were correct. The letter stated:

"At present enforcement relies on either the placing of a ticket on a stationary vehicle, handing the ticket to the driver of a stationary vehicle or on the corroborating evidence of a camera. We are concerned that with the advent of civil enforcement for moving traffic offences the uncorroborated evidence of a single enforcement officer will not be considered as adequate or safe by a large proportion of the public. In effect a driver will receive a penalty by post, some time after the alleged offence with no evidence other than the word of a single enforcement officer . . . and very little chance of being able to question or challenge the alleged offence coherently."

The BPA's interest is almost the other way in this matter, but it recognises that some local authorities behave unreasonably when it comes to civil enforcement, and that the Bill's powers in respect of moving traffic offences will cause an even bigger rebellion among the motoring public.

I hope that the Minister accepts that, at the very least, there needs to be statutory guidance to cover moving traffic offences, where the civil penalty cannot be served at the time of an offence and where reliance is placed on the uncorroborated evidence of a single traffic enforcement officer.

The Minister accepts that where traffic offences are decriminalised and the courts are no longer involved, it is necessary to ensure that those aggrieved by the imposition of the penalty charge have recourse to an independent and impartial tribunal. Such a system was set up under section 73 of the Road Traffic Act 1991. Unfortunately, the tribunals do not have the discretion to examine issues of reasonableness and proportionality, despite their being referred to expressly in local authority circular 1/95.

Page 38, paragraph 7.6 of the circular states:

"Local authorities should ensure that all parking attendants, including supervisors and managers, having the training necessary to provide accurate, fair and consistent enforcement. This requirement applies whether the parking attendants are employed by the local authority or by a contractor."

Paragraph 7.9 states that training should include

"The authority's policy for dealing with 'mitigating circumstances' and other matters which require judgment to be exercised (eg. the motorist claiming to be going for change when the PCN is issued; nearest pay-and-display machine out of order, but another machine is close by; claim that meter out of order when PCN issued; motorist claims that voucher, permit etc. was valid when attendant considers it was not; explanatory note left in vehicle".

Common sense and good judgment should be exercised on those issues, but there are currently far too many occasions on which judgment is manifestly not being exercised, and motorists are suffering as a result.

On wheel-clamping, paragraph 8.16 of the circular states:

"Local authorities undertaking wheelclamping should devise guidelines for when clamping may be carried out . . . It is important the guidelines can command public support by making the level of enforcement proportionate to the seriousness of the contravention. Wheelclamping may be brought into disrepute if a local authority permits it for what the public may regard as relatively unimportant contraventions."

Vehicle removals are another contentious area, and paragraph 8.28 of the circular states:

"Removals should not be carried out in an ad hoc fashion . . . As with wheelclamping, it is important to ensure that vehicle removals are only undertaken where the seriousness of the contravention warrants this level of enforcement. Inappropriate use of removals may bring an authority's enforcement activities into disrepute."

The problem is that none of that worthy advice from the Government carries any weight with the adjudicator if a local authority chooses to use its enforcement powers in an arbitrary, inflexible and oppressive way.

To put the matter in context, the latest figures show that more than 12,000 parking and bus lane appeals were received in the last three months of last year in London. More than 3,000 of those appeals were allowed, and in 3,266 cases the enforcement authority did not even bother to contest the appeal, resulting in an overall appeal success rate of 57 per cent.—moving traffic offences form a significant and growing part of that total. Most successful appeals and appeals that were not pursued by the enforcement authority should have been rejected at the informal representations stage. That aspect of the process is not working effectively.

Thousands, if not tens of thousands, of motorists cannot be bothered to go through that long process when they know that there is an inflexible law with minimum discretion for the adjudicator in examining the actual facts of the case, so they pay up regardless but under protest. If we had statutory guidance, which new clause 1 seeks, that would be in the past, and we would also be able to deal with the problem of those local authorities—it has been drawn to my attention that

Somerset, which is under Liberal Democrat control, is one such authority—that have a specific policy to incentivise traffic enforcement officers to go out and maximise revenue to the detriment of the travelling public.

2.15 pm

John Mann (Bassetlaw) (Lab): I have listened to the hon. Member for Christchurch (Mr. Chope) with incredulity given his references to the debate in Committee on 5 February in which it would be reasonable to say that I played a prominent part. He is so keen to pursue his long-held ideology of privatising everything and attacking the public sector at all times that one fears that he may have privatised his brain and that the shareholders have just taken a dividend. The debate on 5 February covered not only the public sector but the private sector.

The Under-Secretary of State for Transport, my hon. Friend the Member for Plymouth, Devonport (Mr. Jamieson) issued a letter that specifically refers the 5 February debate, in which I pointed out the difference between private sector operators of car parks and public sector operators of car parks and that private sector operators of public car parks are anomalous. I received the Minister's letter yesterday, which is rather late in the day, and it does nothing to address that anomaly—indeed, it excuses it.

The Minister is highly capable, competent and articulate, and he should know not to rely on information provided by the Department for Transport. He will recall that the Department managed to introduce road humps that failed to take account of where cars are positioned on the road, which were a disaster and unpopular across the country. The same point applies to the information that the Department has provided on civil and criminal enforcement, and the Minister's letter defends the existing legislation and the anomaly within it. An individual fined by a private operator of a private car park can go to a civil court and have their day in court. If a local authority is involved, an individual has the potential remedy of the parking adjudicator. But if a private operator of a local authority car park is involved, an individual can go to neither one nor the other and is therefore criminalised by the case being taken to the magistrates court.

The Minister's letter and new clause 1 both fail to address this point: a private operator with a profit maximisation outlook, which is reasonable if one runs a private company, can put the threat of going to a criminal court to the motorist. The motorist faced with the prospect of going to a criminal court will obviously be intimidated by the potential for criminal proceedings and a criminal record. The evidence from many cases in Bawtry car park, which adjoins my constituency, is that individuals cave in although their tickets should not have been given in the first place. New clause 1 must therefore incorporate civil enforcement if it is to be of any use to Parliament, motorists and the people of Britain.

Private operators are running public car parks as cash cows. They are raking in 100 per cent. of the money—as at Bawtry car park—and that must be addressed. The Minister, through his civil servants, has attempted to address the anomaly in the legislation, but failed once again to address the anomaly in the law, which was demonstrated in Doncaster magistrates court. Such cases are covered by section 112 of the Road Traffic Regulation Act 1984, which defines local authorities as "a county council . . . a district council, a London borough council and the Common Council of the City of London."

Therefore, neither a parish council nor the private operator of a parish council car park can take people to court. That contradicts the letter that the Minister sent to all members of the Committee—he is wrong and his civil servants are wrong. The issue is small because not many parish councils are stupid enough, anti-motorist enough or greedy enough to try to skin the motorist of money via a private operator. With the publicity that the parish council has received, I cannot imagine that there will be a queue—certainly in my area—of parish councils that wish to skin the motorist in such an unprecedented, unprincipled and greedy way. However, the anomaly could also apply to car parks owned by a county or district council or a unitary authority. Therefore, the issue must be addressed and my hon. Friend the Minister needs to put his mind to it. If the Government are to be on the side of the motorist, we cannot allow the private operators of public sector car parks to skin the motorist by using the threat of criminal proceedings. That has happened time and again, as proved by the evidence that I have provided to his Department.

One should never rely on evidence provided by a cursory examination by a local authority that—as the hon. Member for Christchurch pointed out—may also be on the make by skinning the motorist. For example, local authorities claim that car parking machines across the country are the same. They do not know that, because they did not configure the machines. If the civil servants had read the report of the debate on 5 February they would have seen from Hansard that the manufacturer of the machines, Metric, admits that the tolerance on the machines can be configured by the owner. When configuring a machine, the margins of tolerance are significant enough to determine whether, for example, a 20p piece registers. It is a longstanding issue. Years ago, people who had been abroad could stick old French francs in chocolate machines in place of a shilling to fiddle the chocolate manufacturers. Of course, I would never have dreamed of doing such a thing myself, but we have all heard the stories about such practices.

The question of the tolerance of the machines is fundamental. The owner of a machine can fiddle the tolerance so that a 20p piece stays in the machine but does not register, and the motorist might not notice that. How would the motorist then know that the money that they had paid honestly for car parking had not been registered by the machine? That might lead to the absurdity of a fine. That is a major issue, and I suspect that the scandal of Bawtry car park has been silently replicated across the country and that other hon. Members will be inundated with demands for action if my hon. Friend the Minister does not take action now.

In exposing the weakness in the new clause, with its ideology of privatisation, I have put before my hon. Friend the weakness of the arguments that his civil servants have provided for him. I trust that he will wish to reconsider that advice, put the record straight and allow the motorist to win, not the fleecer of the motorist's pocket.

Mr. Redwood: It is a privilege to follow the hon. Member for Bassetlaw (John Mann) after that powerful speech, and I have much sympathy with his condemnation of rapacious car park managers of all kinds. He may be on to something and it is a pity that Ministers have not taken his arguments more seriously so far. It was a little unfair to criticise my hon. Friend the Member for Christchurch (Mr. Chope), because the new clause tries to deal with a wider point about ensuring that sensible guidance is issued to local authorities that may be rapacious enough to see these measures against the motorist as an opportunity to raise revenue rather than to run a disciplined show.

The clauses in question include clause 70, which shows that we are talking about a wide range of contraventions by the motorist. The list includes:

"parking contraventions . . . bus lane contraventions . . . London lorry ban contraventions . . . moving traffic contraventions".

It was the inclusion of the latter group that worried my hon. Friends who framed the new clause. The Opposition are concerned by the way in which the motorist has been targeted by some authorities, national and local, as the object of fines for minor infringements of ill-judged regulations. Motorists agree that they are ill judged, and that is why the motorists fall foul of them. I am pleased that my hon. Friends have produced a proposal so that a sensible Secretary of State could offer guidance to local authorities and discipline or control any local authority that might wish to use sensible measures for orderly policing of traffic as a means of raising revenue by exploiting motorists in distress.

I shall not bore the House with many examples, but it is important to consider one or two cases of inadvertent or unavoidable infringements for which a motorist could be hounded if sensible guidance is not offered. One example is bus lane contraventions. Most of the time, it is right that a motorist should observe the restriction on his use of a bus lane. If the bus lane is in operation, whether or not any buses are using it, the motorist knows that he must keep outside the bus lane on what remains of the highway. Let us suppose something happens just ahead of the motorist—an accident, or a motorcycle or cycle pulling out—so that it is rational and necessary for the motorist to take evasive action by moving his vehicle temporarily into the bus lane to avoid a worse problem such as a collision or worsened congestion. That is a judgment that a motorist has to make in a split second. It may be that, before the enforcement authorities intervene, the temporary problem that caused the motorist to move into the bus lane has cleared or is not immediately apparent to the enforcement officers who were not on the scene at the time. The motorist may then be prosecuted, but it is important that authorities dealing with such infringements are sensible about what might have happened. In the event of prosecution, there needs to be a proper procedure to allow the motorist to state his case, and for that to be taken seriously. My hon. Friend the Member for Christchurch has done us a service by drawing attention to such issues.

The same is true of parking. On occasion, a motorist may identify a free parking space only to discover that the parking machines in the vicinity are full of coins and not operating or have broken down. Is it really the case that the motorist has to feel that he cannot park there at all, even though it is a lawful parking slot in normal circumstances, because the authorities have been unable to collect the money or maintain the machine to an appropriate standard? I would hope that a plea in mitigation would be available, so that the motorist could get off if he had tried to pay and had genuinely been unable to do so, especially in cases where he had put a note on the windscreen of the car, explaining that he had no wish to defraud or deprive the authorities of their money but that there was no one around to collect it and the machine that the authority had supplied could not take the money. I hope that such extenuating circumstances will lead to sensitive and sensible enforcement.

Under the new clause, in the event that authorities tried to play Dick Turpin with the extensive powers to charge and fine, there would be an opportunity for a Minister to issue national guidance. I have only one worry about my hon. Friends' sensible proposal. I doubt whether Ministers are on the side of motorist and would wish to use the power sensibly if local authorities saw the Bill as a way to raise money from unsuspecting motorists or those unavoidably tempted into breaking a rule or regulation. I will not hold that against my hon. Friends, however. I would like to see them return to government as soon as possible, and it would be useful if the provision were included in the Bill so that it could be used by a sensible Minister, even if we cannot persuade current Ministers that there is a problem. I sometimes read in the press that Ministers have seen the light and recognised that most of their constituents—and they themselves—are occasionally motorists, but at other times they seem to go back into the mode of thinking that all motorists are wicked and should not use their cars.

It gives me pleasure to support the new clause, and I hope that the Minister will find some words of comfort for the hon. Member for Bassetlaw, who needs a different kind of amendment to tackle the robber barons about whom he is rightly worried.

2.30 pm

Mr. Greg Knight: I hope that I am not developing early signs of schizophrenia, but I have been puzzling since our debate started about why, on the amendment paper, I am referred to as "Gregory" next to the new clauses to which I have put my name and "Greg" next to the amendments. Perhaps someone could enlighten me about that before we conclude our proceedings.

I support new clause 1. There is a need for a code of practice, compliance with which should be compulsory—it should be a mandatory code. It is needed because widely varying practices are currently applied to decriminalised parking enforcement contracts from one council to another. Existing guidance from the Department, which I understand is issued under circular 1/95, is not proving to be as helpful as many Conservative Members had hoped. The circular is largely ignored by several local authorities, and I am told that some councils are not even aware of its existence.

In case after case, the monetary gain from parking penalties is too much of a temptation for many councils, and they prefer to maximise their revenue at the expense of fairness and justice. I was listening to a local radio station in my car as I drove south down the M1 on my way to the House yesterday. I was astonished to hear someone from Leicester city council saying that the council had to increase the parking charges in the city of Leicester by far more than the rate of inflation because its revenue from the issuing of parking tickets had dropped. The radio interviewer seemed rather baffled as to why the council wished to penalise law-abiding motorists who parked in parking bays and paid their fees because the rate of revenue gained from those who ignored the law had fallen. The council has given the game away. Many local authorities introduce such measures as a purely revenue-raising exercise.

A mandatory code of practice would require local authorities to ensure that enforcement standards were uniform throughout the country. I believe that it would reduce the number of appeals made on tickets issued in borderline circumstances. As my hon. Friend the Member for Christchurch (Mr. Chope) said, the adjudication service would have clear instructions as to what was, and what was not, reasonable.

I would also hope that a code of practice would completely remove some of the dubious practices that currently exist in some parts of the country, and I wish to inform the House of several examples of such practices that have been brought to my attention since the Bill started its parliamentary progress. First, in some areas, a penalty charge notice is issued within one or two minutes of the expiry of the time purchased. Secondly, vehicles are sometimes clamped before the statutory 15 minutes has expired. I believe that 15 minutes is far too short a time anyway, because clamping adds to the delay suffered by the motorist and the inconvenience caused. It also puts a further £60 or so on top of what is already an extremely high charge.

Thirdly, vehicles are towed away from a parking bay within the first hour of overstay even though they clearly cannot be causing an obstruction because they are in a parking bay. The power to tow vehicles from parking bays should not exist unless it is clear from the effluxion of time that a vehicle has been abandoned. Fourthly, I am told that in some local authorities, authorised removal vehicles cruise around looking for offending vehicles. The Minister should condemn that practice because although it contravenes his Department's guidance, it happens on the streets of some of our cities.

Fifthly, traffic wardens do not wait to satisfy themselves of whether a vehicle is being loaded or unloaded. A case was recently brought to my attention in which a solicitor was visiting his in-laws and unloading a piece of furniture from his car. The solicitor was amazed to observe from the house window a traffic warden who approached the vehicle and started to write a ticket without delay. With the presence of mind that one would expect from a member of the legal profession, he took out a video camera and videoed the incident. When the local authority refused to withdraw the ticket, he took the matter all the way to court and won his case by producing evidence that the traffic warden had not satisfied himself that the vehicle was being unloaded.

The sixth complaint that has been drawn to my attention is about cases in which a penalty charge notice is issued for a so-called out-of-parking-bay offence even though the vehicle extends just over the bay lines. Does the Minister approve of such behaviour and, if not, will he tell us what he intends to do to bring about an end to the practices? If new clause 1 were to become law, it would cope with all the grey areas that I mentioned.

Mr. Redwood: I am grateful to my right hon. Friend for his good list. Has he come across the practice in some London boroughs of having one-armed-bandit parking ticket machines that do not tell people how much money they must put in to trigger extra minutes? People put in a reasonable amount yet discover that they have bought no extra time at all and that even more must be put in. There are machines that swallow money for time outside the hours in which parking restrictions are imposed, but people are not warned of that or given a refund. There are also machines that offer no change. Are not all those things akin to theft?

Mr. Knight: I agree with my right hon. Friend. Proper signing and notices are essential so that motorists know what is required of them. One wonders why the notices are inadequate. Perhaps that is deliberate—as I think he and I suspect—so that more revenue may be raised from the motorist.

We often hear that we are a tolerant society with a fair system of justice, but those practices are a blot on our otherwise well-earned reputation for fairness. They are driven by the greed of local authorities, not by justice. I frankly find them offensive because they are a means of raising money from those members of society who are in the main law-abiding, yet are identified by local authorities as a soft touch.

What makes matters worse is the fact that our fines and parking charges in general are already among the highest in the world. If my right hon. and hon. Friends will forgive me, I shall commit heresy by citing figures in euros. I think that the House will find the figures interesting. In Vienna, the maximum parking fee is €0.87 per hour. In Brussels, the maximum parking fee is €0.50 per hour, and in Barcelona, the maximum fee is €1.20 per hour. In Amsterdam, the maximum fee is €2.50 per hour, and in Paris, which is the nearest of our European partners' capital cities to this island, the maximum parking fee is €3 per hour. However, here in the UK, in London, the maximum parking fee is €8 per hour. I do not regard that as justice. The situation is not equitable or fair, and the Minister should examine it.

One can add to that the fact that most of our European Union partners impose fairly modest fines for breaches of parking regulations. Fines for parking offences ranging from €25 to €50 are the norm throughout the EU. However, in the UK, fines—perhaps I should call them stealth-tax fines—of between €100 and €130 are imposed.

Looking at these figures, the House can see how great is the injustice on the poor, long-suffering British motorist.

A report in The Times on 7 March revealed that "wardens in Scotland's two biggest cities distributed 500,000 tickets last year. Glasgow city council raised £6.6m in fines while Edinburgh collected £7.1m—a rise of 40% on the previous year."

[Mr. Knight]

It went on.

"Wardens in Edinburgh, nicknamed the 'blue meanies', have issued tickets to disabled drivers, police cars, ambulances and a hearse. Drivers in Glasgow have been ticketed close to midnight and others have been hit with fines for parking late at night in council car parks."

The report also reveals that, although 500,000 tickets were issued in Glasgow and Edinburgh, the police are responsible for issuing tickets outside those cities, and they issued only 157,000 tickets. That indicates that the police are operating as we would expect—in a quasi-judicial way—in issuing tickets when they feel that that is fair, yet in some, not all, decriminalised areas where wardens operate, those wardens see this as a money-making exercise.

The new clause is an attempt to stamp out those indefensible injustices, over which the Government continue to preside. Let the Minister accept the new clause, and if he resists it let him explain to the House how he intends to guarantee to the motoring public fairness and equity in the operation of our parking systems. The unfair brow-beating and money-grabbing persecution more suited to a banana republic than to the United Kingdom really must cease.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Transport (Mr. David Jamieson): I was interested in the remarks of the hon. Member for Christchurch (Mr. Chope), who repeated a phrase that he used in Committee: he said that he was involved in the fight-back campaign for middle Britain. I can tell him that if the unlikely day comes when he gets somewhere near to getting back into government, he will be doing as we are doing—fighting on behalf of the whole of Britain.

We fully intend that guidance will be issued to local authorities undertaking civil enforcement of traffic contraventions. Part 6 provides for putting civil traffic enforcement by local authorities on a consistent national basis. All authorities, whether in London or outside, will be given the same powers. It is important that authorities that exercise those powers should do so as consistently as possible across the country, and that requires nationally applicable guidance.

I am not sure that I would go as far as the right hon. Member for East Yorkshire (Mr. Knight), who I know to be a strong Europhile. I do not know whether those views are entirely shared by those around him. I do not want Euro-standards for fines or any matters to do with taxation, even though I am a luke-warm Europhile.

Mr. Knight: I was not arguing for Euro-standards; I was making the point that where we are so far out of line with the rest of the civilised world, surely something must be wrong. Our fines and parking charges are too high.

Mr. Jamieson: We are a long way out of line on road safety and on death and injury on the roads, and I would say that that is not wrong; it is right. We are right in the fines that we are imposing. It is also right that we make decisions about these matters, and I certainly do not want any Euro-standards. Perhaps the right hon. Member for Wokingham (Mr. Redwood) will come to the right hon. Gentleman's aid and make a strong, powerful case on behalf of Europe.

Mr. Redwood indicated dissent.

Mr. Jamieson: There we are—there is already a split on the Tory Benches. It doesn't take long, does it?

John Mann: I thank my hon. Friend for giving way on the issue of Euro-standards. As he will be aware, I have driven cars and lorries commercially into many of the cities that were mentioned, and I assure him that the information provided by the right hon. Member for East Yorkshire (Mr. Knight) is wholly inaccurate regarding a number of the capital cities that he mentioned; for example, Brussels, Vienna and Paris.

2.45 pm

Mr. Jamieson: I thank my hon. Friend for that.

The question is whether guidance needs to be put on a statutory basis, as new clause 1 seeks to provide. Sadly, we cannot accept the new clause as drafted, as it refers to the London Local Authorities and Transport for London Act 2003. The civil enforcement provisions of that Act will be repealed in due course by regulations to be made under the provisions of part 6 of this Bill. Also, I have to say that, although we know a good deal about civil enforcement of parking and bus lanes, in framing national guidance, we will in fact be learning from the practical experience gained by the pilots of enforcement of moving traffic contraventions to be undertaken in London under the powers in the 2003 Act.

I have considered the points made by my hon. Friend the Member for Bassetlaw (John Mann) in the debate and in the substantial correspondence that he sent to my Department, which I read with great care. It makes sense for local authorities to be able to contract out the day-to-day operation of their car parks where that represents best value. Where such contracts are entered into, it is of course the responsibility of the local authority to ensure that the appointed contractor acts in accordance with the authority's wishes.

The case of Bawtry council car park is, perhaps, unusual. My hon. Friend made a point about the adjudicator. In the case of that particular car park and highways authority the area does not, as yet, have decriminalised parking, which means that the adjudicator is the magistrates court. One of the things that my hon. Friend was asking for is that the parish council should have to go to the highways authority to get permission to go ahead with prosecution. The right hon. Member for Wokingham, who is not usually one for talking up extra regulation, even for local authorities, supported my hon. Friend in that. The difficulty is that we could be providing something that all parish councils in similar circumstances would have to do, putting an extra burden of bureaucracy on them because of what I consider to be the specific and particular problems of the car park in my hon. Friend's area.

I fully accept that there are difficulties in that car park; my hon. Friend articulated them with great strength and power today and in the Standing Committee. If he thinks that there are other places with similar problems perhaps the right hon. Member for Wokingham, who came to his support, knows of some—I will be interested to hear about them.

John Mann: The point is that the parish council cannot go for decriminalised car park status and if Doncaster council, as the highways authority, went for that status, the ambiguity would be even greater, because the parking adjudicator would be available for people parking in Doncaster car parks, but not those in the privatised Bawtry car park, precisely because it was privatised.

Mr. Jamieson: I do not think that that is correct. I will take some advice on that, but it is for my hon. Friend to go to the authority in Doncaster to see whether it has any interest in taking up the option of decriminalised parking. The adjudicator would then, as my hon. Friend says, be available to people in Doncaster. As I understand it, however, it is the operation of the car park, rather than the car park itself, that is privatised. My hon. Friend will accept that if we made regulation on the basis of one car park, which affected all the other parish council authorities in the country, that would be somewhat unfortunate.

I have listened to the debate with great care. Having listened to Members' oratory, I wish to sound an early conciliatory note. Whatever the defects in the drafting of the new clause, after careful consideration I have concluded that there is merit in putting civil enforcement guidance on a statutory basis. It would give the guidance greater force and make authorities more mindful of its content when carrying out enforcement activities. I therefore hope that the hon. Member for Christchurch will withdraw the new clause on the understanding that we will introduce a suitable amendment in another place, putting guidance to local authorities on civil enforcement of traffic contraventions on a statutory basis.

Mr. Chope: I am grateful for what the Minister has said. Could he be more precise about the stage at which he will table an amendment in another place?

Mr. Jamieson: I have only just been persuaded by the hon. Gentleman's arguments, but when the Bill goes to another place we will consider how to table a new clause to meet the points raised in new clause 1.

I hope that that is helpful. Notwithstanding his points about Europe, with which I did not agree, the right hon. Member for East Yorkshire expressed some genuine concerns, and we shall make sure that they are dealt with.

John Mann: I am horrified that the Minister has accepted a provision that worsens the double standards that apply to local authority car parks and privately operated local authority car parks. What advice would he give to the Driver and Vehicle Licensing Agency which, in a letter to me this morning, said that copies of penalty notices have to be provided? I won my court action against Bawtry town council because the DVLA had agreed that penalty notices were inaccurate and had been issued illegally. What does the Minister intend to do to ensure that equally strong guidance is issued to private operators, not least because the DVLA is key Madam Deputy Speaker (Sylvia Heal): Order. That is a very lengthy intervention.

Mr. Jamieson: Thank you, Madam Deputy Speaker.

The guidance, in fact, will take into consideration most of my hon. Friend's points, but I will also look at the involvement of the DVLA

Mr. Greg Knight: To hear a Minister admit that he listened to the debate and was convinced by it is very rare indeed, so I should like to place on record the fact that there is no gloating among Conservatives. Indeed, in our eyes, he has grown in stature.

Mr. Jamieson: That is extremely kind of the right hon. Gentleman. In the seven years for which I have been in government it has not been uncommon for Ministers to listen—indeed, that occasionally happened before we came to office.

I hope that my assurance has been helpful. A good case was made for the new clause, and I shall accept its substance for consideration in another place.

Mr. Chope: I am surprised but delighted by the Minister's approach. I hope one day to have a secretary who can type up my thoughts as quickly as the Minister's thoughts were typed up when, in responding to our debate, he changed his mind after he listened to our arguments. We decided, because of the strength of our arguments, to table our amendments well before the Bill's Report stage. The Minister could therefore have applied himself to the matter a little earlier, and tabled an appropriate Government amendment. However, we look forward to seeing the substance of the Government amendment in another place, and I hope that it will take into account the concerns expressed both in our debate and by parking adjudicators. Recognising that this is a victory in the motorist's fight back, I beg to ask leave to withdraw the motion.

Motion and clause, by leave, withdrawn.

New Clause 2

PERMITS ISSUED UNDER PART 3 (FEES)

'No fee in respect of any application for a permit or the issue of a permit under Part 3 of this Act shall be set at a level higher than that necessary to cover the administrative costs of—

(a) responding to permit applications;

(b) issuing permits; and

(c) maintaining a register of permits.'—[Mr. Chope.]

Brought up, and read the First time.

Mr. Chope: I beg to move, That the clause be read a Second time.

Madam Deputy Speaker: With this it will be convenient to discuss the following amendments: No. 10, in page 16, line 20, at end insert—

'(2A) Permit regulations shall set out standard provisions which must be included in a permit scheme so as to ensure a reasonable level of consistency between permit schemes within the authority's area, and in particular to ensure that a single electronic noticing system may be used to implement permit schemes within the authority's area.'.

No. 11, in page 16, line 40, at end insert—

'(f) for or in connection with the obtaining of permits for works carried out by the highway authority, and/or the inclusion of works carried out by the highway authority in a register of permits.'.

No. 12, in page 20, line 31, at end insert—

'(3B) A street authority may not give a direction under this section in respect of works for which a permit under part 3 of the Traffic Management Act 2004 has been issued."'.

Mr. Chope: I hope that the Government will be as accommodating of new clause 2 as they were of new clause 1.

The provision deals with a stealth tax that is estimated to cost £1.2 billion a year or £55 per household per year. It is therefore quite high up the list of stealth taxes. To put it in context, while that figure is not as high as the pension stealth tax of £5 billion or £6 billion a year, it is greater than the total yield from the new charging regime that the Government propose to impose on higher education. Our debate is therefore significant, because if the Government accepted the new clause, they would be unable to use the permit scheme in part 3 as a new stealth tax.

One of the most frustrating aspects of the Committee stage was the lack of clarity about the Government's intentions on the use of lane rental, penalties for roadworks that take longer than is reasonable and the introduction of a permit scheme, perhaps along the lines of the scheme used in New York. If the Bill remains unamended, the Government will have the power to use the permit scheme as a means of imposing charges on utilities for the mere occupation of the highway, irrespective of whether the occupation is necessary. The Transport Act 2000 introduced a lane rental scheme, which was piloted in Camden and Middlesbrough. Those lane rental pilots expire at the end of March and the Government consultants, Halcrow, will report on the outcome. It is already clear from their interim report, however, that the pilots have proved to be expensive and bureaucratic, and have not resulted in a reduction in the number and incidence of roadworks undertaken by utilities. New clause 2 would prevent the Government from using the permit scheme as a revenue-raising measure on a par with lane rental.

In Committee, the Under-Secretary of State for Transport, the hon. Member for Harrow, East (Mr. McNulty) said:

"the Bill is not about introducing permit schemes as a revenue-raising exercise."

He went on to say:

"We must ensure that there is sufficient ability to charge for the permits to pay for the scheme. However, it is not meant to be, and I do not think that it will be, a revenue-raising scam".—[Official Report, Standing Committee A, 29 January 2004; c. 163–65.]

The hon. Gentleman went on to suggest that he was sympathetic to our aim of including in the Bill a restriction on the power of local authorities to use permit schemes as revenue-raising measures. That was the good news, but sadly the efforts of representatives from the National Joint Utilities Group, who spoke to officials from the Department behind the scenes about finding a form of words acceptable to the Government were met with stony silence—indeed, were strongly rebuffed.

Mr. Eric Forth (Bromley and Chislehurst) (Con): I am interested in my hon. Friend's analysis, but how does it accord with the view in many quarters that we should allow local authorities the maximum discretion in deciding what to do in their own area? Is there not an argument for saying that in this case, as in many others, local authorities should be allowed wide discretion in charging for permits, as they would be accountable to voters later?

Mr. Chope: My right hon. Friend makes a case for giving local authorities a great stealth tax power but, having been the leader of a local authority, I believe that it should be the responsibility of national Government and Parliament to set the parameters of local authorities' tax and revenue-raising powers. It is a great privilege for local authorities to be able to raise taxes through, for example, the council tax. Imposing charges for car parking or occupation of the road is one thing, but a scheme for raising more than £1 billion a year from the utilities and, effectively, the public is something else—[Interruption.] My right hon. Friend the Member for Bromley and Chislehurst (Mr. Forth) thinks that that is a good idea, and I look forward to hearing his arguments later. Speaking as someone who is concerned on behalf of ordinary householders whose utility bills are already of significant size and will go up further as a result of various measures introduced by the Government, I think householders throughout the country need another £55 added to their utility bills each year like they need a hole in the head. I am in favour of flushing out the Government's attitude to this stealth tax. If it means that I go down fighting on behalf of my constituents and other householders, but get some criticism from my right hon. Friend the Member for Bromley and Chislehurst, so be it.

3 pm

Mr. Andrew Miller (Ellesmere Port and Neston) (Lab): Is there not a flaw in the hon. Gentleman's argument? He has argued before that the utilities, particularly modern utilities such as broadband, are delivered in a way that disadvantages people in rural communities. Is it not the case that rural communities would not pay the alleged tax that he has invented, and the burden would fall entirely on urban dwellers?

Mr. Chope: I have not yet referred to any particular utilities or to broadband. The hon. Gentleman mentions the specific issue of broadband and telecoms infrastructure. As he knows, that is a sensitive issue, and some of the more remote communities may get access to broadband without the roads having to be dug up.

Mr. Miller: So will the hon. Gentleman concede that his earlier figure of £55 per household is wrong?

Mr. Chope: I will not concede that that is wrong. It is, inevitably, an average. The calculation is based on dividing the figure of £1.2 billion by the number of households, which gives a possible cost per household of £55 per annum to introduce the scheme that the Government have in mind. The hon. Gentleman identifies a difference between rural and urban areas, which means that in some areas the figure will be less than £55 and in others it will be much more than £55.

Mr. Redwood: My hon. Friend has put his finger on a crucial point. Is this not part of a pattern? The Government came in with a utility windfall tax, went on to a pension tax, then to a telecoms tax—a swingeing £22 billion on our leading utilities at the cutting edge of the technological revolution—and now the Government are going on to another set of stealth taxes on utilities trying to improve the service to our constituents. I am entirely with my hon. Friend, and in disagreement with my right hon. Friend the Member for Bromley and Chislehurst (Mr. Forth) who, on this rare occasion, has got it wrong.

Mr. Forth: Wait and see. The House has not heard me yet.

Mr. Chope: Indeed, I have not heard my right hon. Friend's speech. I am grateful to my right hon. Friend the Member for Wokingham (Mr. Redwood) for his support.

Looking at the matter in context, it is clear that the biggest burden will be in the water industry, which is carrying out a major investment programme. The industry estimates that the cost of the scheme that the Government have in mind would be in the region of £300 million a year. If the Government accept the new clause, we will know that they do not have a stealth tax in mind. I recently attended a Greater London authority meeting, which was not an experience I would wish on other hon. Members. I noticed how enthusiastic the Mayor of London is about getting his hands on new revenue from the permit regime.

I shall speak briefly about the amendments included in the group. Amendment No. 10 seeks to avoid the administrative nightmare for utility companies of myriad different permit schemes operating across England and Wales. It would integrate an electronic noticing system within any permit scheme to further reduce the administrative overheads. The amendment is in line with the stated intentions of the Minister, who said in Committee:

"The greater the standardisation that the group can achieve, the better"—[Official Report, Standing Committee A, 29 January 2004; c. 166.]

The amendment would not prevent account being taken of local circumstances, but would ensure that differing local circumstances were taken into account in the application of a permit scheme, rather than in the scheme itself. A permit scheme needs to be flexible enough to take account of different road types and traffic conditions. Those are the key differentiating factors between local authorities. The amendment is supported by Transport for London, which states that it would prefer a single permit system to operate in London so that information could be easily shared and analysed and administrative burdens minimised.

Amendment No. 11 introduces uniformity by ensuring that the local traffic authority would have to abide by the same conditions as apply to utilities. If permits are an effective way of meeting the overall objectives of reducing congestion caused by obstruction in the road, logic requires that highway authorities should be included. Clause 32(2)(a) states that the permit scheme may make provision as to the persons who require a permit, which does not rule out the highway authority needing a permit for its works. The amendment would make that explicit.

Amendment No. 12 is designed to address the potential conflict between permit schemes and directions under section 56 of the New Roads and Street Works Act 1991. It is absurd to have different provisions in different Acts controlling the same set of circumstances. The amendment makes it clear that where a permit is granted, it will take precedence over section 56.

In conclusion, the amendments are supported by the Transport Sub-Committee, which has expressed its grave scepticism about the entire permit scheme and its opposition to the lane rental scheme. It believes that the Government should develop a scheme, which we strongly support, for penalties where utilities take longer than is reasonable to carry out works on the highway. Introducing an additional stealth tax is the wrong way to proceed.

Brian White: I have considerable sympathy with the hon. Member for Christchurch (Mr. Chope) because the amendments reflect a number of issues that I raised in Committee, especially a permit scheme. I was interested in why he mentioned a stealth tax and the figure of 55 quid. That assumes that the utilities would be subsidising local authorities; it assumes all the costs but none of the savings, and it is a worst-case scenario. To present the situation as the hon. Gentleman did exaggerates points that are validly made.

Mr. Miller: Did my hon. Friend notice that the hon. Gentleman omitted the effect of the business rate, and told me in response to an intervention that the £22 billion income from the telecoms auction was this Government's stealth tax? As my hon. Friend knows, that was started by another Government.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Alan Haselhurst): Order. I hope that in his mind the hon. Gentleman was addressing the Chair, rather than his hon. Friend.

Brian White: As my hon. Friend says, the 3G licence was in the Conservative party manifesto in 1997, on which the right hon. Member for Wokingham (Mr. Redwood) fought that election.

Mr. Redwood: I was the shadow spokesman when the measure went through, and I opposed it on behalf of Her Majesty's loyal Opposition on the grounds that it would do great damage to the industry, which it did.

Brian White: That does not answer the point that the right hon. Gentleman fought an election on that policy, which was proposed by the Government whom he supported. He has a selective memory.

The utilities have expressed concern about the way in which local authorities will operate the permit scheme. There is perceived unfairness in the local authorities' both operating and being subject to the permit scheme. I hope Ministers will discuss that with the utilities. There is also concern among utilities that additional costs will be passed to them and therefore to their customers, particularly in the telecoms industry. That industry is particularly fiercely competitive at the moment and there is not much scope for companies to absorb additional costs. In fact, most of them are fairly efficient. Telecoms works tend to be smaller in size and shorter in duration—many are completed in one day. On Second Reading, the Minister referred to the establishment of a working group to try to ensure that permit schemes take on board the needs and priorities of the economy as a whole. I urge him to consider any recommendations that come from that in relation to the operation of permit schemes.

Most telecoms companies strive to connect customers in line with their requests. There is a danger that all schemes will be treated equally although they do not cause the same amount of damage. Some roadworks are minor and involve non-sensitive roads. Permit schemes must be flexible enough to ensure that different schemes are treated differently—otherwise, people's fears about the size and cost of bureaucracy may be realised.

In response to my amendments in Committee, the Minister gave an assurance that permit schemes will be covered by regulations. I welcome that, but urge him to undertake full consultation before implementing the regulations, because the industry fears that that will not happen.

The hon. Member for Christchurch talks about the need for a national permit scheme, or at least one that is consistent across the country. Can the regulations be drafted from the point of view of someone who has to fill in the forms? Many utilities fear that they will have to fill in forms for many different types of scheme. It is important to have not only local variations to adapt to local circumstances, but consistency nationally so that national companies are not faced with myriad different approaches.

The new clause is unnecessary. This is not a stealth tax. There are legitimate concerns, but the hon. Member for Christchurch overstated them and they should be dealt with flexibly in regulations.

Mr. Redwood: I share the worry felt by my hon. Friend the Member for Christchurch about part 3, which gives wide-ranging powers to local authorities that wish to take advantage of them to set up permit schemes. In particular, clause 36(5) gives local authorities substantial powers to set

"the amount or maximum amount of any fee", to decide on

"cases in which fees are not to be payable or could be repaid"

and on

"cases in which fees may be discounted".

They are able to settle

"the time and manner of making payment of fees" and

"the application of sums paid by way of fees."

In my experience, several local authorities—they are usually under Labour or Liberal Democrat control—are constantly on the lookout for new sources of revenue. As they have many ways of spending, or often wasting, the money, they wish to raise more. I fear that those local authorities would see public utility businesses as a soft target. They would, after all, be following the example of Her Majesty's Government, who saw them as a soft target in the run-up to the 1997 election, confirmed it in the Budget that introduced the utilities windfall tax, and continued it with their whopping auction tax on telecoms. Through this measure, the Government are effectively encouraging local authorities to see that device as a way of raising additional money.

My hon. Friend the Member for Christchurch says that there is nothing wrong with a permit scheme, despite the bureaucracy and administrative effort involved, if it achieves the ostensible objective of the provisions. Let us remind ourselves of that objective—it is to say to utility companies that there is a cost to the rest of us when they dig up the street or road, and that it would be a good idea if they did it in as timely a way as possible, restricted the amount of road that they damaged or dug up at any given time to allow traffic to flow on the remaining part of the carriageway, rather than closing a large amount or all of it, and entered and exited the streetworks at times of day or year that do the least damage to traffic flows in the area concerned.

It is a matter of great concern to many of us that some local highways authorities and utility companies decide to embark on streetworks at the beginning of a busy term just in time for the first day back at school, which always increases traffic dramatically. We often see a cessation or reduction in roadworks during less busy times of year—in the summer holidays, for example, when traffic flows are much less because there is no school run and many more people are away on holiday. We often note that roadworks do not continue over the weekend, when traffic may be rather less, and that there is considerable blockage of the road on the Monday morning or Friday evening peak when traffic congestion is at its worst.

3.15 pm

Therefore, as someone who does not much like administrative intervention and regulation, I can live with the idea that there should be a permit scheme to regulate roadworks in the interests of making better use of the highway and increasing the capacity of the road system, particularly at busy times of day in busy areas. That may be a necessary evil. What worries me, however, is that without the amendment wisely tabled by my hon. Friend the Member for Christchurch, part 3 does not make it clear enough that its only intention is to discipline utilities and to encourage limited entry to the highway and entry only at the least difficult times of day or year. The Bill contains no statement that would prevent a local authority from seeing it as offering up a soft target for raising money.

We argued long and hard in Committee about why the proposals to limit or regulate access to the highway for roadworks do not apply to the public sector, because observation tells us that more often than not it is the highways authority, not the utilities, that does that work. I hope that the Minister will say more about that at the appropriate moment. As the Bill concentrates on the utility companies, it is most important that Ministers understand the strength of feeling on the part of people of all parties and of no party that there are far too many roadworks, that they are badly organised, and that they often run into periods of time or periods of the day when it would be far better if the highway were open to traffic.

Brian White: The right hon. Gentleman is giving a generalised picture that does not reflect what really goes on. In the case of the telecoms companies, for example, most of the cabling has already been done, so most of the works that remain to be done are minor.

Mr. Redwood: I accept that that means that such work may be much easier to regulate or does not need regulation at all. I would still hope, however, that the highways authority would take a view and suggest to the telecoms utility concerned that it would be good idea to do the work on a dull Sunday rather than a busy Monday. That would be a necessary improvement on the current regime.

I hope that the basis of any guidelines issued under part 3 will be to make more intelligent use of what highway we have and to limit the amount of restrictions upon it. It would be sensible, for example, for highways authorities to point out to water, gas, electricity or telecoms utilities that the repair or replacement work that they are doing can often be done in sections and that it would be possible, at half-past 4 or 5 o'clock at night, when the employees are thinking of going home, to close off the hole in the road again with a temporary or permanent closure of filling or tarmac so that the road can be reopened for use when they are not working on it. It would be possible to do something similar to ensure that the road is open for busy morning peaks and that the roadworks can be done thereafter.

Those are the sorts of measures for which the highways authorities should use their permit powers. If the amendment is rejected, however, greedy councils may decide that this is a marvellous opportunity to charge utilities a lot of money for engaging in streetworks and opening up the road. They may not be interested in the overall intention of speeding up the works or having them done at sensible times of the day or year, but may see a lot of advantage in allowing the utility to run on with the works, maximising the inconvenience to motorists, because they will generate more cash from the permit scheme.

I strongly recommend the new clause to the House. Without it, we will end up with another utility stealth tax that will undoubtedly have to be passed on to all our constituents in the way that my hon. Friend the Member for Christchurch describes.

Mr. Forth: I wonder whether the new clause moved by my hon. Friend the Member for Christchurch (Mr. Chope) is either otiose or entirely at odds with what I thought was our party's policy. I am rather puzzled, following the points that my right hon. Friend the Member for Wokingham (Mr. Redwood) made. He reminded the House that clause 36(5) says:

"Permit regulations may make provision for or in connection with requiring the payment of a fee in respect of an application for a permit or the issue of a permit, including provision as to . . . the amount or maximum amount of any fee".

My reading of that is that it has the potential to cover the matter that has caused such concern to be expressed by my hon. Friend the Member for Christchurch and my right hon. Friend the Member for Wokingham. I wonder how much added value there is in the words proposed in the new clause. On the face of it, the Bill as drafted seems to make more than adequate provision.

May I say in passing that I am uncomfortable with the immense degree of bureaucracy involved in this whole exercise? For example, clause 33—which is in part 3, the subject of new clause 2—says:

"A local highway authority, or two or more such authorities acting together, may prepare and submit to the appropriate national authority a permit scheme."

That takes us deep into the jungle of bureaucracy—up to our armpits or beyond. We have in that provision the lethal combination of local authorities on the one hand and national bureaucracies on the other. Yet, although I am sorry to say this, my hon. Friend the Member for Christchurch seems to be adding to that bureaucracy in a most regrettable way.

I may be labouring under a misapprehension, and I am sure that one of my hon. Friends will put me right if I am, but I thought that the whole thrust of my party's policy was local autonomy and local decision making. I have heard many of my right hon. and hon. Friends speak at great length, and with passion, about the need to give local bodies—be they school boards, local authorities or anything else—the maximum possible degree of discretion in making decisions for which they are accountable to their electorate. However, I now find to my astonishment that my hon. Friend the Member for Christchurch has come along with new clause 2, which apparently seeks to overturn that whole philosophy, because it says:

"No fee in respect of any application . . . shall be set at a level higher than that necessary to cover the administrative costs".

Mr. Redwood: My right hon. Friend protests too much. The purpose of new clause 2 is to signal clearly that the measure is not a tax. Local authorities have other taxes that they impose, but this should be simply an administrative charge that reflects the cost of giving the public something that many of them want: greater access to their roads.

Mr. Forth: That might be my right hon. Friend's view, but—

Mr. Redwood: It is.

Mr. Forth: My view, however—as I am the one speaking, I think that my view has primacy at the moment—is that local authorities should be given the scope and freedom to charge a fee, even if we call that a tax, at their discretion, for which they are accountable to their voters. That is the burden of my argument. I thought, in the most peremptory way, that that was the thrust of our policy, but along comes my hon. Friend the Member for Christchurch and tramples all over that. He is saying, in a heavy-handed way, that he has decided that were new clause 2 to be accepted, local authorities should not have that discretion. However, I bet that when my hon. Friend was the eminent, successful leader of Wandsworth borough council, he would have argued for such a stance and said, "Knowing the local conditions in Wandsworth, I, accountable as I am to my electorate, want us to have the freedom to impose such charges locally as I think are necessary."

Mr. Miller: May I ask the right hon. Gentleman if we are hearing a Tory split, or a Tory filibuster?

Mr. Forth: No, we are hearing a mature Tory debate of the kind that—

Mr. Miller: It is a split, then.

Mr. Forth: I do not want to be drawn into such an argument, but if the hon. Gentleman is saying that in the Labour party, new or old, a debate is now called a split, that tells us quite a lot about his party's mentality. In the new, thrusting, dynamic Conservative party we welcome debate because we are confident of our philosophy, particularly our philosophy on local government autonomy, if I may say so to my hon. Friend the Member for Christchurch.

Mr. Chope: Will my right hon. Friend accept that the whole ethos of Wandsworth borough council, when I was privileged to be its leader, was to keep taxes down? We wanted to have low tax rather than to introduce new taxes.

Mr. Forth: Yes, indeed. That was my hon. Friend's decision, and the people of Wandsworth rewarded him with a continuity of power unequalled in modern times. I am grateful to him for making that point. He made that decision and was rewarded by his electorate for it. Surely he would not now want to deny elected representatives in other local authorities the power to make different decisions for their areas. They might decide in this case, for their own reasons, that higher fees would be appropriate to their circumstances and conditions. That is why I am at a loss to understand why my hon. Friend is trying to persuade the House that somehow, in a Bill—

Brian White: Does the right hon. Gentleman accept that the utilities and other companies that will have to pay the costs have expressed concern about the impact that those costs will have on them? That is not the same as the argument that he is making.

Mr. Forth: I shall carry the argument some way to make my point, but if a local authority were to set fees at a prohibitive level, the utilities might not undertake the repairs and improvements that they wanted to and the local populace would suffer as a result. It would then be for the local voters to make their decision, on the basis that the exorbitant fees being charged by their elected representatives were having a counter-productive effect on their lifestyle. For example, knowing the hon. Gentleman's expertise and interest in such esoteric matters as broadband, I suspect that he thinks that every home should be served by the ghastly internet, and that the horrible material on it should be accessed by every household, perhaps regardless of the cost. I would take a different view, and suggest that if his local authority were wise enough to charge a penal fee to discourage the connection of the ghastly broadband and other internet services, his voters would be very grateful to him and to the local authority.

Mr. Chope rose—

Mr. Forth: But who am I to make such a judgment? I know not about such matters, and they are not for me or, may I say, even for my hon. Friend the Member for Christchurch to comment on. He looks pregnant, so I shall give way to him.

Mr. Chope: I hope that my right hon. Friend will not allow his prejudice against broadband to disguise the fact that there are statutory duties relating to the safety of gas mains and the provision of water, which local authorities need to take into account. If they impose substantial extra taxes on the provision and maintenance of those key facilities, the undertakers will not be able to avoid paying those taxes.

Mr. Forth: And indeed, to follow that point, the undertakers will not be able to avoid increasing their charges to their consumers, who will then be able to make a market judgment. What puzzles me, coming from my hon. Friend the Member for Christchurch and my right hon. Friend the Member for Wokingham, of all people, is that that they seem to be shrinking from allowing a market judgment. In the end, two mechanisms are in play on this point: the political, electoral mechanism of local authorities and the market mechanism between the utilities and their consumers, who happen in this case to be coincidental with the voters. I should have thought that that would appeal to my hon. Friend the Member for Christchurch, and I can see that he is thinking about it, which encourages me to hope that he might reconsider his position. In the end, however, I need to hear much more from him, and I hope that when he winds up this little debate, he will give further arguments to explain why he seems so wedded to a degree of central control and fiat that is completely at odds with his distinguished political history and his political philosophy. That is my problem with new clause 2.

3.30 pm

To return to where I came in, were my right hon. and hon. Friends to want to go down this route in any case, my reading of the original wording of the Bill is that it probably provides sufficient powers in the key phrase

"the amount or maximum amount of any fee",

although I accept that that implies a degree of centrality, central control and omniscience—not to say omnipotence—that I find distressing. However, if my right hon. and hon. Friends want the words, they are there in the Bill already, and I hope that they will reconsider the position that they have taken in new clause 2 and seek leave to withdraw it.

I am equally horrified by amendment No. 10, because here we are introduced to the phrase

"standard provisions which must be included", which strikes me as amazingly prescriptive, and to the provision,

"to ensure that a single electronic noticing system may be used".

Mr. Redwood: If my right hon. Friend reads the amendment clearly, he will find that it includes the words

"within the authority's area", so his argument about local autonomy is quite irrelevant. In this amendment, my hon. Friend the Member for Christchurch is preserving the right of the authority to make a recommendation, but saying that it should be consistent throughout the authority area.

Mr. Forth: Again, that should be a matter for the local authority itself. Why do we need a form of words to be put on the face of the Bill to tell a local authority to do something that it should be perfectly capable of deciding for itself? I do not think that this is a particularly circular argument, or even, dare I say it, a repetitive one, as I have now moved on to amendment No. 10 as opposed to new clause 2. Surely the local authority should be allowed to make its own decision about whether standard provisions should be included, even within its area. It is just conceivable that, if a local authority covered a densely populated urban or suburban area as well as an element of rural hinterland, it might be appropriate to have different provisions for different parts of the area.

Who would feel it incumbent on themselves to come along and put in cold print on the face of a statute these prescriptive requirements that intrude on the decision making of an elected and accountable local authority? A philosophical conflict is built in to what my right hon. and hon. Friends want to say about local authorities in the overall sense—with which I thoroughly agree, and which I applaud—and the thrust of what they are saying in new clause 2 and amendment No. 10. All in all, I am a bit unhappy about this, and I am very unhappy to find myself at odds with my right hon. and hon. Friends. I hope that, after the Minister has attempted to persuade the House of his position, my hon. Friend the Member for Christchurch will take the opportunity to reconsider what he has brought to the House, to think about the overall context in which he is offering it to us, and to avoid any suggestion that this might be a blot on his otherwise immaculate reputation.

Mr. McNulty: Perhaps I can steer a path between the extremes expressed by the right hon. Member for Wokingham (Mr. Redwood) and the hon. Member for Christchurch (Mr. Chope), and the eminently sensible contribution from the right hon. Member for Bromley and Chislehurst (Mr. Forth). That is not an unusual thing to say, especially for those of us who spend our time haunting this place on Fridays. The right hon. Member for Bromley and Chislehurst seems to save up his sensible suggestions for Fridays, but today he is clearly having a good day on a Tuesday, for which I am enormously grateful. He is right to suggest that these proposals are otiose, but I must provide a sting in the tail to his argument. If he is putting forward the broadly social libertarian local autonomy argument, I must part company from him, albeit gently. I agree with the thrust of what he has said, but his suggestions must be implemented within a framework of regulation and guidance.

The new clause is otiose, as the right hon. Member for Bromley and Chislehurst suggests, and it tramples over local autonomy. I would also part company with him over his description of today's Conservatives as confident, bright young things compared with what they were in the past. We have to part company at some point.

The right hon. Member for Wokingham gave the game away when he suggested that he wanted to send a signal that this scheme was not about stealth taxes or revenue raising, and that it was merely seeking to cover the cost of administration, as I suggested in Committee. With the greatest of respect, legislation is not the place for sending signals. The Bill should do what it purports to do and no more. The right hon. Gentleman can send signals in a little column in The Spectator or the Wokingham Gazette or Bugle, but not in the Bill. That would be as inappropriate as the—what is the polite word?—rantings of the hon. Member for Christchurch about the figure of £55 per household. Just because something is repeated often enough, or appears often enough in The Mail or The Express—

Mr. Chope: And The Sun.

Mr. McNulty: The Mirror or The Sun, whatever you like—anything at the murkier end of what purports to be the media in this country. Just because such things appear often enough, it does not mean that they are true.

Mr. Forth: On that very point, does the Minister recall "tough on crime, tough on the causes of crime"? Does not that belie what he has just said?

Mr. McNulty: I do not think that we put a price on that in quite the same way as the hon. Member for Christchurch did when he suggested that the measures would cost £55 per household. So, the right hon. Member for Bromley and Chislehurst and I have parted company again, which disappoints me as we usually get along so splendidly.

Many of the points made by Conservative Members fall into the trap of seeing the amendment, and all the clauses to which it refers, in total isolation from the rest of the Bill. They included the suggestion that the proposal is a devious scheme to get more money for local authorities, of whatever persuasion. When we consider the measures that the Conservatives constantly refer to in their fight-back for the drivers of middle Britain, and when we consider in detail the implementation of these schemes, there is not a whole lot of difference between the political parties in terms of what they do out there in the big wide world. There is no difference at all, save for the propensity for casualties in their areas.

The right hon. Member for Wokingham suggested that local authorities up and down the country would deliberately carry on street works for as long as possible just to extract as much money as possible from the contractors. That is in stark contrast to the provisions of clauses 16 and 17, and to all that we have said about network management duty. If an authority tried to utilise a permit scheme, suitably applied for and allowed, simply to clog up the streets—which by definition it would—simply to secure a revenue stream, it would not work because of the network management duty.

Mr. Redwood: Will the hon. Gentleman firm up that promise? Is he saying that Ministers will have to ensure that the local authorities insist on speedy street works and will impose only administrative charges on people and not unrealistically high fines?

Mr. McNulty: I would like to go all the way with the right hon. Gentleman in that regard, but I cannot because that issue is outwith the full comprehensive nature of the Bill. I cannot say yes to that question in isolation from the whole range of other elements of the network management duty that we went through in detail in Committee. It was clear from our discussions and from what will be in the guidance that that duty is not simply about the flow of traffic or the speed of that flow. It is not just about the absence of congestion; there is a whole range of things involved, as we explored in Committee. I agree with the right hon. Member for Bromley and Chislehurst that the new clause is otiose, for some of the reasons that he has given, and others.

New clause 2 would mean that a fee for any application for a permit or the issue of a permit could not be set at a level higher than the administrative costs to the permit authority of responding to a permit application, issuing the permit and maintaining a register of permits. I said clearly in Committee, and I repeat that permit schemes are not designed as means of raising extra revenue for local authorities. They are intended as a way of enabling all potentially disruptive activities in the street—be they utility works, local authorities' own works, the placing of skips or whatever—to be managed in an integrated and co-ordinated way.

Crucially, as my hon. Friend the Member for Milton Keynes, North-East (Brian White) suggested, we have set up a working group on which all those parties sit—the utilities, local authorities and others—and charged them with considering the details of how permit schemes might work and making recommendations to the Government. That will enable us to provide in regulations and guidance that very framework within which—here I come back onside with the right hon. Member for Bromley and Chislehurst—those decisions can be made at local level to determine whether those involved want to pursue a permit scheme or otherwise.

I have to say again that the hon. Member for Christchurch goes on and on as though these are schemes—not only those involving permits, but others—that we are about to impose directly by compulsion on each and every highway authority in the land. We are not doing that in any way, shape or form, but we want to work with the parties on which these proposals will have the most direct impact. That will enable us to draw up regulations setting out the standard arrangements applying to the schemes, as well as guidance for those operating schemes and those who would need to apply for permits. By pure coincidence, the first meeting of that working group is being held today, just around the corner.

Among other things, the group will look at exactly what activities would require permits and what level fees should be set at. In considering fee levels, it will look not only at the costs of operating schemes, but, entirely appropriately, at whether it would be sensible to set different fees according to differing circumstances. That involves the flexible standardisation that the right hon. Member for Bromley and Chislehurst suggested.

It is, appropriate to have a framework, clearly established, within which these decisions can be made, but the whole array of ideas on how to go forward with a permit scheme should be left to the local authority. For instance, should all activities attract the same fee or should the fees be varied according to when, where and how they are carried out? Those involved will also look at how, if at all, permit schemes would fit in with existing arrangements such as that for charging utilities whose works overrun an agreed deadline. We want to give the group the flexibility to look at all those relevant issues.

In the light of the group's work, but above and beyond the working party, we will hold, later in the year, a widespread public consultation on draft regulations before those are brought to Parliament. As the right hon. Member for Bromley and Chislehurst suggests, new clause 2 is otiose, but I am a fair man. Broadly, we still have consensus in most of the House, although there is clearly disagreement and disarray in some parts. Having made those comments, I will take this away and consider what the hon. Member for Christchurch has said on the issue so that at a later stage in the Bill's passage through Parliament—in another place—we can perhaps provide more information on the Government's intentions.

I say that deliberately, because when the Bill reaches the end of the legislative process, I want it and the subsequent guidance and regulations to be fully informed by the working group and the involvement of local authorities, utilities and other operators. That will enable us to sign off those regulations and the guidance with as much agreement as we can—in some cases, people subsequently decide that there are all sorts of difficulties with such regulation and guidance—as early as we can. Then we can leave it, within the framework of regulations and guidance, to the local authorities to determine whether they want to pursue a scheme. We will have a look at what the hon. Member for Christchurch has said, by all means, but first we should let the working group have a look at the thing.

Amendment No. 10 would appear to require that regulations made under clause 36 must ensure reasonable consistency between permit schemes. The hon. Gentleman is entirely right: I said in Committee that that would be of use—certainly within authorities, but between authorities as well—if there were some commonalities. I do not want to put too many consensual words in the mouth of the right hon. Member for Bromley and Chislehurst, but, as he suggests, much that will be needed in terms of standardisation could be dealt with in regulations.

The regulations would have to set out certain standard provisions that were common to all permit schemes, especially in relation to electronic noticing systems. I agree with the hon. Member for Christchurch that it is desirable that there should be some standardisation—I have already alluded to that—but it cannot be sensible to have dozens of entirely different schemes operating in different parts of the country. Many utilities, although not all by any means, work nationally and some standardisation is appropriate, but I do not believe that we need such prescription in the Bill, as this issue can safely be dealt with through regulations.

The working group, which we have set up to consider the details of permit regulations and the accompanying guidance, has been asked specifically to consider the issue of standardisation. I suspect that there will be some merit in going down that road. The group will make recommendations to us later in the summer on that and other matters, after which we will again go out to wide public consultation on the way forward.

3.45 pm

Amendment No. 11 is, I understand, intended to enable permit regulations to deal with highway authorities having to obtain permits for their own works and to record those on a permit register. Again, the amendment is unnecessary. The interpretation provision in clause 38(1) already makes it clear that the scope of "works" means that permit schemes can include works carried out under the Highways Act 1980. That covers a wide range of works carried out by highway authorities, including road maintenance works, construction of bridges and introduction of traffic-calming measures.

The regulation-making powers can enable those works to be subject to a permit scheme anyway, taking into account the unavoidably different considerations that apply in regulating the activities of public authorities and private companies.

We have asked the working group looking at permit regulations and guidance to consider how the works carried out by highway authorities can be incorporated within the scope of permit schemes. The aim behind permit schemes is to improve the management of all works in the street, including highway authorities' own works.

Amendment No. 12 would have such effect that a street authority could not give an undertaker a direction relating to the timing of one of its street works where a permit had already been issued for that works. Clause 36(8) provides that regulations made by the appropriate national authority may set out provisions that modify or disapply primary and subordinate legislation. Depending on the exact structure of permit schemes decided on in the light of consultation and the work of the working group, I would expect it to be necessary for the regulations to set aside certain sections of the New Roads and Street Works Act 1991, which set down how, where and when works can be carried out. That is needed to ensure, as the hon. Member for Christchurch suggested, that we do not duplicate controls in certain areas.

We have asked the working group to consider which existing legislation should be dealt with in that way. The power to make directions under section 56 of that Act may be one that we would want to set aside in cases where a permit has been issued. Again, that is a matter for the working group to consider rather than for the Bill prescribe. The scope to alter provisions is appropriate and already in place.

In view of my comments and the excellent contribution, by and large, from the right hon. Member for Bromley and Chislehurst, I am sure that Conservative Members feel able with confidence to withdraw the proposed new clause. As we suggested in Committee, the working groups that are bringing together local authorities, operators, utilities and other interests should put the real framework in place, so that we can take matters forward. I seriously ask the hon. Member for Christchurch to withdraw the new clause so that we maintain the consensus—shaky though it may now appear—that has driven us thus far on Report.

Mr. Chope: We have had an excellent debate and, as with that on new clause 1, it was all the better for the fact that the Liberal Democrats did not participate.

The debate centred largely on intellectual and philosophical purity. My right hon. Friend the Member for Wokingham (Mr. Redwood) and I are on one side of the argument; my right hon. Friend the Member for Bromley and Chislehurst (Mr. Forth) is on the other. My right hon. Friend the Member for Bromley and Chislehurst identified a paternalistic streak in me but in the past, a paternalistic streak was found in him—when my right hon. Friend was forced, probably against his intellectual judgment, to regulate activity centres following the Lyme bay tragedy, in direct response to a private Member's Bill presented by the hon. Member for Plymouth, Devonport (Mr. Jamieson). Neither my right hon. Friend nor I can say, much as we might wish, that we are absolutely consistent in our intellectual purity.

Mr. Forth: Surely my hon. Friend accepts that I was a Minister then. He is only in the Opposition now.

Mr. Chope: Is my right hon. Friend saying that he was a pressed man, whereas I am volunteering?

Mr. Forth: Something like that.

Mr. Chope: If that is the best mitigation that my right hon. Friend can put forward, I leave it to others to judge.

I am disappointed that my right hon. Friend did not highlight that the House is being bypassed by the vast range of regulation-making powers in the Bill—particularly in that part to which new clause 2 relates. Only a few days ago, a leading article in the Financial Times stated that regulation is the new clause IV. The Government are using regulation instead of nationalisation to achieve their objectives. The Bill contains an enormous number of regulation-making powers over which the House will have little control.

The issue is whether one believes in low taxes, be they transparent or imposed by stealth—though we are against stealth taxes. We want low taxation. We want to protect householders from the £55 per annum burden represented by part 3. The figures have not been dreamt up by me but are the result of careful analysis by the National Joint Utilities Group.

[Mr. Chope]

When we put the new clause to the vote, as we intend, those who support it will be voting on behalf of hard-pressed householders by saying, "We do not think that you should be burdened with an extra £55 a year on your utility bills." Those right hon. and hon. Members who enter the No Lobby will be saying that they are indifferent to those householders' plight.

Question put, That the clause be read a Second time:—

Tellers for the Noes:

Question accordingly negatived.

New Clause 4

USE OF BUS LANES

'Any motor vehicle with two or more passengers shall be entitled at any time to use any carriageway marked out as a bus lane.'.—[Mr. Greg Knight.]

Brought up, and read the First time.

Mr. Greg Knight: I beg to move, That the clause be read a Second time.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With this it will be convenient to discuss new clause 6—Bus lanes (use by other vehicles)—

'. All bus lanes where buses are moving in the same direction as traffic in the adjacent or vehicle lane shall be open to use by cycles, motorcycles, licensed taxis and invalid vehicles.'.

Mr. Knight: It must be about 25 years ago that the first bus lane was introduced in the United Kingdom. I think that it is appropriate, as this Bill is before us, that we take a look again at the operation of bus lanes in the UK to see whether we can strike a better balance and get more use out of bus lane capacity. All too often, we see empty bus lanes and congestion in other lanes. For much of the day in some cities, traffic is at a standstill, while alongside that congestion there are empty bus carriageways.

[Mr. Knight]

When bus lanes were introduced, they were sold to the public as a way of decreasing pollution by allowing buses to have quicker access to and from city centres. The argument went that if people caught the bus they would find that their journey was quicker because the bus would be able to use a dedicated bus lane. We were told that that was the environmentally friendly way to travel. However, I think we would all accept—at least I hope we would all accept—that bus lanes have not worked as well as we were told they would on their introduction. The reason for that is that, in many city centres during the rush hour, a third of the road capacity in one direction in some cases, and in others up to half the road capacity, is taken up with a dedicated bus lane.

Mr. Forth: Does my right hon. Friend agree that enforcement of bus lane discipline is sadly lacking? I do not know whether he shares my experience but, driving in London, I see a rather regrettable number of violations of bus lanes, with apparently very little effort to enforce them. Does he not agree that enforcement, together with his proposal, would make a great difference?

Mr. Knight: I would warn drivers who think that they can use the bus lane without getting caught to take care, because cameras have been installed at the front of buses to act as a video policing unit and record the details of any vehicle transgressing the current rules. I welcome that development. My right hon. Friend is right that enforcement has been and remains to some extent a problem, but detection rates are on the up because of the use of new technology.

Law-abiding drivers have to sit in their cars in long traffic queues, increasing not only pollution but anger and frustration.

Mr. Miller: They could get on the bus.

Mr. Knight: Contrary to that sotto voce contribution, that is not an option that is available or appropriate to every motorist. Some people find that, although the bus may cover part of their journey, if they are travelling to a rural area such as East Yorkshire, the service is either woefully inadequate or non-existent. It is simplistic attitudes such as the hon Gentleman's that got us into this position. Many motorists cannot use a bus because it does not take them where they need to go. The enemy here should be pollution, not the motor car. As cars become less polluting, his attitude towards them should become more benign.

Given that bus lanes do not work as well as we were told they would 25 years ago, it is now appropriate to reconsider the rules and guidance on their operation and try to make them work better. New clause 4 is designed to encourage car sharing. Its scope does not extend to contraflow carriageways: I do not argue that those should be opened up to other traffic, but a with-flow carriageway could be used by shared cars.

This is not a unique or new proposition. Car sharing is encouraged in many states in the United States of America. If there are more than two passengers, the car is entitled to use a dedicated lane. There is a real incentive to share a journey and thereby reduce car use, in turn reducing congestion.

My right hon. Friend the Member for Bromley and Chislehurst (Mr. Forth) was concerned in an earlier debate about taking discretion away from local authorities. I accept that the new clause would do that, but I say good, because they have been singularly unimaginative in their approach to tackling this problem. I do not say that the Minister was misleading, but I do not think he painted an accurate picture when he replied to a similar debate in Committee. He gave the impression that it is all down to the local authority, but I have obtained a copy of the guidance issued by his Department, and it is not neutral on the subject.

On page 15 of "Keeping Buses Moving" there is a reference to other vehicles using bus lanes. It says that this "could encourage the rather different result of a switch to car sharing by public transport passengers".

However, it does not go on to say why reaction over here should be any different from what happens in the United States. The next paragraph says:

"It is considered that while there can be no general case for allowing high occupancy vehicles to use bus lanes, there may be special situations where a high occupancy lane would be justified."

The guidance is designed to dissuade local authorities from introducing bus lanes that other vehicles could use. That is a shame, and whether or not the Minister feels that local authorities should continue to have such flexibility, I hope that he will say today that ministerial encouragement should be given to innovation in this area. I also hope that he is prepared to encourage local authorities to establish whether car sharing in the United Kingdom would help to decrease the congestion that is all too often present in urban areas, not just in rush hours but for most of the day.

4.15 pm

Mrs. Gwyneth Dunwoody (Crewe and Nantwich) (Lab): I do not intend to detain the House for very long on this subject, but I want to discuss a very real problem that I have encountered. I have discussed it with the Department, but I received a factual reply that did not deal with it at all. I ask the Minister to give a moment's thought to the unfortunate milkmen in inner-city areas. Milk floats, which are by definition extremely slow and rather unwieldy, rightly have to avoid inner bus lanes because they would constitute a hazard. But delivering to customers in inner-city areas has become so difficult that many milkmen do not know how to proceed. One unfortunate milkman incurred £450 worth of fines in one week, which was more than he earned. If we as a nation want to encourage people to continue to buy bottled milk, we should think seriously about this issue.

I should tell the Minister that I do not have any pet solutions—would that I did—but the traffic authorities need to be told that we desperately need such small tradesmen to continue to offer a service, particularly in urban areas. If they cannot deliver, they will soon give up trying and make their money elsewhere, which would be to the detriment of such services.

In talking about clearing bus lanes, we should also consider the plight of the service provider during certain working hours. I do not pretend that finding a solution will be simple, but unfortunately, the suggestion that milk be delivered during the night—superficially, that seems a good answer—ignores the fact that if it is delivered at such times in urban areas, it is not on the doorstep when the householder gets up in the morning.

Mr. Redwood: Will the hon. Lady give way?

Mrs. Dunwoody: I am happy to give way on the subject of milk bottles.

Mr. Redwood: Is the hon. Lady suggesting to the Minister that small delivery vehicles should be exempt from bus lane rules? I would have a lot of sympathy with such a proposal.

Mrs. Dunwoody: I hesitate to suggest that, but we do need to find a way to enable people to continue to deliver goods. I do not have a lot of sympathy for the very large chains, which could organise their deliveries accordingly and keep people on at night to open up stores and let in deliveries; however, for individual tradesmen this problem constitutes a significant hazard. Indeed, it is worrying many people and putting them off wanting to do the job.

Would that I had an answer for the Minister. This is perhaps a unique parliamentary occasion, in that I have nothing to suggest, but he need only tell me that he will think hard about the matter and come up with a usable scheme.

Mr. Paul Marsden (Shrewsbury and Atcham) (LD): The intention behind new clause 4 is laudable. Given the need to reduce congestion, any suggestion that involves cars carrying more than one passenger is good in principle. The difficulty lies in the practical enforcement. I suspect that one of two scenarios will arise. To enforce the provision, an enormous amount of extra resources will have to be invested to provide more cameras to watch bus lanes; or we will end up like the United States, where there is a booming trade in suitcases containing pop-up secondary figures, which can be placed in the front passenger seat in order to fool traffic wardens and police officers. It is then going to be a waste of time, and it will also defeat the object of reducing congestion. On some urban roads where there are regular bus services—let us say every eight, 10 or 15 minutes—the congestion will clearly be worsened by cars being allowed into the bus lanes.

I am more than happy, however, to support new clause 6, proposed by the right hon. Member for Wokingham (Mr. Redwood). It is eminently sensible and it highlights the current problem of enormous local variations, which leave many cyclists and motor cyclists confused as to whether they can or cannot use bus lanes. I hope that the Government will therefore accept new clause 6, but the Liberal Democrats cannot support new clause 4.

Lembit Öpik (Montgomeryshire) (LD): Does my hon. Friend agree that for single user travel, motor cycles represent an environmental benefit compared to cars; secondly, that motor cyclists are on the whole pretty responsible in their use of bus lanes; and, thirdly, that the Government themselves promised before 1997 to put motor cycles at the heart of their transport strategies? Would it not be odd if the Government now refused to take seriously the provisions of new clause 6, so sensibly proposed by the right hon. Member for Wokingham (Mr. Redwood)?

Mr. Marsden: I agree with my hon. Friend and I hope that the Minister will deal with that in his reply.

As I said before, I would be interested to know whether the Conservative Front Benchers have costed the enforcement of the provisions in order to transform what seems to be a good idea into a practical outcome that would reduce congestion.

Mr. Redwood: I rise to support my new clauses 4 and 6. With the oral amendment suggested by my right hon. Friend the Member for East Yorkshire (Mr. Knight)—that this should apply only to bus lanes where the traffic is moving in the same direction in and adjacent to the lane—new clause 4 makes a great deal of sense. Furthermore new clause 4 is complementary to my new clause 6. There is some overlap. For example, under new clause 4, a taxi with a passenger would automatically be able to use the bus lane, because it would be a "vehicle with two or more passengers".

Depending on the definition of "vehicle", the same would apply to a motor cycle with a passenger and there are other overlaps with public service vehicles.

I hope that, on further reflection after hearing my remarks, my right hon. Friend might see the advantages of my new clause 6, as the hon. Member for Shrewsbury and Atcham (Mr. Marsden) has kindly done. The purpose of both new clauses is, as my right hon. Friend pointed out, to make greater use of the space of a bus lane without in any way impeding the progress of the bus. The purpose of the bus lane is to allow the bus to hit faster journey times with greater reliability. I do not believe that the proposals in either new clause—certainly not in new clause 6—would in normal circumstances get in the way of achieving that.

In the case of new clause 6, I would argue that there are not only advantages stemming from greater use of the highway, but overriding safety considerations, to which I should like to draw the House's attention. The Liberal Democrats have briefly referred to them and I would have thought that they would recommend themselves to Ministers. Under the new clause, would be entitled to use the bus lane. The case for each is a little different, as I should like to explain.

"cycles, motorcycles, licensed taxis and invalid vehicles"

First, there is the cycle or push bike. I believe that it is very dangerous for cyclists in busy urban areas—where bus lanes are usually located—to have to jostle between large and sometimes fast-moving buses on the inside lane and every sort of vehicle ranging from fast cars to extremely heavy lorries on the outside lane, especially on narrow highways that may not initially have been designed to have both a bus lane and a mixed-vehicle lane in the same place.

According to the highway code, cyclists should occupy the inside of the mixed-vehicle lane, which means that they are just on the outside of the bus lane. That can be an extremely dangerous position. A bus can whistle along in the bus lane, which its driver can reasonably expect to be free. However, the driver must make the difficult judgment about whether a cyclist has the extra inches of clearance at the edge of the bus lane necessary for the safe passage of both vehicles. At the same time, the drivers of cars or lorries in the other lane might be attempting to overtake the cyclist, not realising that a bus is about to create the pressure—or pinch point—on the cyclist. That often leaves very little wobble room for the cyclist. [Interruption.] I see that the Minister is yawning, but he should appreciate the plight of cyclists in this respect. Although a bicycle may be correctly placed on the road, there may be a little overhang in the bus lane.

Mr. Jamieson: Yes, I did yawn, partly because the right hon. Gentleman is going on at such length. Unless a local authority says otherwise, cyclists are permitted to use cycle lanes. That is why I was looking a little bored.

Mr. Redwood: That is right, and if a cycle lane is provided along with a bus lane and a mixed-vehicle lane, my argument does not apply. However, there are many locations in the areas in which I travel regularly where there is no cycle lane parallel to the bus and mixed-vehicle lanes. My brief analysis of the cyclist's plight is very relevant and the Minister should listen carefully. I speak for many cycling interests outside the House. They would tell the Minister how perilous it can be to occupy the exposed—but correct—position on the highway, between fast travelling buses and relatively slow travelling other vehicles. That is where cyclists can get squeezed.

Mr. Greg Knight: Perhaps my right hon. Friend and I can shake the Minister out of his boredom. Is he aware that, in 1995, the Conservative Government gave the go-ahead for a trial in the Bristol area allowing motor cyclists to use bus lanes? A period of assessment was given to determine whether there was any detrimental effect on safety, and I understand that the safety record was excellent. Is it not now time for us to grasp the opportunity and introduce the provision elsewhere?

Mr. Redwood: I am grateful to my right hon. Friend, and I shall come to the subject of motor cycles when I have finished talking about cyclists. New clause 6 would give cyclists the choice about where to ride. I think that most would prefer to ride in the bus lane, close to the kerb. There are fewer buses than other vehicles, and bus drivers would be aware that cyclists could be encountered there. As they approached from behind, bus drivers would be under a duty to move out around the cyclist if there was a potential conflict. Cyclists in that position would not then face the twin pressures of the mixed-vehicle lane and the bus lane at the same time.

My proposal means, however, that cyclists could be on the inside of the mixed-vehicle lane and the bus lane, if that is what made sense in the circumstances. Also, a cyclist who wanted to turn right would have to move over to the inside of the mixed-vehicle lane to complete the manoeuvre. Cyclists would therefore have greater flexibility. They are the most vulnerable of road users, and that necessary extra flexibility would be welcome.

Mr. Forth: Does my right hon. Friend accept that there is a potential problem here? Cyclists who use the inside of the designated bus lane—which I hope will include vehicles in multiple occupation—force the drivers of buses and other vehicles to move out when they want to pass. That partly blocks the mixed-vehicle lane. Does my right hon. Friend agree that it is possible that the total traffic flow will slow down as a result? Has he taken that into account?

Mr. Redwood: I have taken it into account, but the problem is not major. The advantage of my proposal is that, in normal circumstances, the bus will be travelling much more quickly than the cyclist. The manoeuvre involved will therefore take only a very limited time. There will be problems in very heavy traffic, but I submit that even bigger problems will remain if this extra flexibility that I propose is not given to cyclists. The congestion incident that my right hon. Friend described will still occur, but cyclists would occupy a different position on the highway. If the highway is not wide enough to accommodate bike, bus and other vehicles—the analysis offered by my right hon. Friend—it will not be wide enough to accommodate bus, bike and other vehicles, which is the disposition covered by my new clause. I think, therefore, that my right hon. Friend's point is not strong: the case is neutral, because both analyses reveal that a problem is created when a highway is too narrow to accommodate a bus lane and another lane.

4.30 pm

My right hon. Friend the Member for East Yorkshire has indicated that motor cycles are a different case. The extra flexibility would be a good idea for them, because we have all experienced motor cyclists weaving in and out of heavy traffic to get to the front of the queue and optimise the power and relative thinness of their machines compared with other vehicles. Giving motor cyclists the choice between the bus lane or the multiple-occupancy vehicle lane would probably help to minimise incidents in which they collide with wing mirrors or other parts of vehicles in the multiple-occupancy vehicle lane.

Motor cycles would not get in the way of buses because in practically every case they have better performance than buses and obviously keep themselves well out of the way, normally by accelerating away from contact. Such flexibility would be an added welcome freedom for motor cyclists and would reduce conflicts between them and other vehicles. They are currently crowded into the multiple-occupancy vehicle lane and cannot get into the bus lane to get free of other vehicles, which might reduce collisions as bus lanes tend not to be used and are more likely to contain free space for motor cyclists.

Lembit Öpik: The Motor Cycle Industry Association has examined the evidence and made it clear that it is safer for motor cyclists and better for the environment to make it easier for people to use two wheels instead of four when they choose to travel alone. That point is born out by the expert literature, including Motor Cycle News, which backs up the right hon. Gentleman's point that there is no downside to allowing motor cyclists in bus lanes because buses will never be held up by higher-performing motor cycles.

Mr. Redwood: I agree with the hon. Gentleman's views. Motor cycles will not normally hold up buses, and allowing them to go in bus lanes will give them greater flexibility. The multiple-occupancy vehicle lane is often congested, which makes it difficult for motor cyclists and other vehicle users.

The green argument, which probably informed much of the original work on bus lanes, contains a mistake. The sad truth is that buses travel around this country with, on the whole, few occupants. The average bus has only nine passengers, although occupancy is obviously much better during rush hours in urban areas. If a bus is travelling around with so few passengers, it is, of course, a less green option than all those people travelling in their respective modern motor cars. The average bus is quite old and average fuel efficiency is very poor as a result. It is a less green option to switch people out of modern cars into older buses unless the buses achieve high occupancy rates, which is a point that should inform debate on the selection of bus lanes. The green argument for bus lanes only holds in areas in which high occupancy can be obtained with frequent services that people can rely on.

The case for licensed taxis is easy. Licensed taxis are, after all, public service vehicles that offer a service to the general public, and they often help those who find it most difficult to get around in our community. I should have thought that they, like buses, should obtain some advantage from the use of privileged lanes. That is not only my view but that of many Labour, Liberal Democrat and Conservative councils around the country, which can allow taxis in bus lanes.

In many cities, oddly, some bus lanes allow taxis and others do not. In some cities, some lanes are taxi friendly and others are not. Such situations make it difficult for novice taxi drivers, and taxi passengers cannot understand why they sometimes buy an advantage and other times do not. A general measure to allow taxis in bus lanes would be welcome to taxi drivers and passengers countrywide. The point is certainly important in the evenings when people want to go out. If it were easier and cheaper to use taxis because they travel quickly down bus lanes, it would encourage people to use them rather than their own cars, and if people are tempted to have a drink there is no possible danger to them or other road users.

Finally, invalid vehicles are slow-moving vehicles used by some of the most vulnerable people in our community. I am not saying that they must use the bus lane—it is difficult for them to decide where they should go on a busy road with both a bus lane and a multiple-occupancy vehicle lane—but it would be good to give them the choice because some of them might feel safer if, like bicycles, they travelled close to the curb with a threat from one stream of traffic only rather than having to travel in the multiple-occupancy vehicle lane. That lane probably contains a threat from both types of traffic because invalid vehicles are often relatively narrow and other vehicles think that they can get past them, which is not always the case on a narrow stretch of two-lane road.

It must be terrifying for some people in those vehicles on busy roads with two lanes, where they are sandwiched in the middle. I would like to give them the choice. They would not have to use the bus lane, but they would probably welcome the choice. I hope that I can persuade my right hon. and hon. Friends and the Liberal Democrats to agree with new clause 6, and I am happy to support new clause 4, especially with the amendment to make it clear that it does not apply to contraflow bus lanes.

Mr. Forth: I admit that I am puzzled by what my right hon. Friend the Member for Wokingham (Mr. Redwood) has just said. I am not sure that there is an amendment to new clause 4. My right hon. Friend the Member for East Yorkshire (Mr. Knight) tried to slip one in, rather cleverly, but I am not sure that it is valid. I am therefore puzzled as to whether I am debating the wording as it appears on the amendment paper, which states:

"Any motor vehicle with two or more passengers shall be entitled at any time to use any carriageway marked out as a bus lane."

Perhaps my right hon. Friend, by some parliamentary sleight of hand of which I was hitherto unaware, has managed to change it to resemble more closely new clause 6.

Mr. Redwood: I think that my right hon. Friend the Member for East Yorkshire (Mr. Knight) was hoping that the Minister would think that his suggestion was a good idea and would wish to have a similar amendment tabled in the other place.

Mr. Forth: It remains to be seen whether my right hon. Friend the Member for East Yorkshire wishes the Minister to take up the wording on the amendment paper or the wording of his verbal amendment. I thought that I would try to clarify that point, and I am not sure that my right hon. Friend the Member for Wokingham has helped me to do so.

I approach the issue from my experience of driving on the I-5, which passes through Seattle, between Portland, Oregon and Vancouver, British Columbia. On a lengthy stretch of that road, which is arguably one of the busiest interstates in the USA, especially at rush hour, there is a traffic lane dedicated to vehicles carrying two or more persons. From my observation of that experiment, it works well and makes a lot of sense. It is not a theoretical exercise, but a practical one. We can look to such examples, especially in the United States, and draw on them.

Mrs. Dunwoody: Do I detect a slight imbalance in the amount of road space used by roads in the United States, especially in Oregon, compared with this country? From personal experience, Oregon is a rather larger county than any of the ones that the right hon. Gentleman and I normally deal with. Would not the space available affect the issue?

Mr. Forth: The good people of Oregon would be extremely upset if their state were referred to as a county. It is a great state and it is indeed fairly large. We should bear it in mind that our entire country could fit into the state of Wyoming, which has a population of only some 500,000. However, it would appear that that is a thought upon which you do not wish me to dwell, Mr. Deputy Speaker, given the expression on your face. I take the hon. Lady's point. The United States has more space, generally speaking, for carriageways, even in the urban area of Seattle, but American vehicles are wider than ours. I do not wish to press the parallel to the distress of the hon. Lady, whose knowledge of such matters is greater than mine is ever likely to be. I simply raised the issue as a tentative example of how allowing a lane to be dedicated to a certain type of vehicle, whether for buses or vehicles in multiple occupation, is probably a good idea and seems to work well.

The hon. Member for Shrewsbury and Atcham (Mr. Marsden) raised a reasonable point about enforcement, which ties into the intervention I made as my right hon. Friend the Member for East Yorkshire introduced new clause 4. If there is a problem, it is the lack of proper enforcement of the bus lanes that already exist. To that extent, there might be a concomitant problem of enforcement if the new regime were put in place, but that is an argument for more effective enforcement in general rather than a specific objection to new clause 4. I hope that the Minister will examine the proposal positively following the debate and bear the enforcement point in mind.

I generally followed the argument that my right hon. Friend the Member for Wokingham deployed when he spoke to new clause 6, although with the reservation that I expressed in my intervention. If we encouraged cycles and motor cycles, especially, to use such designated bus lanes, it might exacerbate traffic congestion because larger vehicles such as buses might be caused to swerve around two-wheeled vehicles and thus perhaps obstruct the mixed vehicle lane. However, I accept my right hon. Friend's analysis that that would probably be a price worth paying and that, given the benefits that we would get and the encouragement that the measure would give to people to use two-wheeled vehicles, it should probably at least be tried.

The introduction of pilot schemes and observing how the system would work might be worth exploring, although that suggestion is not explicitly provided for in the new clauses. We do not need to rush into such schemes completely when we embark on them. I am sure that the Minister accepts that pilot schemes are often a good idea, especially when assessing such suggestions. Perhaps different variations of the scheme could be tried and observed.

We thus come to the intriguing difference between new clause 4—before the attempted verbal amendment on the hoof by my right hon. Friend the Member for East Yorkshire, which was a novel parliamentary experiment—which would allow any carriageway to be used, and the more explicit provision drafted by my right hon. Friend the Member for Wokingham in new clause 6, which would apply if traffic were as buses. Perhaps, again, it would be worth piloting different approaches. I am intrigued by the prospect of contraflow traffic containing a mixture of different vehicles. It might sound like a recipe for chaos on the face of it, but it might work perfectly well and ease traffic flow in some circumstances. I would not want to dismiss either formulation out of hand. We could easily accept either formulation, determine how it works and find out how it could be extended nationwide.

"moving in the same direction"

My right hon. Friends have done us a great service by proposing such imaginative and experimental ideas. I hope that the Minister is in an imaginative mood, although he does not seem to be in any sort of mood except a somnolent one. When he replies to the debate, I hope that he will sparkle, impress on us the fact that he has grasped all the imaginative suggestions, and say that he might be prepared to carry them forward, rather than laying the dead hand of officialdom and bureaucracy on them, as is, regrettably, all too often the way. This is a bit of a challenge to the Minister. We have put the suggestions forward—I am happy to support them—and rather than dismissing them out of hand, I hope that he will give us some encouragement and indicate that he will be prepared to consider them, perhaps through pilot schemes or experiments, so that when we come into government, we can report back to the House that they have been successful.

Mr. Jamieson: I shall endeavour to sparkle this afternoon, as suggested by the right hon. Member for Bromley and Chislehurst (Mr. Forth). I agreed with the points made by the right hon. Member for East Yorkshire (Mr. Knight) at the start of his speech when he said that we want better use of our roads and bus lanes. I did not quite follow his argument about buses in East Yorkshire, however, because when I was last there, I did not see many bus lanes in some of the rural areas—they were mainly in more urban areas. Perhaps he will inform the House where they are. He will know the area far better than I do.

4.45 pm

The arguments that we have had today were well rehearsed in Committee, and I am delighted that we are hearing them again today. Bus lanes are generally provided to enable buses to avoid the queues that occur in congested road networks. The higher carrying capacity of buses means that the lanes make efficient use of road space in terms of moving people, and the quicker and more reliable journey times that follow make buses a more attractive and realistic option, thus further relieving pressure on the road network. The more other vehicles are allowed to use bus lanes, the more the purpose and effectiveness of those lanes is devalued.

New clause 4 would effectively turn all bus lanes into high-occupancy vehicle lanes. It is easy to envisage that bus lanes would become choked by other traffic and that the presence of other vehicles in a bus lane would encourage the drivers of single-occupancy vehicles or those carrying just one passenger to use the lane as well. That would delay buses and lead to enforcement problems.

The right hon. Member for East Yorkshire talked about using new technology such as cameras to enforce bus lanes. Of course, cameras can be used to distinguish between buses and other vehicles, but there is considerably more difficulty in distinguishing whether a car has one, two or three occupants, as the new clause would require. That is why the enforcement of high-occupancy vehicle lanes in Leeds and south Gloucester relies on a police presence and the ability to stop vehicles apparently contravening the rules. There was a complaint from one lady who had a small child strapped in the back of her car who, of course, was not visible to the police officer from outside the car. There are difficulties and anomalies in trying to enforce such rules.

I recognise that, in the right place, high-occupancy vehicle lanes can be an effective traffic management measure, and the right hon. Member for Bromley and Chislehurst will be pleased to know that, later this year, my Department will be publishing guidance to authorities on the implementation of such lanes. Who knows, in the very long term, when the right hon. Gentleman and I are well retired, there may be a Conservative Government implementing some of these plans.

Mr. Greg Knight rose—

Mr. Jamieson: I was just coming to the right hon. Gentleman's point about high-occupancy vehicle lanes, but I will give way.

Mr. Knight: We welcome what the Minister said about issuing guidance. Will it be general guidance that, in effect, updates what is now the seven-year-old guidance on bus lanes? The hon. Member for Crewe and Nantwich (Mrs. Dunwoody) raised an interesting point. The original guidance referred only to heavy goods vehicles using bus lanes in some cases, and there may be a case for short-run delivery vehicles being included as well. Will the guidance be all-embracing?

Mr. Jamieson: The guidance will relate to high-occupancy vehicles.

I do not have the experience of the right hon. Member for Bromley and Chislehurst of travelling in the United States of America, but I think that I have travelled on the road outside Seattle to which he referred. Like my hon. Friend the Member for Crewe and Nantwich (Mrs. Dunwoody), I noticed that it was rather wider than even the widest motorways in this country. I noticed also that it had no bus lane but rather a high-occupancy vehicle lane, whereas the new clauses relate to bus lanes, which are mainly in confined urban areas that in no way equate to the great intercity highways of the USA. Interesting though his point was, it does not easily read across to this country.

My hon. Friend the Member for Crewe and Nantwich made an interesting point about the problem for milk floats and other service providers. The milk float in my area arrives at 4 am, making a considerable noise and usually waking me up at the same time. I accept that there is a problem, because for people who find it difficult to get to the shops those deliveries are a lifeline. Delivery companies also provide employment. She asked if I would go away and think hard. I certainly shall, as long as she does likewise. I would be happy to put our brains together to find a solution.

Mr. Redwood rose—

Mr. Jamieson: The right hon. Member for Wokingham (Mr. Redwood) is offering to join us in a troika to solve the problem.

Mr. Redwood: Has the Minister thought about bus lanes' hours of operation, because milk floats often go out early, so they may not conflict with the frequent service provided by buses? Is it not possible to make the bus lane inoperable early in the morning so that delivery vehicles can use it?

Mr. Jamieson: Again, I find myself agreeing with the right hon. Member for Bromley and Chislehurst, who is at odds with his Front Bench, as I believe that such things should be decided locally. Local authorities should work with local companies to see if we can accommodate such arrangements. In some areas, bus lanes are not required 24 hours a day, but it is important that local authorities make those decisions. The House will be surprised to learn that I do not favour the big state intervention that the hon. Member for Christchurch (Mr. Chope) advocated—[Interruption.] I see that the right hon. Member for Bromley and Chislehurst agrees with me.

Mrs. Dunwoody: Before we leave our unfortunate milkman, there is an added hazard when delivery vehicles are subject to a congestion charge. I am afraid that I do not have an instant answer—I wish that I did—but I hope that we can find a way to assist small deliveries. Given the level of petty theft in urban areas, it is not possible to ensure that delivered goods are still there when people get up to collect them. It is a difficult but genuine problem.

Mr. Jamieson: I accept that it is both difficult and genuine. Equally, if milk floats used bus lanes regularly, it could inhibit the flow of buses, and local people would have a view about that. There could also be a considerable hazard—the right hon. Member for Bromley and Chislehurst said that buses would be weaving in and out of the next lane, which would create safety problems.

Mr. Redwood: I do not know of any place that needs a 24-hour bus lane. Bus lanes are needed only in busy periods when there is a frequent bus service. Outside those hours, buses could easily use the outside lane, because there would not be a great number of other vehicles, allowing delivery vehicles to do their job.

Mr. Jamieson: In certain parts of the country—this is particularly true of London and big conurbations—there are 24-hour bus lanes because buses run 24 hours a day. In the night, there is no need to lift the restriction on using bus lanes because the roads are reasonably clear of cars anyway. The real problem was identified by my hon. Friend the Member for Crewe and Nantwich. We need to address it, along with local authorities and suppliers to see if we can reach an accommodation. I cannot see an easy solution to the problem, and I do not believe that she can either. It has been drawn to my attention that, in an intervention on the right hon. Member for Wokingham, I referred to cycle lanes rather than bus lanes. I meant that that cycles were permitted to use bus lanes, but he probably inferred that.

New clause 6 would require all with-flow bus lanes to be open to use by cycles, motor cycles, taxis and invalid carriages. It is unnecessary for cyclists, who already have a right to use with-flow bus lanes. The Secretary of State's consent would be required if a local authority wished to exclude cycles, but it is rarely requested or given. A small number of bus lanes may exclude cycles for safety reasons, for example where cyclists are encouraged to use a parallel cycle track rather than a narrow bus lane. If it could be provided that there was a cycle track as well as the bus lane, that would be a considerable advantage to the cyclist, but one has only to look at the roads in London and many other urban areas, including my constituency, to see that it would be almost impossible to provide a facility for a bus lane and a cycle track in the available space.

As for motor cycles, taxis and invalid carriages, local authorities have the power to allow other vehicles to use bus lanes if they consider that that would be desirable. We believe that it should be left to the discretion of local authorities to decide whether any other classes of motorised traffic should be allowed to use any of their bus lanes, taking into account their local transport plans and specific objectives in creating those bus lanes. That cannot be done effectively by central Government.

The right hon. Member for East Yorkshire mentioned the guidance on bus lanes in local transport note 1/97, "Keeping Buses Moving". That acknowledges that there are circumstances in which it will be appropriate and desirable for other vehicles to use the bus lanes and gives guidance on assessing the effects on buses and other road users. I stress to the right hon. Gentleman that that is guidance, not instructions, to local authorities. I emphasise for the third or fourth time that it is important that, working within the guidance, local authorities make decisions appropriate to their own circumstances.

Some local authorities have allowed motor cyclists to use bus lanes. That has raised concerns for the safety of other road users, particularly for cyclists and pedestrians. Before revising the guidance, we are awaiting the results of trials in London allowing motor cycles in bus lanes. It would be premature to give an unconditional recommendation that motor cycles should be able to use bus lanes, let alone to give them standard access.

Generally, it is better for invalid carriages to use footways, rather than the carriageway, wherever that is possible. It is not a good idea to encourage such small, low-powered, slow-moving vehicles to use bus lanes. Apart from the danger of their being ridden over because the bus driver cannot see them in his mirrors, moving at a maximum speed of 8 mph they would considerably inhibit the flow of traffic behind them.

The new clauses are not necessary in relation to cyclists, and in relation to the other vehicles, they would undermine the effectiveness of bus lanes by removing the right of local authorities to decide which other vehicles, if any, should be allowed to use bus lanes. I therefore ask that the motion be withdrawn.

Mr. Greg Knight: The Minister is on a roll this afternoon. We have enjoyed listening to him. He has been bold, helpful, and willing to listen to views expressed in the House and the points raised in the debate. Knowing how the Government Whips Office works, I should warn him that he is in danger of being shuffled off to another Department because he is being too helpful to the House.

Before the Minister rose to speak, I wrote on a piece of paper what I intended to say to wind up this part of the debate: the guidance is seven years old, needs updating, is overcautious and restrictive, and the Government should update it. He guessed that that is what I intended to say, and I warmly welcome the fact that we are to get new guidance. I hope that he will put a copy in the Library so that right hon. and hon. Members can see it.

Our main criticism of the guidance that is seven years old is that it leads local authorities to act too cautiously and not to consider innovations that may be suitable for the locality that they serve. My right hon. Friend the Member for Wokingham referred to motor cycles being allowed to use bus lanes. Apart from Bristol, as far as I am aware, there is no part of the country where that is allowed. Although the guidance makes it clear that the decision can be made locally, at the end of paragraph 4.12 on motor cycles, it states:

> "The Department recommends that motorcycles should not normally be permitted to use bus lanes."

I hope that when the new guidance is issued, it will be more neutral in what it says to local authorities. It should point out the range of options that are available to them and allow them to make their own decisions.

5 pm

The hon. Member for Shrewsbury and Atcham (Mr. Marsden) and my right hon. Friend the Member for Bromley and Chislehurst (Mr. Forth) expressed concern about the policing of bus lanes where other vehicles are allowed to use them. That should not be a problem given the advent of new technology—digital cameras are better than the earlier analogue ones—and a policy of unannounced and occasional policing. Policing a law by which certain motorists are not supposed to be in a vehicle unaccompanied—for example, learner drivers are supposed always to have a qualified driver with them—does not present a particular problem and, as camera imaging gets better and more buses have cameras inside, this should not be an insurmountable problem either.

The draconian business motion leaves me with a dilemma: should I test the mood of the House or save 15 minutes of debating time to raise issues further down the amendment paper? In the light of the Minister's helpful response and the fact that he is to issue new guidance, which we warmly welcome, I beg to ask leave to withdraw the motion.

Motion and clause, by leave, withdrawn.

New Clause 5

TRAFFIC LIGHTS

'In exercising their network management duty, a local traffic authority (or, in London, Transport for London) shall be required to monitor all traffic lights in operation in their area and shall—

(a) ensure that all traffic lights operate on a traffic sensitive basis during non-rush hour periods;

(b) require that traffic lights are set to achieve the most expeditious flow of traffic and pedestrians at all times they are operational;

(c) require that unless there are good reasons for not so doing that traffic lights at junctions with low traffic volumes operate in amber warning mode in all directions during non-rush hour periods.'.—[Mr. Greg Knight.]

Brought up, and read the First time.

Mr. Greg Knight: I beg to move, That the clause be read a Second time.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Michael Lord): With this it will be convenient to discuss the following:

New clause 8—Network management duty—

'In exercising their network management duty, the local traffic authority shall be required to ensure:

(a) that all traffic lights operate on a traffic sensitive basis during non rush hour periods,

(b) traffic lights are set to achieve the most expeditious flow of traffic and pedestrians at all times they are operational,

(c) that traffic lights give longer green phases to main roads than to side roads and give continuous green phases to main roads during quiet times of the day and night, save where the traffic sensors recognise traffic on approaching side roads.'.

Mr. Knight: I cannot think of a single factor that induces road hypertension more than having to stop at a set of traffic lights at a junction on a main road only for no traffic to emerge from a minor road and no pedestrians to seek to cross. Yet that happens in every city in the United Kingdom every day during non-rush hour periods—it certainly happens on the streets around this building. Traffic lights should be responsive to the flow of vehicles on our roads. If they are not, we end up with unnecessary tailbacks, which are far too common in our urban areas. Indeed, on most occasions when I leave this place at an early hour, I find that I am, along with other motorists, obliged to stop and wait at traffic lights that are showing red, only for no vehicles to cross the junction. There must be a better way of operating traffic lights. Unnecessary red lights add to pollution, add extra time to people's journeys and add to congestion.

Does the Minister know what percentage of traffic lights are capable of operating in traffic-sensitive mode? Wherever new traffic lights are installed or old ones refurbished, there should be some requirement on those responsible to install traffic lights that can operate on a traffic-sensitive basis.

Mr. Redwood: I hope that my right hon. Friend would not limit traffic sensors to new traffic lights, but would want retrospective fitting to take place as soon possible, because many would benefit from it.

Mr. Knight: I agree with my right hon. Friend. I was trying, in the first instance, to find out from the Minister whether, as a matter of good practice, it is a requirement that all new traffic lights are capable of operating on a traffic-sensitive basis. I hope that he will confirm that that is the case.

I hope that the Minister agrees that traffic lights should never be operated in a fashion other than to ensure the most efficient movement of traffic and pedestrians at a road junction. A report that appeared in the Evening Standard on 2 February this year refers to a particular set of lights in London and challenges its readers:

"Have you found a worse set of lights? . . . Situated at the junction where The Mall meets Trafalgar Square, they are responsible for some of the most notorious tailbacks in town. The reason is obvious to anyone who has sat in the ever-lengthening queue of cars trying to get to Trafalgar Square: they simply do not stay green for long enough."

The report continues:

"We studied the lights on different working days, at different times, and found: the lights changed from red to green every one minute and eight seconds; the lights stayed on green for only eight seconds each time."

Mr. Forth: I know that my right hon. Friend has driven quite a lot in the United States, as have I. He will know that in many states a driver is allowed to turn right at a red traffic light, provided that he is satisfied that the road is clear. Does my right hon. Friend think that we should carefully consider the idea of allowing people to turn left at red traffic lights in this country, to help partially to solve the problem that he describes?

Mr. Knight: I agree. We floated that idea in Committee, and if my right hon. Friend examines new clause 5(c), he will see that it seeks to introduce another innovative measure from the United States: setting traffic lights that control low-density traffic flows to flash amber in all directions at non-rush hour periods, in effect signalling to motorists from all directions to cross the junction with care.

The report in the Evening Standard points out that those particular lights have caused such anger and frustration in the film director Michael Winner that he "has pledged to stand for Mayor of London on the single issue of getting them changed."

The RAC Foundation, when asked to comment, said of the lights:

"Having just eight seconds for motorists to squeeze through means that they are so frustrated they end up jumping red lights."

I presume that that refers to other red lights.

Mr. Redwood: On that crucial point, would my right hon. Friend use his considerable powers of persuasion to suggest to the Conservative candidate for Mayor of London that if he took up that popular policy—both on the specific lights at the approach to Trafalgar square and on the more general problem—he would win many votes?

Mr. Knight: I think that if I strayed too far into my conversations with the Conservative candidate for Mayor of London, you would call me to order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. However, may I just say that in all my conversations with Steven Norris on this matter, I have found him helpful and willing to listen? I think that he will take note of the points made in this debate.

[Mr. Knight]

A report in The Daily Telegraph on 10 February last year said:

"Traffic congestion in London is costing business about £3.4 million a day, according to calculations by the London Chamber of Commerce, and conditions are getting worse. But business analysts point out that the jams are not being caused by more vehicles coming into London. Indeed, the AA's figures suggest there are actually fewer cars in central London now than there were 20 years ago . . . There has, however, been a sharp increase in the number of traffic lights, and in some parts of central London they are now on average only 80 yards apart. In addition, the timing of 170 of the 562 traffic lights in the central ring has been altered to slow the traffic even further."

That is the main complaint that new clause 5 seeks to address.

I do not know whether the Minister has made any studies of the situation in America to which I have referred, but we should be prepared to look at schemes that are in place in other countries, and embrace those that work. I have seen no evidence that the amber flashing system, which the Americans use regularly in non-rush hours, has led to an increase in the number of accidents. I hope that the Minister will be prepared to reflect on that, and perhaps give the go-ahead to a pilot scheme somewhere in the United Kingdom if he does not feel able to accept new clause 5.

I hope that the Minister will respond positively to the new clause, whose sole aim is to reduce congestion. It does not seek to put pedestrians at risk, but has one aim only: congestion busting. I therefore hope that he will welcome it.

Mr. Redwood: I rise to support new clause 5, tabled by my right hon. and hon. Friends, and to speak to my parallel new clause 8. I shall highlight the differences between them, but there are also many similarities. Both are designed to get traffic flowing more freely again.

As my right hon. Friend the Member for East Yorkshire (Mr. Knight) has ably pointed out, the position in London is particularly chronic. There has been a deliberate attempt by the highways authorities to block and slow the traffic. We have seen reduced green phases and increased red phases at many sets of traffic lights, and the introduction of a large number of additional traffic lights, some of which are unnecessary or undesirable. In the centre of London, we now also have traffic lights with the new feature of an all-red phase, which means that traffic coming to the junction from each direction has to sit there looking at all the other stationary traffic. Let us imagine the cost of that in terms of fumes, frustration, pollution and inconvenience. There are often no pedestrians wishing to cross those roads at the time of the all-red phase.

I am mainly a pedestrian in central London. I bring my car in on a Monday morning, and I leave it here until my duties are finished. I do not try to drive round the centre of London in my car. I normally walk, because I find that that is the quickest mode of travel, now that the traffic system has been wrecked and the underground functions so badly. So I look at this situation from a pedestrian's point of view, but I cannot say, as a pedestrian, that I want all-red phases. I often do not want to wait for the red phase at all, and I would not do so if it were safe for me to cross. It is perfectly reasonable for pedestrians at busy junctions to have to row in with the traffic light system, just as vehicles do, so that the pedestrians cross the road during the red phase. If they wished to cross again in a further direction, which is unusual, they would also have to wait for a red phase there, so that it would be safe to cross.

The new clauses are designed to deal with the inconvenience created by the prevalence of red phases over green phases, and particularly to tackle the new injustice of the all-red phase, which does not help or amuse me as a pedestrian and which is extremely frustrating to all those who need or have to drive around London. It is particularly frustrating to all those carrying out their trade, using a van, milk float or other commercial vehicle. They have to use their vehicles because the tools and stock of their trade are inside them. Those people now have to sit at traffic lights for a great deal of the day, which increases prices, reduces efficiency, annoys people who live near the road blocks, and increases the amount of pollution.

New clause 5 proposes that "all traffic lights operate on a traffic sensitive basis during non-rush hour periods".

If properly implemented, that measure would make an immediate improvement. We all have experience of travelling round busy towns and cities in the evening or the early morning, and of having to sit at red traffic lights when there is nothing moving in the other direction. Proper traffic sensors on the lights would remove the inconvenience, the congestion, the pollution, the delays, and the extra noise and fumes for people living nearby.

The second part of the new clause proposes that "traffic lights are set to achieve the most expeditious flow of traffic and pedestrians at all times they are operational".

That addresses directly the question of whether there should be all-red phases. The answer is that there should not, and that there should be a sensible balance between the needs of the different road users and roads coming into the junction. We need to balance the needs of pedestrians and vehicles, and to make a decision as to which is the major road and which is the minor, giving sensible priority in most cases to the major road.

The third part of new clause 5—which differs markedly from my proposal in new clause 8—proposes that, unless there are good reasons for not doing so,

"traffic lights at junctions with low traffic volumes operate in amber warning mode in all directions during non-rush hour periods."

I could live with that proposal. Traffic sensors changing the lights from red to green or green to red, as appropriate, in response to traffic demand would be even safer and easier, so I would favour that option. However, if my right hon. and hon. Friends want to press new clause 5 to a vote, I should be happy to support it, because the intention is good. People would, however, have to be a bit more careful, because there could be traffic approaching a junction on amber from both directions. We would also need a sensible definition of low volume, so that the opportunities for conflict were reduced.

5.15 pm

That brings me to my new clause 8, which contains the provisions

"that all traffic lights should operate on a traffic sensitive basis" and that all traffic lights should be "set to achieve the most expeditious flow of traffic and pedestrians".

The other feature of my new clause, instead of the amber flashing mode, is that "traffic lights give longer green phases to main roads than to side roads and give continuous green phases to main roads during quiet times of the day and night, save where the traffic sensors recognise traffic on approaching side roads."

I submit that that is a safer variant than the amber flashing lights.

In most cities and towns, there is a clear main road—the A-road, the trunk road or the main route that goes through the principal settlement or links the connected settlements that form a great city—and a series of side roads intersect with the main route. Where that is clear, surely the highways authority should programme the traffic lights to give priority off-peak, all the time, to the busier main road, with the proviso that there should be a traffic sensor so that people are not stranded on the intersecting side roads for ever. In many cases, they would get early change to green if the traffic flows permitted that on the main route. That would be much fairer: it would reduce frustration as well as the need to burn so much petrol, change down and come to a halt, often with the engine running, while people wait for what seems like a long time late at night for the lights to change.

There we have it. There are two parallel proposals on the table. One, influenced more by the United States, involves the amber flashing light; the other is influenced more by the British tradition of using the technology of traffic sensors. The Minister may argue that there would be a cost involved in installing traffic sensors in traffic lights. I quite agree, but it would be modest compared to the huge sums spent on obstacles and blocks to traffic in recent years. Most road users would think it was money well spent.

I recommend that it be assumed that, over a reasonable period, that cost would get us up to modern traffic management standards. The savings in terms of less congestion, less fuel burned, less frustration, less delay and less cost to business would be considerable.

The Minister may also say that he favours local autonomy in that respect as in others. I would find that easier to believe if we did not have before us this Bill in this shape. The Bill is about establishing national standards of traffic management and investigating how well local authorities do. It is about, in extreme cases, moving in and taking over traffic management duties if the local authority has failed.

I am offering the Minister a way to ensure that local authorities, in more cases than not, succeed in improving traffic flows and busting congestion so that he does not have to make a heavy-handed intervention, which he will be entitled to do if the Bill is passed. So, far from my proposals being an additional blow to local autonomy, they could be a buttress to sensible local autonomy, which would mean that fewer local authorities got into the danger zone on their traffic management practices and had to face the extreme intervention of the whole system being taken out of their hands to be run by somebody else.

The Government and local authorities seem to be interested in the use of technology to advise, warn, marshal and control traffic. I am recommending an old and well-established technology that would do the job at a relatively modest price and relatively simply. I have been trying to persuade my local authority, which is keen to get traffic moving and bust congestion, to change the phasing of lights. It has been obliging in many cases and is conducting an exercise at the moment, junction by junction.

The authority is discovering that it can improve the capacity of leading congested junctions in the district quite substantially, simply by changing the phasing and timing of lights. If traffic sensors are added, the effect is even better—particularly off-peak when there is no need to hold up the traffic on principal routes. I recommend that the Government adopt a scheme along the lines of new clause 8 and have pleasure in supporting my right hon. and hon. Friends in new clause 5.

Mr. McNulty: I cannot recall whether I raised the Mall-Whitehall issue in Committee but a greater propensity for green lights at that particular junction would only move the delay elsewhere. It is part of a network rather than an individual set of lights. In a network, one cannot look at each traffic light junction in isolation. That would be simplistic and unworkable. TFL informs me that pedestrian flows after the pedestrianisation of the northern part of Trafalgar square are rooted in road safety.

All the points made on both new clauses were germane and fair. I may agree with some but not with others. The right hon. Member for Wokingham (Mr. Redwood) was ahead of me when he said that such matters are for local determination, not for the Bill in the first instance. New clause 5 seeks to extend the network management duties of local traffic authorities to the monitoring of all traffic lights in their areas—but ensuring that traffic light sets are working correctly to achieve the expeditious movement of all traffic would be one strand of a local traffic authority's management traffic duties, as set out in clause 16.

The term "traffic" explicitly includes pedestrian. We had that debate at length in Committee. Considering expeditious traffic flows in the context of traffic lights purely in isolation is not sufficient; that is a fundamental flaw in both new clauses. Traffic flows must be viewed in the wider context of the network management duties that permeate the entire Bill

At first, I inadvertently misled the Committee. I was still in pre-Greater London Authority mode when I stated that the transport operational command unit managed traffic lights in London—which it did before the GLA. Subsequently, that duty fell to TFL. I am grateful to the hon. Member for Christchurch for allowing me to correct that error.

New clause 5 would place a requirement on traffic authorities to ensure that all traffic lights be at optimum settings at all times during which they are operational. No one would disagree with that general objective, but we dispute the means. The majority of traffic lights in the

[Mr. McNulty]

UK are responsive to traffic flow changes and allocate green times proportionately to vehicle flow and the needs of pedestrians. Lights can also have different settings to cater for rush hour and non-rush hour periods, to achieve the expeditious and safe passage of vehicular and pedestrian traffic. We will include advice in the guidance on network management techniques that will be issued under clause 18, so there is no need to incorporate that requirement in the Bill.

There is mixed experience from America. I can say from my 18 months in America, principally as a student, that for every four-way flashing amber junction there are about 10 four-way stop junctions with no lights. That practice is rooted in America's highway culture, especially in urban areas. They eschew the need for roundabouts, and although there are examples of four-way-flashing amber junctions—to which I will return in moment—it must be pointed out that that is not the only model used, as four-way stops are a far more regular occurrence in those areas.

Furthermore, the new clause would make it a requirement that during non-rush-hour times traffic lights should operate on flashing amber warning mode at traffic junctions with low traffic volumes. As I think we said in relation to the wider context of traffic lights—not specifically on flashing amber warning mode—that proposal would seriously compromise vehicular and pedestrian safety, and it must be discussed in the context of pedestrians and their safety as well as that of vehicular flow. Flashing amber already has a specific meaning at pelican crossings—that a driver may proceed if no pedestrians are crossing—and such an amendment would cause danger and confusion if it had another meaning at a junction. Flashing amber would not in any case be suitable at many junctions where buildings or road layout prevent drivers from seeing whether other vehicles are approaching the junction.

As for pedestrians, although I cheerfully admit that the right hon. Member for Wokingham is fit, active and sprightly, not every pedestrian in a London context, or any other context, is, and we must legislate for safety for all, from the fittest to the most vulnerable, in terms of road safety. Pedestrians, especially the most vulnerable, will have no crossing facilities and will find crossing the road neither convenient nor safe at non-rush-hour times. As I am sure I said in Committee, blind and partially sighted pedestrians would no longer be able to rely on audible and tactile signals to cross safely, as flashing amber would necessitate removal of those facilities. It would be contrary to long-established UK practice, and unsafe, to signal pedestrians to cross when there are conflicting traffic movements. A better solution is to ensure that signals operate, wherever possible, in a responsive way so that drivers are only stopped when there is a conflict with other vehicle or pedestrian movements. At quiet times, signals need only operate to stop traffic if a pedestrian has operated the push button. I repeat, however, that all this needs to be seen—as we said constantly in Committee—in the wider context of the balance between pedestrians, safety considerations, vehicular flows and road traffic. Isolating this aspect will ultimately undermine the essence of the network management duty.

New clause 8 has been described as similar to new clause 5, but it omits—to be fair to it—the dangerous proposal that traffic lights should operate in flashing amber mode in all directions at traffic lights with low volumes of traffic during non-rush hour periods. The new clause proposes that traffic lights give longer green phases to main roads than to side roads and continuous green phases to main roads during quiet times of day and night, except where the traffic sensors recognise traffic on approaching side roads. That is essentially a description of how responsive traffic lights should operate in most situations, and it is generally what we want to happen in practice.

I repeat that I am not condemning right hon. and hon. Members on the Conservative Benches for the substance of what they suggest. Many of these things should be a matter of course in terms of achieving the network management duty, and should be reflected in the guidance indicated in the relevant clause—18, I think. As I said, however, it is an area best suited to guidance, not legislation, as local authorities are best placed to determine the operation of traffic lights in the light of local conditions, as I believe the right hon. Member for Wokingham was suggesting that his authority is now doing.

The proposal would, for example, prevent authorities from installing traffic light systems that revert to all-red in the absence of any demands, for example, late at night. In many instances, despite the complete aversion to all-red phases of the right hon. Member for Wokingham, they assist traffic flow—when they are traffic sensitive, they change as soon as a vehicle approaches, and they can do so within seconds. The balance must be struck in relation to starting at an all-red phase. In the context of road safety, therefore, if a pedestrian comes along, they can cross safety and take preference. It is therefore not always the case that all-red phases are counter to the needs, desires, freedoms—or whatever else one wants to suggest—of the motorist.

5.30 pm

This type of system has been successful in reducing the incidence of certain kinds of accident, and is also very responsive when the first demand is received, whether from a vehicle or from a pedestrian. Where suitable, it enables whoever arrives at the lights first—motorist or pedestrian—to receive the fastest possible response.

The new clause would also have the immediate effect of making fixed-time systems unlawful during non-rush hour periods, including systems with varying times depending on the time of day. Local authorities with vehicle-activated traffic light systems could also be in breach of the provision if the vehicle detectors failed during non-rush hour periods, because such systems are designed to revert to fixed-time operation.

I am happy for the substance of the new clause to be discussed in more detail when we consider techniques relating to network management. As for a point that is not part of the substance but was raised in Committee, the ability to turn left at red lights—I see that being done successfully all the time when I am in France during the summer, and also in America, although of course those are right-hand turns—may have some merit at some junctions. Giving carte blanche at all junctions, however, could conflict with prevailing road safety systems.

Given the assurance that the substance of the new clauses—but not the four-way flashing amber phase—may be worthy of consideration, and the assurance that the network management duty and associated guidance will cover traffic light operation, I hope that, in the spirit of what has been a wonderful debate so far, Members will not press them to the vote following an extremely generous and forbearing double act on the Government Front Bench.

Mr. Greg Knight: What a contrast between the two Ministers! The hon. Member for Plymouth, Devonport (Mr. Jamieson) listened to, and accepted, most of our arguments. The hon. Member for Harrow, East (Mr. McNulty) tried to get in on his hon. Friend's coat tails by pretending that he was Mr. Reasonable as well. He is not. He appeared still wearing his Government Whip's uniform, and I am afraid that merely saying that some of our points may be worthy of consideration is not good enough. We wanted him to give a commitment that he would look at our proposals as a matter of urgency. Of course we accept that just changing one traffic light will not solve the problem, but what we need is guidance that those who set the timing of the lights are obliged to follow, the intention being to improve traffic flows.

Mr. Redwood: The facts are simple. Before the lighting phases were changed, the traffic flowed well; as soon as they were changed, it did not. If the Minister is right in saying that other traffic lights are gummed up as well, we are not stopping him from changing them all—but he must change the really difficult one, which is the one identified by my right hon. Friend.

Mr. Knight: My right hon. Friend is correct, and we have heard no realistic indication from the Minister today that he appreciates the scale of the problem, or is willing to grasp it. I realise that in a moment he will probably look over his shoulder expecting salvation from his troops in the approaching Division, but let me tell him that there is a bigger army out there—an army of angry, over-taxed motorists sitting in congested queues of traffic that need not exist. It is that army, which is bigger than his parliamentary army, that will sweep this Government from office in 2005.

I wish to test the mood of the House.

Clause 9

Removal of Certain Vehicles by Traffic Officers

Mr. Chope: I beg to move amendment No. 2, in page 5, line 19, at end insert—

'(3) When exercising any powers made under provisions referred to in subsection (1), and before arranging for the removal of a broken-down vehicle, a traffic officer shall, when this can be done without compromising safety or unreasonably impeding traffic-flow—

(a) grant the driver of the vehicle, where present, a reasonable opportunity to contact a breakdown organisation or other service provider of their choice, and if that organisation confirms to the traffic officer that it will attend the broken-down vehicle as soon as practicable, then the traffic officer shall allow that organisation a reasonable period in which to attend the aforesaid vehicle; or

(b) where the driver of the broken-down vehicle is not a member of a breakdown organisation, take into account any wishes of the driver with regard to attendance on the relevant vehicle and accede to such wishes where this would fulfil the purpose or purposes specified in section 5(3).'.

The amendment would prevent up to 10 million customers of the Royal Automobile Club, the AA, Green Flag and other motoring organisations from effectively being short-changed as a result of the changes proposed in part 1 of the Bill. Assurances have been sought from the Government on this issue, with which the Minister is familiar. Ministers made it clear on Second Reading and in Committee that they do not want the result that motoring organisations fear will flow from the Bill. There is one way in which matters can be satisfied, which is for the Minister to accept this amendment.

The amendment is a modification of what was proposed in Committee. It specifically incorporates the qualification that motoring organisations would not have the right to attend to their customers if, by so doing, they would compromise safety or unreasonably impede traffic flow. In all other circumstances, the customer of a motoring organisation who had broken down on the hard shoulder of a motorway would be able to phone up to call that organisation to attend to his or her needs. The amendment is particularly important for disabled groups and we know that the Disabled Drivers Association strongly supports it.

Mr. David Kidney (Stafford) (Lab): Briefly, I spoke on Second Reading in support of co-operation between the Highways Agency and recovery operators of the sort that currently obtains between the police and those operators. It is disappointing, all these months later, that the necessary talks have still not happened. I have a copy of the memorandum of understanding between the Association of Chief Police Officers and the operators, so why on earth can we not now have a tripartite understanding between the police, the Highways Agency and the operators?

This is an important issue—and not just because 90 per cent. of the activity is already carried out by the operators. It would be iniquitous if all the people who were members of motoring organisations were denied the use of those operators' services. The Minister would become unpopular if people started getting bigger bills for the removal of their vehicles from the motorway roadside than they would if their operator had turned up.

A constituent recently contacted me about his experiences. It was not a motorway case, but the Minister may be interested to know that the Highways Agency arranged for a private operator to turn up and remove a little bit of oil from the road, for which my constituent was charged £600. The Highways Agency will lose control over the costs. How much better if there were co-operation between the Highways Agency and the operators who have the skills and abilities to work with that agency on a collaborative basis. That would be more efficient, more time-saving and certainly less costly.

Mr. Redwood: I rise to support my hon. Friend on his important amendment. I find it extraordinary that the Government want to do so much damage to well established motoring organisations such as the Royal Automobile Club and the Automobile Association, and to deny motorists their choice and opportunity—[Interruption.] The Minister protests, but he has only to read the reasonable words of the amendment, which make it clear that we wish to "grant the driver of the vehicle, where present, a reasonable opportunity to contact a breakdown organisation or other service provider of their choice".

Why does the Minister object to that, which seems such a reasonable thing to do? If he does object, as seems to be the case, I presume that, if we had enough time left, he would recommend that his hon. Friends voted the amendment down. That must mean that he has no time for the AA and the RAC, and that he would like them to be displaced by the expensive monopoly proposals in the Bill.

I do hope that the Minister will think again. I shall not develop my argument further, because I want to hear his reply in the hope that, even at this last moment, he might have seen the folly of his ways and grant us leave to add the amendment to the Bill.

Brian White: One of the reasons provided by several organisations to explain their concerns is their fear of a change of Government. I would certainly endorse that. The real danger with the Bill is that we end up with a Tory Government. I wholly concur, and any sensible person would also be fearful of that possibility.

There remain some genuine concerns about the need to ensure that the breakdown companies remain competitive, and that there is a national competitive framework governing the operation of the various providers. There is concern that the Bill's reasonable provisions are not so open-ended as they appear. The discussions need to be brought to a conclusion. I believe that the memorandum of understanding should become tripartite and that that should happen as quickly as possible. The Government should reiterate the assurances that the breakdown industry is seeking.

Mr. Jamieson: Again, these issues were rehearsed at length in Standing Committee. In case there is no time later, I want to make it clear that this Government hold this country's recovery organisations in high regard. The AA, RAC and Green Flag, to name but three, give their members an excellent service. The Government have absolutely no intention of supplanting the excellent work of those organisations. I hope that that reassures the Opposition, who seem hellbent on perpetuating a myth about the Government's intentions.

Clause 9 paves the way for regulations to be made that will empower traffic officers to remove vehicles that are broken down or abandoned, or parked illegally, obstructively or dangerously. The framework set out in regulations under section 99 of the Road Traffic Regulation Act 1984 already allows the police to remove vehicles in such circumstances. Opposition Members should be aware of that, as the measure was passed by a Conservative Government. The legislation works well, and so we intend to enable traffic officers to deal with the problem in a similar way.

Vehicles that are broken down, damaged or abandoned represent a safety hazard, especially on motorways and other high-speed roads. They can cause congestion and pose risks to road safety. It is essential that those vehicles can be removed quickly in the interests of the safety of any occupants and of other road users. Motorway hard shoulders and dual carriageway verges are dangerous places, and there are still too many fatalities and serious accidents involving stranded vehicles. It is therefore vital that traffic officers have the ability to require the removal of a stationary vehicle.

Amendment No. 2 would constrain the ability of traffic officers to sort things out. Over time, those officers become very experienced in assessing such situations, but the amendment would impede their discretion to have a vehicle removed. In practice, that could result in an increasingly dangerous situation: the removal of a vehicle from a hazardous location could be delayed while discussions were held on how long it might take a breakdown organisation to come along, or whether a friend was going to come to the driver's assistance.

On a busy motorway, with a vehicle in a dangerous position, that would clearly be totally unacceptable. I fully understand the concerns of the recovery organisations and their members that they should not to be subjected to over-zealous removal by the authorities, but that has not happened to date and there is no reason to believe that it will happen in the future.

Who is in the best position to judge an appropriate course of action? That is a key question. Traffic officers are well trained and experienced professionals who know the network and the prevailing traffic conditions. They will understand more fully the risks inherent in various breakdown situations. They will be at the scene, and also will be in touch with the regional control centres that can provide information relating to conditions elsewhere on the road. They are in the best position to make a judgment on the most appropriate course of action, not the driver or the recovery operators.

I emphasise again that the recovery organisations will be able to attend their members who break down on motorways and trunk roads, as they do now. For those drivers who are not members of a breakdown organisation, the recovery of their vehicles will be dealt with as it is now. That may include the use of police contracts to remove the vehicle from the motorway or trunk road.

The Government are committed to an ongoing dialogue with the recovery industry to see how further improvements can be made to the way that breakdowns are dealt with on motorways and trunk roads. The Highways Agency is convening a working group to discuss issues of removal and disposal of vehicles, and representatives of the recovery industry will be invited to attend. I am told that the working group will meet next Friday, 26 March, to discuss those matters, and I know for certain that the AA and RAC wish to attend.

In light of what I have said, I hope that the amendment will be withdrawn.

Mr. Chope: I will not withdraw the amendment because the Minister has not addressed it—he refers to hazardous situations, which it specifically excludes. Without it, the Highways Agency will be enabled to establish a monopoly roadside recovery service, which is not what anybody wants.

Question put, That the amendment be made:—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Consideration completed.

Order for Third Reading read.

6.14 pm

Mr. Jamieson: I beg to move, That the Bill be now read a Third time.

I notice that we have three quarters of an hour in which to debate Third Reading, so that might give hon. Members the welcome opportunity to go to the "Taste of Cornwall" exhibition upstairs on the Lower Waiting Hall, which was organised by my hon. Friend the Member for Falmouth and Camborne (Ms Atherton). I enjoyed a lovely oyster and, I must say, a tiny drop of Skinner's Keel Over there. Anyone who wants to taste the fine fare of the west country should take the opportunity to do so.

Mr. Patrick McLoughlin (West Derbyshire) (Con): On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I have just been reflecting on the words that you used at the end of the proceedings on Report. You said, "Consideration completed". I realise that the use of those words is a long established practice, but will you reflect on whether it would be more appropriate to say, "Time allocation completed"? Consideration of these matters has certainly not been completed, because we did not reach many of the amendments. Under the arrangements for the modernisation of the House, the Chair ought to consider not saying "consideration completed" because that is misleading, as the Government's guillotine concluded the remaining stages of debate. Will you reflect on that for subsequent announcements?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I am more than happy to reflect on that point of order, as I do on every point of order. The House will have heard the hon. Gentleman's remarks, but I am afraid that for the time being the words that I used must rest.

Mr. Jamieson: Traffic management—the way that we manage our roads—affects all of us every day. The Bill will make sure that our road space is managed in the interests of road users, help us to get the most out of the investments that we make in our infrastructure, and cut out some of the unnecessary disruption that can clog up our roads.

Notwithstanding what has just been said, I am glad that, in Committee, we made good progress within the time allocated. The time allocation worked well for the Committee, and the Bill has been given good scrutiny by Conservative and Liberal Democrat Members. Some elements have received widespread support on both sides of the House. I am pleased to say that, in general, debate has been constructive, and it has helped to shape Government policy. I thank all who contributed to the discussions, not just those who were in Committee, and who made useful and worthy contributions—so good, in fact, were some of the Opposition's contributions that they changed the Government's mind. When I was in opposition, that was rare. I thank the officials and those who support the Opposition. I know that there are many people in the backrooms of Members' offices who do a lot of work on Bills and get very little thanks from the public for doing so. I place on record my thanks to those people for their work.

Transport and infrastructure are there to support the economy, and if our economy is to function properly, goods and people need to move efficiently. Keeping traffic moving can help to improve safety and reduce pollution, so reducing congestion will help us to achieve some of our other goals. Congestion is a symptom of economic prosperity, and notwithstanding what was said on Second Reading, we now have growing economic prosperity. There are more than 1.5 million more people in work than in 1997. That is more people who are travelling to work, and more people with money in their pocket to spend on going out for leisure. I welcome that; it is a good thing and it is part of being in a prosperous, democratic society.

There are even more utilities digging up the roads, installing new services that we want and, of course, maintaining the vital infrastructure that lies beneath our roads.

Mr. Redwood: There are also more highways authorities, local and national, messing up the roads. Will the Minister, at this late stage, guarantee that in another place the Government will move amendments to extend to them powers that will control their activities?

Mr. Jamieson: From our debates, certainly in Committee, we know that such authorities are already included. It is for not only the utilities but the Highways Agency and the highways authorities to make sure that they do everything to avoid impeding the flow of traffic. In fact, the Bill gives new responsibilities both to the Highways Agency, through the traffic officers, and to local authorities through traffic managers, to make sure that traffic is kept moving safety in their areas.

Mrs. Dunwoody: Reading the Bill carefully, I find that it is precisely the fact that it all the time confirms the need to keep traffic moving that worries me. Is the Minister satisfied not only that the powers to be given to the new group of traffic officers will be properly controlled, so that we know what they are and are not capable of doing, but above all, that the general public will understand why we have yet another group of people whose function seems to be limited but whose powers seem to be considerable?

Mr. Jamieson: In time, the public will understand the role of traffic officers, who will begin to take up duty on our roads this year. Their task is to help to keep the traffic moving and ensure the safety of people on the network, which will be appreciated by the public. The Bill will not solve all our problems, but it complements our other policies. There will be more capacity where appropriate, as is happening on the M25. Billions of pounds will be invested in local transport improvements, and better use of new and existing capacity will make a difference. We need to manage both trunk roads and local roads properly, which is why the Bill gives the Highways Agency and local authorities the new powers that they need to do that job.

On our trunk roads, 25 per cent. of congestion is caused by incidents. We will not stop all those incidents, but we can reduce the time taken to deal with them and cut out unnecessary congestion. The new traffic officer service will target new devoted resources on keeping traffic moving on our motorways, and will be a uniformed, dedicated, 24/7 force serving the motorist. It will make our motorways safer, give drivers better information and improve traffic flow. In short, the traffic officer service will be the motorist's friend.

The Bill creates new powers for local authorities. Permit schemes and other provisions will put local traffic authorities in a stronger position to manage their roads. We are creating a realistic expectation that all local authorities will focus on managing their roads, as the best authorities are already doing. Creating new powers, however, is only part of the picture. Right hon. and hon. Members argued forcefully on Report and in Committee about many aspects of network management, authorities' own roadworks, the use of bus lanes and phasing of traffic lights—both subjects of debate today—and speed limits, and humps, which my hon. Friend the Member for Bassetlaw (John Mann) discussed in Committee. Powers are already in place to deal with such issues, but we agree that we need to make sure that they are being used properly with the right end in mind, which is why the new network management duty that we are giving to local traffic authorities is important. It is not just about doing things that are new—we need to make sure that everything else is controlled and working properly.

The network management duty and the accompanying guidance for local authorities will focus attention on getting the right results. It will not, however, tell authorities what decisions they have to make to achieve those results. Authorities themselves are better placed than us to take those decisions. We are already making good progress. Ministers and officials are meeting key stakeholders to develop the guidance on the network management duty, and we are making similar progress with the secondary legislation stemming from parts 3 and 4. Even today, authorities and utilities are developing options for the creation of permit schemes, and I look forward to the results of their deliberations and seeing how we can make a difference to what happens on our roads.

While this Bill is in the other place, we will work hard to make sure that its key measures deliver results for road users as soon as possible. Before the end of April, I expect the Highways Agency's traffic officers to be operating on the ground in the west midlands, and working with the police to keep traffic moving and to clear up after incidents. I look forward to the benefits that the service will deliver; to giving traffic officers their full powers when the Bill receives Royal Assent; and to the delivery of benefits in the north-west and south-east by spring 2005, and across the whole network by the end of next year.

Mr. Paul Marsden: I reiterate the general support of the Liberal Democrats for the Bill and its concepts. The Minister has outlined the benefits that it will bring about. How will they be measured? Will it be down to individual performance mechanisms and indicators for specific parts of the traffic officer service, or will it be down, ultimately, to reducing congestion, which should be the objective?

Mr. Jamieson: There will be a combination of those aspects. We are setting targets for the traffic officers. It will be a matter of reducing congestion and dealing with incidents more rapidly than is currently the case. There will be measures of customer satisfaction to see whether people who use the roads value the service they get when, for example, a car has gone out of control or broken down in the fast lane of a motorway. Those are hazardous and worrying situations, and the traffic officers will be able to assist. We will judge them on the basis of their contribution.

This is a new service, and we will see how the tasks and roles of traffic officers develop. Some will become more important than others and we will change the priorities accordingly. We want to learn from the west midlands experience as we roll that out to the rest of the country, to see what traffic officers do best and how they can best contribute to keeping our traffic moving safely and to the satisfaction of all motorists, whatever type of vehicle they drive.

As the House knows, we are making good progress towards implementing other key measures. We expect to be able to issue guidance to authorities on the network management duty very soon after Royal Assent, so that we can focus immediately on bringing together all those strands in the authorities and on keeping traffic moving on the roads. Authorities will be given the necessary powers to control street works and road works as a priority. There will be full public consultation this summer on regulations for permit schemes. We want to see authorities using those powers effectively as soon as they are available.

People want to know how our plans will affect them. I am pleased to say that the Bill will make a difference by supporting the economy, improving safety and reducing pollution. I therefore commend the Bill to the House.

Mr. Damian Green: As the House reaches the final stage of the Bill before it moves to another place, I pay tribute to colleagues in all parts of the House who have attempted manfully and occasionally successfully to improve it. The Minister graciously pointed out that he has taken on board some of the sensible suggestions made by my right hon. and hon. Friends, and we are delighted with that.

On Second Reading, we moved a reasoned amendment. We accepted that we need to take steps to help drivers and others who use the road network, but we did not accept that the Government's proposals amounted to a coherent, well thought out strategy to solve the many problems on our roads that the Minister mentioned at the beginning of his speech. The central problem with the Government's approach to traffic management is incoherence. They cannot decide whether they regard the car as an evil or not. Their heart tells them, and many of their own Back Benchers tell them, that motorists are a bad thing whose lives need to be made miserable, but they accept that there are tens of millions of drivers in this country, many of whom rely on the car as an essential necessity for going about their daily business.

It is our contention that those people should have their lives improved as much as possible by the traffic management network. That is what we have been seeking to do with our suggested changes to the Bill. The question facing us today, after the Committee and Report stages, is whether enough of the many persuasive arguments put by my right hon. and hon. Friends and by hon. Members in other parts of the House, including on the Government Benches, have been taken on board by Ministers. The answer, regrettably, is no. We have done our best to improve the Bill so that it genuinely meets the needs of road users, but Ministers have insisted on sticking to the bulk of their original plans, so the Bill is not yet in a fit state for us to support it. I hope that in another place it can be changed in those areas where it is deficient.

All that despite the rather good start to the debate on consideration. We were entirely happy to support Ministers on their new clause on blue badges to help disabled people, and we paid tribute to Members on both sides of the House who lobbied for that. Then, Ministers graciously conceded that our ideas on civil enforcement and the need for statutory guidelines are sensible. We are delighted that they agreed to look again at the wide-ranging and ill defined powers that they have given traffic wardens to impose penalties on drivers of moving vehicles, and we hope that they will return with further sensible suggestions. It was good to hear Ministers admit that we were right about the need for statutory guidelines. Indeed, the Under-Secretary of State for Transport, the hon. Member for Plymouth, Devonport (Mr. Jamieson), was praised for his flexibility. Despite that, or perhaps because of it, that was it for the rest of the day as far as common sense was concerned, and we got no more real agreement from the Government.

Nevertheless, I hope that when the Government move their own amendments in another place we can support them, because this is a key issue for those who are concerned not only with traffic management, but with the wider issue of respect for the forces of law enforcement. One of the great problems of our age is the increasing breakdown of respect among the general population for the police and other law enforcement agencies; over-zealous civilian enforcement of traffic laws is a significant contributor to that.

The second problematic aspect of the Bill is the permit scheme that the Government propose to foist on councils and the utilities. We had an extremely entertaining debate—largely conducted, it must be said, on this side of the House—on the balance between those two good Conservative principles of low and honest taxation and local accountability. We came down on the side of low and honest taxation because, as the National Joint Utilities Group says, the Government's scheme will add £1.2 billion per annum to utilities' costs in building up their networks. That is why we suggested that the fee for any application for a permit or issue of a permit should not be higher than the administration cost incurred.

The arguments over the extra £55 per household tax that the Government propose to impose were well rehearsed, and I will not go over them again. However, I invite Ministers to consider what happened in the experiments that they set up to test this type of system. The Halcrow report on the pilot schemes that were implemented in Camden and Middlesbrough showed that utilities did not change their practices under lane rental although they had to pay the charges. The objectives—to reduce journey times in Camden and to reduce delays in bus journeys in Middlesbrough—were not achieved, and the additional costs to the utilities in the 11 months of the pilots were £1.18 million in Camden and £862,000 in Middlesbrough. If Ministers looked at the evidence that they themselves commissioned, they would not be proceeding down this route. It is somewhat stubborn and pig-headed of them to persist with the scheme, and I assure them that we will continue our opposition in another place.

The third area where the Bill is seriously deficient is in the effect on the breakdown services of the proposals on managing incidents on motorways. Ministers have fallen over themselves to provide assurances that they do not intend to damage the RAC, the AA and Green Flag, and did so again today. Sadly, they seem not to have read their own Bill, which permits the Highways Agency to establish a monopoly roadside recovery service funded by charges on motorists. Given Ministers' record on milking motorists, they should understand why bodies such as the AA and the RAC, which are of course supportive of improved incident management, are so concerned about the Bill. Ministers will probably not listen to Opposition parties, but perhaps they will listen to the motoring organisations, which, as has been pointed out, have 10 million members. The AA says:

"The Bill, as drafted, could not only enable the removal of motorists' existing right of choice of commercial provider but also remove the existing right of one motorist to stop and help another . . . Consumer protection issues also appear to have been overlooked because the Bill gives powers for charges to be set to create a revenue stream in the financial interests of the HA"—

the Highways Agency—

"or contractors".

In other words, the body empowered to remove vehicles will be funded by the charges that it can make. I should have thought that that in itself would be enough to ring alarm bells with Ministers.

The AA makes another good point, particularly apposite given our debate on blue badges and the needs of disabled drivers:

"The Disabled Drivers Association says that the special needs services provided by the major roadside recovery organisations are vital to hundreds of thousands of vulnerable drivers. It would neither make sense nor be acceptable to them to put these national services under threat."

Ministers need to look again at those points.

The RAC envisages:

"A needless doubling up of resources",

because

"70 to 80 per cent. of our customers call for help from a mobile phone. This means that in many cases breakdown organisations will already have sent a recovery vehicle before the Highways Agency becomes involved."

The RAC, too, is concerned about unfair charging of motorists and in particular—the Minister did not address this extremely good point at all—the second order effect, by which there will be a reduction in the number of motorists with breakdown cover. If people know that the Highways Agency has some kind of monopoly right on motorways, and will come along, charge them what it likes and take their cars away anyway, that will discourage them from joining the excellent breakdown organisations.

Mr. Jamieson: I am not sure whether the hon. Gentleman was in the Chamber when we debated that on Report, but if so he would have heard me say that we hold the breakdown services in the highest regard and that the Government have no intention, through the Highways Agency or any other body, of supplanting their excellent work. There will be no incentive for people to leave the AA, the RAC or any other body under the "second order" to which the hon. Gentleman refers, because they will be charged for having their vehicle totally removed from the road. The only powers that we have transferred to traffic officers are those that the Conservative Government gave the police, back in 1984.

Mr. Green: I was here, and I heard the Minister give those warm words, but he does not appear to have listened to the words of the organisations. The fact is that they do not believe him, and I am afraid that we are now at the stage of the decaying years of this Government when no one believes a word that they say. The Minister can reassure people until he is blue in the face, but it is quite clear that those hugely responsible, popular, important organisations have not been reassured. He has made exactly the same points on meetings taking place in a few weeks' time as he made on Second Reading, and he has not accepted any amendments drafted by those organisations and tabled by my right hon. and hon. Friends. I am therefore not surprised that they suspect his motives. The warm words that he keeps repeating are not backed up by any deeds. Until Ministers do something to help the emergency organisations, rather than just say how much they value them, they will not be credible on this point.

Among the noteworthy aspects of today's debates were the warm tributes to local authorities and local power that the Minister kept paying. He will be aware, however, of the real concerns of local government about the centralising tendencies of the Bill as it stands, in particular about the powers to impose traffic directors on local authorities. The Bill does not state in what circumstances that might happen or what evidence the Government will have to produce to enable them to act in that way. It does not set a timetable for any review of arrangements in cases in which the Government have declared a local authority to have failed and have taken away its powers of traffic management—[Interruption.] The Minister is sitting there chuntering, but he should perhaps talk to his colleagues in the Local Government Association, who made those points very strongly in the days leading up to this debate. He has not convinced even his Labour colleagues in the LGA: yet another group of people who can see that Ministers' words and deeds are completely out of sync.

[Mr. Green]

In amendment No. 1, which we did not reach, we suggested adding to statutory duty the need to keep the roads in good repair. My hon. Friend the Member for West Derbyshire (Mr. McLoughlin) made the good point that the Bill has therefore not completed its scrutiny. Surely it is a basic and sensible aspiration to ask local highways authorities to keep the roads in good repair. That is the sort of thing that should appear in a traffic management Bill, and it is a great shame that, because of the Government's habit of trying to shorten parliamentary scrutiny of their legislation, perfectly non-contentious and sensible ideas such as that in amendment No. 1 cannot even be debated in the House.

So the Bill, which purports to help traffic flow and improve the conditions on our roads, has failed to achieve its objectives. It should have provided relief for congested streets and frustrated road users, but it is now clear that we shall have to wait for such useful legislation until the next Conservative Government. This Government have been waging war on the motorist since they came to power and, sadly, the Bill does not mark a ceasefire, as it was meant to. In its own terms, the Bill fails in its purpose, and I urge the House to reject it.

Mrs. Dunwoody: Any traffic management scheme must be properly organised, and the Bill represents a sensible attempt to do exactly that. We desperately need to bring a bit of sense to the way in which we manage our road space in congested towns and villages and to accept that many different groups of people need to use what is a very limited space.

I have one reservation about the Bill, however, and I would like to spend a minute putting it on record. The powers that it gives to traffic officers are very wide-ranging while not being tremendously precise. They also appear to present some difficulties. We are creating a new traffic police force without the full skills and abilities of true traffic policemen. We could easily have expanded the existing police forces to create a real traffic police force, if it were only the clogging up of motorways that was causing the difficulty. I hope that we shall not regret this decision in due course.

John Thurso: I see a number of other hon. Members waiting to speak, so I shall be brief. I pay tribute to all hon. Members who took part in our proceedings today and in Committee, which was certainly helpful to the Bill.

I gave the Bill a pretty broad welcome on Second Reading. I said that its general principles were right, and that is still my view. I raised three points at that time, and I shall touch briefly on each of them now. The Minister mentioned the problems of congestion. They certainly impede our economy and add to emissions, which has a negative impact on the environment and on human health. The Bill is welcome in that it seeks to address those problems in general terms.

We have talked about the timetable for the Bill, and it certainly proved adequate in Committee. The Bill received good scrutiny, and I pay tribute to the business managers for achieving that. I am also grateful to the Minister for mentioning the backroom staff on all sides; they do a good job. I appreciated the opportunity, as did my staff, to meet his officials to consider various aspects of the Bill. I have to say, however, that on Report, holding six short debates was perhaps not the best way to proceed. I am sorry that we did not get to the one debate that I would have liked to take part in, which was the one on my amendment.

I expressed my concern on Second Reading that traffic officers and traffic managers might not have sufficient regard to safety. The Minister gave reassurances in Committee in that regard, which I was content to accept. I believe, from what he has said, that the commitment to road safety will be there. Another point that I raised with him, about which I am less certain, relates to environmental management, and to whether network managers will have sufficient regard to that issue. There is an imbalance between keeping traffic moving and what is best for the environment. It remains to be seen whether the Bill will look after what is required for the environment.

One issue that we debated in Committee and failed to get to today was the London settlement in the Greater London Authority Act 1999 and how the powers that the Bill confers will relate to traffic directors and the Mayor. As the Bill stands, it removes the primacy of the Mayor on transport matters, by enabling traffic directors to override the Mayor's strategy and directions in relation to local implementation plans, and his directions to Transport for London. It therefore contains a major shift in the London devolution settlement. In Committee, the Minister said that it was not the Government's intention to unpick the devolution settlement, but further research has shown that that is precisely what they did, as the back-stop powers that they required were already available under clause 143 of the Bill that set up the Greater London authority. That matter may have to be dealt with in another place.

Notwithstanding that fairly severe reservation and the other matters that I touched on, I believe that the principles of the Bill are correct. It is important that our traffic be kept flowing as freely as possible. My colleagues and I are content to support the Government in the Lobby.

Brian White: Consideration on Second Reading began with the Government responding positively to a letter that I wrote about the concerns of utility companies by setting up the working group. This afternoon, the Government accepted an amendment on the blue badge scheme that I tabled in Committee. I thank Ministers for their positive response throughout.

Having said that, I raised a number of other concerns in Committee regarding the permit scheme and road safety that Ministers need to continue to take on board during the ongoing consultation. The assurances that they gave in Committee on how those concerns will be dealt with in the ongoing discussions are important, particularly those on network management having a duty to deal with road safety issues.

It is important to get the balance right between utilities and local authorities—that has been mentioned today—and in the co-ordination of street works. I welcome the assurance that the Government gave in Committee that start-up companies will not find themselves at an unfair disadvantage over the works that are essential for the growth of our economy. I appreciate that the right hon. Member for Bromley and Chislehurst (Mr. Forth) will want to endorse that.

The traffic forum proposals should be taken forward. Also, the involvement of stakeholders in drawing up the regulations and, in particular, the need for joined-up government, are important. It is not only the Department for Transport that should be involved.

The Bill is a useful step forward and I urge Ministers, as they take the consultation forward, to take on board the real, underlying concerns that gave rise to a number of amendments that were considered in Committee.

Mr. Redwood: Previous Transport Ministers under this Government worked on the assumption that 30 million motorists must be wrong. If the motorists were not wrong, they would impose rules, regulations and new restrictions to ensure that they were, and then charge them for it.

The latest Secretary of State and his ministerial team offered us something better. We were told that they had seen the light: they had come to realise that most people most of the time make their journeys by car, that most goods move by van or lorry, and that however successfully we improve railways and other public transport modes—this Government have been singularly unsuccessful in that—we are unlikely to get away from the fact that the overwhelming majority of longer journeys are undertaken by road vehicle.

We entered into the spirit of the Bill expecting great things. Certainly, the Under-Secretary of State for Transport, the hon. Member for Plymouth, Devonport (Mr. Jamieson) has been pleasant and agreeable—from time to time, he has found merit in what the Opposition have said—so it is more in sorrow than anger that I have to say that I share the disappointment of my hon. Friend the Member for Ashford (Mr. Green), who sits on our Front Bench.

I was expecting much more. I was told on Second Reading that several ideas that I had put forward had a lot to recommend them and would help to improve traffic flow, but I find that somehow they have not found their way into the Bill as yet. I live in hope, because in the other place, where there is a better voting balance, wiser heads may prevail. The Minister may take away from today's debates some better ideas that could be reflected in the Bill before it returns to the House.

So many points need improving. Today, for example, the hon. Member for Crewe and Nantwich (Mrs. Dunwoody) talked about important issues concerning delivery vehicles. She is worried about the lot of the milk float. It has to go out early in the morning and hazard its way round the bus lanes worrying about infringements and taxes being imposed on it if it intervenes by using the bus lane. The driver also has to worry about crossing the bus lane on foot, presumably after having parked in the middle of the highway. That is a ludicrous situation. The Minister agreed, but had no immediate solution. The milk float is one of many delivery vehicles that have to chance their arm with bus lane regulations. I hope that the Government will think again and understand the need for change. One possible solution is to alter the times at which bus lanes come into effect, so that early-morning deliveries can take place without difficulty. If we want to improve road capacity and reduce congestion, bus lanes should only operate at busy times of day, when frequent and regular bus services need to use them. It seems ridiculous to blank off half or one third of the highway on each side for the whole day when often no congestion warrants that intrusion or no buses are using that facility.

We have attempted to address speed limits but without success. All of us believe that low limits should be imposed where vulnerable people—particularly children and the elderly—may be on or near the carriageway. At times when children are entering or leaving school, it makes sense to impose tight speed controls. They can also make a lot of sense when applied to busy roads in residential areas and near the homes of elderly people.

It does not make sense to impose a series of varied speed limits—30, 40, 50, 60 or 70 mph—on main trunk roads through urban areas in a way that the motorist finds confusing. Often, lower speed limits are set than most motorists judge to be safe. Those arbitrary limits are buttressed with cameras as a way of collecting large sums of money from motorists who may not be aware that the limit has suddenly changed from 60 or 50 mph to 40 mph and have to make a contribution to the one-armed bandits in the sky.

The Under-Secretary frowns, but an experienced motorist used to be able to judge the speed limit by the environment through which he or she was driving. If one was driving through a well-lit, built-up area one knew that the limit was 30 mph. A dual carriageway in an urban area meant a 40 mph limit. Anywhere else on a main highway meant a 60 mph limit in the case of a single carriageway and 70 mph for a motorway-type road.

There is now a stunning array of different speed limits, particularly in urban areas. Experienced motorists cannot guess or judge but have to keep their eyes skinned to the side of the road to see the one sign—often covered in mud, dirty and not easily recognisable—when their eyes should be fixed on the road ahead, in case there is an unusual impediment. As a result, even law-abiding motorists often get caught out in areas they do not know well. There should be a much more rational approach. My hon. Friends on the Front Bench suggest a limit of 80 mph on motorways. In trying to observe, as I do, the 70 mph limit I am always in the slow lane and practically every other vehicle overtakes. If I broke the speed limit and got caught, that would make far too exciting a story—so like the Minister, I suspect, I try to behave myself. I notice that most of my constituents do not believe that the 70 mph speed limit is reasonable or sensible and regularly break it.

Parking is another issue that we have debated but on which we have not succeeded in changing the Minister's mind. One reason why highway capacity is so limited is that many people at home and work and in town centres have to park their vehicles on the carriageway because planning rules do not make sufficient provision for parking, hard standing or garaging. That does not stop people owning and using cars but means that a large number of vehicles, when not in use, stand out on the highway—reducing the space available on a crowded highway network in a crowded island. I hope that Transport Ministers will talk to their planning colleagues and re-examine the guidelines.

The guidelines are based on the false proposition that, if planners restrict the amount of garage and hard-standing space in people's homes, and the amount of car parking in city and town centres, people will be deterred from owning or using cars. That is a misunderstanding of human nature. As society gets more prosperous, and as the public transport alternatives are so obviously not up to many people's demands in relation to going to work, taking the children to school or going about their leisure and pleasure, of course, people will own cars. If there is not sufficient parking space at home, they will park out on the highway, and if there are not sufficient off-road parking places in town and city centres, more congestion will result as vehicles circulate around the town and city desperately looking for the limited parking places available, and having to play a kind of Russian roulette to get one. That increases congestion and pollution, and does not succeed meeting in the green objectives that underlie the policy.

We have debated the issue of bus lanes. Again, it was disappointing that Ministers did not decide to include in the Bill a provision to allow vulnerable vehicles and other users of the highway such as motor cyclists and cyclists the right in every case to use the bus lane. Ministers were persuaded of the case for cyclists to use the bus lane, and said that that usually happened, so it would not have hurt to put it clearly in the legislation. They also said that they were studying the case of motor cyclists. Hundreds of thousands of cyclists and motor cyclists who may hear about this debate will be disappointed that the Bill does not recognise their needs or include them as reasonable users of the bus lane. The Minister says that he has a lot of sympathy with my view, so I do not know why he cannot use his legislative pen to put my mind at rest and show either that that is happening or that it should happen as a matter of course.

Many Members on both sides of the House recognise that traffic lights, their location and use, are one of the big problems in creating congested Britain. We have made several proposals for improving the use, phasing and deployment of traffic lights, which we think could make a lot of sense. The case, as with that for amending the bus lane regulations, is based on safety as well as speed and ease of passage. Many accidents occur at junctions, which is not surprising given that, at junctions, traffic moving in different directions comes into conflict and powerful vehicles come into potential conflict with bicycles and pedestrians. Junctions are the most dangerous parts of the road network. Our motorways, which are by far and away our fastest roads, are also our safest roads, because most of the hazards of the junction have been taken out by grade-separated interchanges, meaning that traffic moving in different directions never comes into conflict. Of course, no pedestrians or push cycles are allowed on motorways. Relatively high speeds at uncongested times of day are therefore combined with much greater safety because of segregation of traffic and proper use of the motorway.

On the main trunk road network, which does not have dual carriageway and grade-separated interchange provision, there is much more conflict between different types of vehicle moving in different directions and more vulnerable road users. I hope that, as a result of the debate, the Government will recognise the need to study those junctions and how many of them can be enlarged and improved with a view to segregating different users of the junction and segregating traffic flowing in different directions to reduce the likelihood of conflict. My single message to the Government on safety and congestion is that it is not speed that causes the accidents, and it is not just a case of trying to get traffic moving more quickly to stop congestion. If we want a really safe highway network, we must design conflict out and we will then cure both congestion and many of the safety problems.

We need to be much kinder to the pedestrian. On the railways, we have a very good rule that people should never walk anywhere near the tracks and should not try to cross the railway lines other than by means of a bridge, and yet different rules seem to apply when it comes to managing the main road network. As a pedestrian in London rather than a car user, I think that we pedestrians should also obey the rules. Pedestrians should have proper provision, probably with more bridges and underpasses, so that we can cross the road without having to wait for traffic and avoid the conflict between pedestrians and cars that often occurs.

The Bill provides for a massive stealth tax on the utility companies. My right hon. and hon. Friends have calculated that it could be as much as £55 per household as a result of the powers—

It being Seven o'clock, MADAM DEPUTY SPEAKER put the Question already proposed from the Chair, pursuant to Order [5 January].

European Parliamentary and Local Elections (Pilots) Bill

Lords Reasons for insisting on certain of their amendments to which the Commons have disagreed, considered.

7.16 pm

Madam Deputy Speaker (Sylvia Heal): Under the Order of the House of 8 March, any message from the Lords relating to the European Parliamentary and Local Elections (Pilots) Bill may be considered forthwith, without Question put.

A message has been received from the Lords as follows: the Lords disagree to the Commons amendment to a Lords amendment to the European Parliamentary and Local Elections (Pilots) Bill, and they insist on a Lords amendment to which the Commons have disagreed, for which disagreement they assign their reason.

Mr. Patrick McLoughlin (West Derbyshire) (Con): I beg to move, That the House do now sit in private.

Question put forthwith, pursuant to Standing Order No. 163 (Motions to sit in private):—

The House proceeded to a Division.

Madam Deputy Speaker: I have asked the Serjeant at Arms to investigate the delay in the Lobby.

The House having divided: Ayes 122, Noes 311.

Lords Amendment 1B

Lords Disagreement and Reason

The Lords disagree to Commons Amendment 1A to Lords Amendment 1 for the following Reason—

Because it is appropriate to make provision for no more than two pilot regions, as recommended by the Electoral Commission.

7.33 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Constitutional Affairs (Mr. Christopher Leslie): I beg to move, That this House does not insist on its amendment No. 1A to Lords Amendment No. 1.

Madam Deputy Speaker (Sylvia Heal): With this it will be convenient to discuss the following: Government amendment (a) to Lords amendment No. 1.

Lords amendment No. 3B—Lords Insistence and Reason—

The Lords insist on their Amendment 3 to which the Commons have disagreed, for the following Reason—

Because it is appropriate to impose the requirements set out in the Lords amendment.

Government motion to insist on its disagreement to the said amendment.

Government amendment (a) in lieu thereof.

Mr. Leslie: Earlier today, their lordships considered again the views of the Commons expressed last Monday evening. The package of measures that we propose includes a concession to their lordships: whereas the Government and the Electoral Commission had hoped to dispense with the requirement for a second person to witness the signature of each voter with a declaration of identity, we are prepared to acquiesce to their Lordships on that particular point, and allow the witnessed signature arrangement to occur in this June's all-postal elections. I realise that that will disappoint the Electoral Commission and many hon. Members, because of worries about the efficacy of a witness signature process, but on balance—and in view of the insistence by the Lords on that point—we feel that on that matter we can compromise without overriding harm coming to the overall policy of all-postal voting. However, we remain opposed to sending expensive and wasteful receipt acknowledgements to every elector who returns a ballot paper, so we wish to delete the measure that would provide for that.

Andrew Bennett (Denton and Reddish) (Lab): It is a shame that we are making that concession to the Lords. What will happen to ballot papers that are returned without the declaration completed correctly? Will the returning officer give people the opportunity to correct their mistake, or will the mistake invalidate their papers?

Mr. Leslie: Owing to the insistence of their lordships, we felt that we needed to try to find consensus on the matter. I tend to agree with my hon. Friend that we would ideally have moved to a single signature arrangement, such as that which we initially set out, but their lordships clearly do not feel that we are yet ready to do that. I suspect that we will return to the matter at another time. The declaration of identity will require a witness signature, which happens under normal postal voting arrangements for postal voting on demand. In that respect, the provision is in line with existing legislation, but I think that further reform will undoubtedly be necessary.

More significantly, their lordships overturned the will of the House of Commons on the Government's intention for four regions—the east midlands, the north-east, the north-west and Yorkshire—to undertake all-postal voting. They did that despite hon. Members' vote last Monday to support the measure. I listened closely to the debate in their lordships' House, and they gave no more substantive reasons for overturning the proposal for four regions than they gave previously. The House of Commons has made its decisions on four regions before in full view of the facts, which is why I urge it to do so again.

Four regions will make up a good pilot. It will cover a minority of the country—31 per cent.—but it will be on a large enough scale to test out new procedures effectively. Postal voting is worth trying out on that larger scale. It makes democracy easier for the public because people's opportunities to express their views are brought to their doorsteps, so electors are not expected to overcome obstacles and travel to a polling station. I understand that several noble Lords and Conservative Members occasionally say that we should not make voting more convenient, but that is a ludicrous position to take.

Mr. George Osborne (Tatton) (Con) rose—

Mr. Leslie: Talking of ludicrous, I give way to the hon. Gentleman.

Mr. Osborne: The Minister is belittling the arguments against including the north-west, for example, in the pilot. Does he accept that the Electoral Commission did not feel able to recommend the north-west as a pilot area? Why do the Government think that they can override the Electoral Commission?

Mr. Leslie: The hon. Gentleman should study closely what the Electoral Commission says. It is true that its definition of what forms a pilot differs from the Government's as regards the issue of scale, but it is certainly not the case that it said no to Yorkshire and the north-west. Indeed, it said that those regions in themselves were "potentially suitable"—it gave them that designation. [Interruption.] It is true that the regions were not on the Electoral Commission's top two list, which is what the hon. Member for Somerton and Frome (Mr. Heath) implies from a sedentary position, but nevertheless I hope that hon. Members will acknowledge that it recognised north-west and Yorkshire as potentially suitable and that they remain as such.

Mr. Paul Tyler (North Cornwall) (LD): Will the Minister confirm that the Electoral Commission thought that the third region—if there was to be a third—was going to be Scotland, rather than either of the other two regions?

Mr. Leslie: It is certainly not the case that neither of the other two regions was considered. The Electoral Commission produced a grouping of regions that it deemed to be potentially suitable. As we have said many times throughout the passage of the Bill, Scotland and Scottish returning officers did not want to proceed with the process, which is why we moved down the list. Yorkshire and the north-west came next on the list, so we followed the Electoral Commission's ranking in the light of the views of experts, administrators and regional returning officers. I hope that the hon. Gentleman will acknowledge that as a relatively logical process.

Mr. Osborne: The experts at the Electoral Commission said, on 4 March, that they "felt unable to make a positive recommendation in respect of those regions"— that includes the north-west—

"having assessed their suitability against the guidelines we have applied."

[Mr. Osborne]

Why is the Minister overriding them?

Mr. Leslie: If the hon. Gentleman reads further the letter sent to me by the commission's chairman, he will see the sentence:

"We named a further four regions that were potentially suitable as pilots."

Mr. Osborne: Potentially suitable.

Mr. Leslie: Yes, potentially suitable, as I said to the hon. Gentleman. He cannot in any way suggest that the Electoral Commission had not said that Yorkshire and the north-west were somehow not potentially suitable.

Mr. Chris Mole (Ipswich) (Lab): Does the Minister accept that the evidence given by the regional returning officer for Yorkshire and Humberside to the Select Committee's current inquiry asserted that the worst that could happen now would be for the Government to change their mind about the pre-planning for the elections, because the local authorities are not a position to return to a traditional approach to voting in this election?

Mr. Leslie: It is indeed the case that, increasingly, returning officers in the north-west, Yorkshire, the east midlands and the north-east are saying that they want to proceed with all-postal voting. That is the view of the administrators on the ground, and they not only want the Government to sustain that position; they want Parliament to sustain it. That is what I am asking the Commons to agree to tonight.

We know for a fact that more people will participate in all-postal voting. What can be wrong with that? Surely it is right and proper that we take steps to encourage wider participation. That is the responsible path to take if we are to reinvigorate our democratic process.

Mr. Gerald Kaufman (Manchester, Gorton) (Lab): I just want to clarify something because I may have got the wrong end of the stick—it would not be the first time. When my hon. Friend was speaking to the motion on the amendment and announcing the change regarding witnesses which my hon. Friend the Member for Denton and Reddish (Andrew Bennett) deplored, did he say that the matter on which the Government were now giving way to the Lords was something that the Electoral Commission wanted?

Mr. Leslie: My right hon. Friend is entirely right. The commission advised Parliament and the Government that it would prefer to move away from the process of the declaration-of-identity witness signature towards a single-signature arrangement. It is a pity that the Opposition parties, in collusion in the other place, have been determined to push that point, but we do not feel that it is at the core of the Bill, and we have reluctantly decided to concede on it.

Mr. Kaufman: Having given that explanation, which confirms what I thought I heard, will my hon. Friend explain how even the heights of hypocrisy which both the Conservatives and the Liberal Democrats can reach—they are heights with no ceiling—allow them to reconcile their demand that we abandon something that the Electoral Commission wanted with them giving as their reason for insisting on the amendment the fact that the commission wanted something? Just what kind of creeps are these people?

Mr. Leslie: I am not sure that I can answer that last question in parliamentary terms, but I agree that even the sky is not the limit when it comes to the double standards and inconsistency in the arguments pursued by other parties. When the commission's advice suits them, they will uphold it; when it does not suit them, they will not uphold it.

If the Opposition parties recognise the arrangements that are in place, they will see that the Electoral Commission is there to advise, but ultimately Government and Parliament have to make the final decisions. We make decisions in full cognisance of the advice that is available to us but also with an eye to the fact that we are accountable to those who elect us, unlike, of course, those in the other Chamber.

On the issue of scale, which concerned Members in the other place, it would be perverse to ignore the plans for October's all-postal referendum on elected regional assemblies—indeed, the Electoral Commission supports all-postal voting—so proceeding in the north-west, the north-east and Yorkshire clearly makes good sense. We have answered questions and made proposals to placate worries about fraud, and the Electoral Commission, the returning officers and the police are all keen to work together to make all-postal voting a success. Extensions of the offence of personation have been included in the Bill, and election officials have other new powers to crack down on any hint of malpractice. It is extremely odd that Opposition parties in the Lords should say in the same breath that they are prepared to see all-postal voting in two regions, but not in a further two. All the queries raised have been about the system and nature of postal voting, including specious worries about fraud, which can be answered and ameliorated satisfactorily. That is entirely different from suggesting that a greater problem is presented by having four regions as opposed to two. If their lordships thought that the arrangements for all-postal voting were unsafe, why are they happy with two regions but not three or four? Scale presents few issues or problems, yet their lordships failed to address that question.

All-postal voting in only two regions could result in fewer people voting by post than was the case in the last round of local election pilots in 2003—a backward step which would be inexplicable to the many members of the public who are keen on all-postal voting. There is little more to be said about the matter, as the House of Commons has expressed its view, and should do so again tonight. By delaying the Bill, their lordships are jeopardising the crucial preparation period before elections. Returning officers need time to prepare, contract and put their plans in place, and they have asked Parliament to make a decision now on which regions will go ahead. By supporting the proposals, the House of Commons can reiterate its strong view that four regions need to proceed. I therefore commend the proposals to the House.

Mr. Nick Hawkins (Surrey Heath) (Con): Cracks in the Government edifice have started to appear with the first Government concession. Although it is welcome, it does not go nearly far enough, and the Minister, as usual, has tried to skate over the Electoral Commission's true view. Only a few days ago, in the Chamber, we referred to a letter to him from Sam Younger, the chairman of the Electoral Commission, who, I remind him, said that "it does not follow that the Commission would be unconcerned about the number of pilot regions. As I have mentioned, we expected the Government to nominate three regions and were surprised to learn that the Bill was to be amended to name four regions."

That is about as strongly worded as letters to Ministers get [Interruption.] The Deputy Prime Minister is chuntering. Throughout our debates we have mentioned the unseen hand of the Deputy Prime Minister, who was determined to get his own way about Yorkshire and Humber. He has been working by remote control to try to persuade the Electoral Commission of the Government's case. Finally, he is here in person tonight, and is openly blustering about wanting to get his way, as he always tries to do. Fortunately, we have a bicameral legislature. The upper House is entitled to express its view, and we want to support its sensible warnings about fraud and the dangers of involving half the country in postal pilots. It will come as no surprise to the House that the Opposition remain entirely unconvinced by the arguments the Minister has expressed again tonight for piloting in four regions.

There are two fundamental reasons why we and the other place must stand firm. First, it is irresponsible to operate a so-called pilot scheme in nearly half of England. Almost half the regions will hold combined European parliamentary and local elections in June, when pilot schemes should be designed to generate evidence on a system of voting that is new, innovative and by no means guaranteed secure. The independent Electoral Reform Society has said, as the Minister is well aware, that for the first time in 130 years there is an opportunity, sadly, for large-scale electoral fraud.

Mr. Ronnie Campbell (Blyth Valley) (Lab): There was a pilot scheme during the last local elections in my constituency, Blyth Valley. When I asked the returning officer afterwards how it went, he said he was amazed at how correct the ballot was and at the fact that there was little, if any, fraud.

Mr. Hawkins: That is not the experience of many who spoke in the previous debates on this—[Interruption.] The Deputy Prime Minister continues to shout from a sedentary position. I refer him to the detailed speeches of the noble Lord Greaves in several debates about wholesale fraud in various areas—

Several hon. Members rose—

Mr. Hawkins: —particularly the north-west—

Madam Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. Gentleman was not giving way at that point. He clearly is now.

Mr. David Watts (St. Helens, North) (Lab): I am grateful to the hon. Member for Surrey Heath (Mr. Hawkins). Will he refer to the commission's report on the pilot schemes that were conducted both in my own constituency and in that of my hon. Friend the Member for Blyth Valley (Mr. Campbell), and acknowledge that the report indicated that there was no evidence whatever that fraud had been committed? Will he deal with that specific point? I cannot see that he is providing any evidence to justify his claims.

Mr. Hawkins: I can certainly respond to the hon. Gentleman. The Electoral Commission's own report on the matter raises concerns about fraud, specifically in relation to the north-west. The commission points out that there may well be criminal trials arising from some of the pending allegations, and some of those trials might coincide with the forthcoming elections. That was one of the reasons why the commission was so concerned about the north-west.

Mr. William Cash (Stone) (Con): I heard the Deputy Prime Minister shouting across the Floor of the House, "Where's the evidence?" I am sure he is acquainted with the Alden committee report relating to Birmingham, which has a Labour council. I shall refer to that later, if I catch Madam Deputy Speaker's eye. I should be very surprised if the Deputy Prime Minister does not know about that report, in which Mr. Alden stated that matters had become so bad that the rules that exist in Northern Ireland had to be applied, and the police went on to say that the postal voting system had few major checks or controls. The situation in Birmingham at the time was a scandal, and I am surprised that the Deputy Prime Minister does not seem to be aware of it.

Mr. Hawkins: I am grateful to my hon. Friend.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Order. Before the hon. Gentleman replies, I would prefer this short debate to be conducted in an orderly manner, without Members on either side shouting from sedentary positions.

Mr. Hawkins: I am grateful for that, Madam Deputy Speaker. The Government are showing that they wish to ignore the advice of their own creation, the Electoral Commission, which was able to recommend unequivocally only two pilot areas. It has done the research. During the debates in another place, Lord Greaves highlighted specific problems in the two regions that the Government are seeking to insist on, where there are serious concerns about fraud, electoral malpractice and intimidation. I refer hon. Members to columns 12 to 18 of 26 January in another place. I also refer hon. Members to what Lord Greaves said in the debate this afternoon, when he repeated his concerns.

Andrew Bennett: Will the hon. Gentleman separate two issues? There has been some evidence of fraud under the existing postal vote system, but that will apply whatever we decide tonight. However, there is no evidence of fraud in the pilot. There is a strong argument that if there is a high turnout, which we could get as a result of postal ballots, any fraud will become much less significant.

Mr. Hawkins: That point simply does not deal with the fact that on this issue, in relation to these pilots, the Electoral Commission is recommending against the two extra areas that the Government want to include. One of the concerns that the commission raises specifically is fraud in relation to the north-west.

[Mr. Hawkins]

Mr. Leslie: The hon. Gentleman says that the Electoral Commission recommended against the north-west and Yorkshire. Is he absolutely sure that that is a correct representation of the Electoral Commission's view?

Mr. Hawkins: As the Minister knows full well, we have said that the Electoral Commission was able unequivocally to recommend only two regions. The Government are ignoring their own Electoral Commission's recommendations. The Government are insisting on these four pilot regions for their own reasons. The Minister in another place, Lord Filkin, made it perfectly clear that he does not believe that the clearly-evidenced lack of enthusiasm of regional returning officers or the possibility of malpractice should be any impediment to piloting the all-postal schemes in the two additional areas. The Electoral Commission clearly begs to differ, as Sam Younger's recent letter to the Minister makes absolutely clear. We remain absolutely adamant that only the two regions unequivocally recommended by the Electoral Commission—the north-east and the east midlands—should be pilots.

Mr. Watts: May I point out that the overwhelming view of people in the north-west, as received in representations, is support for the idea of all-postal ballots? Will the hon. Gentleman deal with my original point? Can he give us any evidence of fraud and tell us whether any prosecutions are going ahead as a result of the pilot schemes that were launched in the north-west and in other areas?

Mr. Hawkins: I dealt with that point in my earlier answer to the hon. Gentleman. If he reads the Electoral Commission's report, he will find that it deals specifically with the concerns about possible fraud that were so adequately set out by Lord Greaves, who has extensive experience of elections in the north-west. That is further evidence of why the Electoral Commission is right.

Mr. Cash: Does my hon. Friend accept that the real issue often turns on the electoral roll? A serious problem has arisen in that context. Far too many people are going on to the electoral roll, which appears to have some connection with the latest immigration problems.

Mr. Hawkins: I very much agree with my hon. Friend.

Given that these are pilots—experimental trial schemes—it seems sensible to have them only in the two regions where the Government's own Electoral Commission is confident about using the all-postal scheme, and where all the regional returning officers support it and there are no fears about fraud. If the pilots are successful, next time round more enthusiasm and confidence might be expressed by regional returning officers in areas where they have not been confident in the past; then, perhaps, the all-postal system could be widened.

I welcome the Government's concessions on houses in multiple occupation. They have not gone far enough, but they are at least recognising some of the arguments that were advanced by Opposition Members here and in another place.

We feel that the Government are taking an unjustifiable risk by insisting on four pilot regions against the recommendation of the Electoral Commission, which, as Sam Younger's letter makes clear, is still concerned about that. It is vital to balance any plans that the Government have for innovation against the security and safety of our democratic process. We welcome the Government's small concession, but they have not gone far enough. We shall continue to maintain our position and to vote against their continuing attempts to impose this measure.

Mr. Kaufman: I elicited from my hon. Friend the Minister the fact that the House of Lords is insisting on excluding these two regions because, in the contention of the Opposition, the Government are going against the wishes of the Electoral Commission; but there were cheers from the Liberal Democrat Benches when my hon. Friend said that he was going to make a concession that went against the wishes of the Electoral Commission. What we get from that rabble opposite—or those several rabbles opposite—is not honest, open, clear reasons for opposing the measure, but adventitious excuses to avoid something that they do not want to happen. They do not want to give more people more opportunities to vote in elections that they are scared of losing. They want as few people as possible to vote—[Interruption.] The hon. Member for Tatton (Mr. Osborne) jeers, but it would be very difficult for the Conservative vote in my constituency to get any lower than it is. It has almost disappeared there, although there is still just a little scope for further reduction.

8 pm

Mr. George Osborne rose—

Mr. Kaufman: I shall give way in a moment.

Let us be clear about this. My hon. Friend the Minister is right when he says that the pilot scheme is wanted overwhelmingly in the north-west. That has been made absolutely clear by my constituents and those of many other hon. Members.

Shona McIsaac (Cleethorpes) (Lab): Is my right hon. Friend aware that one of the Liberal Democrat Euro MPs in his region, Mr. Chris Davies, has stated his reason for opposing the all-postal ballot? It is:

"Automatic postal voting is designed solely for those too lazy to make the effort."

Does not that reveal the Liberal Democrats' true colours?

Mr. Kaufman: One never knows what the Liberal Democrats' true colours are, because they vary from street to street. If they could get away with it, they would vary from house to house. The fact is that this Chris Davies—who was, happily, booted out of this place and found a haven in the European Parliament—has said that postal voting is for lazy voters. My constituents will be told, whether they get the pilot scheme or not, that the Liberal Democrats believe that if they want postal votes they are lazy voters. But let me tell the House something else. If the pilot scheme goes ahead in the north-west, the Liberal Democrats—certainly those in Manchester—will claim that they fought for it all along and really wanted it. They will tell everyone what a marvellous privilege it is for the voters to get what the Liberal Democrats have been seeking to get for them.

The hon. Member for Surrey Heath (Mr. Hawkins) talked about fraud. We in the Gorton constituency are well accustomed to what fraud is. We are well accustomed to the Liberal Democrats claiming that they got £120,000 for the Anson Cabin project, when in fact I got it with the assistance of my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister. In Gorton, we are accustomed to lies, cheating, hypocrisy and misrepresentation at that level, from that rabble. As I have said, if we prevail tonight and get the pilot scheme, the Liberal Democrats will say that they wanted it, that they love it and that it is the best possible way of proceeding in our local and European elections on 10 June.

Mr. David Borrow (South Ribble) (Lab): Does my right hon. Friend agree that my constituents will find it difficult to understand why money should be invested in running a postal ballot for the referendum on a regional parliament in the autumn of this year, if a similar investment cannot be made in June for the European elections? It would seem sensible to my constituents that one lot of investment should be used for two elections.

Mr. Kaufman: My hon. Friend is absolutely right.

Let us be clear about this. What we are seeing from the two Opposition parties is not a consistent, honourable approach to elections. They want as few people as possible to vote, because the only way that they win council elections is on very low polls.

Mr. Osborne: Will the right hon. Gentleman confirm that the Conservative MPs in the north-west—and probably the Liberal Democrat MPs as well—had the highest turnouts in their constituencies at the general election, and that the Labour MPs had the lowest? The hon. Member for Liverpool, Riverside (Mrs. Ellman) had the lowest in the country. I dare say that the turnout in Gorton was pretty low, too.

Mr. Kaufman: But it is quality. When I was first elected to the House of Commons in 1970, the Conservatives got 10,000 votes from an electorate of 43,000. In 2001, they got 2,700 votes from an electorate of 67,000. In the local elections in Manchester, the Conservatives are hard put to it in my six wards to get into four figures. They are afraid, just as the Liberal Democrats are afraid, that they will be found out if people get the opportunity to vote in large numbers. Well, they are being found out tonight.

I recommend that my right hon. and hon. Friends insist on this. I quite understand why my right hon. Friend the Deputy Prime Minister believes that Yorkshire and Humberside should be included and I say this to the hon. Member for Surrey Heath: if he believes that there are huge opportunities for fraud in these postal ballots, he should not be saying that we can have two rather than four. He should be saying that there should be none, but he dare not say that. I will acquit him of inconsistency in one matter—namely, he possibly believes what he is saying. I do not give that to the other party.

Mr. David Heath (Somerton and Frome) (LD): One of the misfortunes of these occasions is that it is almost impossible to put any new arguments on such matters once they have been debated at length in the House and in another place. We have heard no new arguments from the right hon. Member for Manchester, Gorton (Mr. Kaufman), who seems to have taken a bitter pill before arriving in the Chamber. He showed no evidence whatever of having read the Electoral Commission's report before commenting on it, which is a cause of great sadness.

Mr. Kaufman: On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. You will be aware, as will the hon. Member for Tiverton and Honiton (Mrs. Browning), that I am a member of the Speaker's Committee on the Electoral Commission. The Electoral Commission sends me all its documents for careful perusal.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Alan Haselhurst): The right hon. Gentleman is experienced enough to know that that is not point of order and, equally, experienced enough to know that he has got it on the record.

Mr. Heath: As I said, there is no evidence that the right hon. Gentleman has read the Electoral Commission's report, which is perhaps worth repeating. Let me get away from that to say that I welcome the Government's move in incorporating at least some of the changes recommended in another place in terms of declaration of identity. That is helpful. It means that we do not have two different systems applying in terms of postal votes, whether in respect of these pilots or every other election happening on the same day, at the same time and in the same way. That seems to me to be sensible, up to the point where we have the improvement recommended by the Electoral Commission, which I wholeheartedly support and which involves a pre-signature system.

Mr. Watts: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Leslie rose—

Mr. Heath: I shall give way to the Minister in a moment. The pre-signature system will provide for better voter identification, but it clearly cannot be in place for these elections. We hope, however, that it will be for future elections.

Mr. Leslie: The hon. Gentleman has acknowledged that the Government are reluctantly conceding on the declaration of identity, but will he also acknowledge that we are conceding that—something he has been pressing for—in the face of the advice from the Electoral

[Mr. Leslie]

Commission? Does he think it right that we can take advice from the Electoral Commission but perhaps not necessarily act on every single piece of advice from it?

Mr. Heath: The Minister has the difficulty of arguing two contrary positions—apparently accepting what he says is the Electoral Commission's advice on the one hand while, on the other, rejecting it entirely.

I take what is, I hope, a more pragmatic and sensible view: I agree with the Electoral Commission's intention, which is clearly stated in its important document as to where it wants to get to. We do not think that we are there yet; the Minister knows perfectly well that we are not there yet. We have a holding position until the next election, when, I hope, we will have a proper system for pre-registration of voters, which will eliminate the potential for fraud in that area without our having the rather cumbersome system that none of us wants.

Mr. Watts: The hon. Gentleman seems concerned not to cause confusion among the electorate. Voters in St. Helens have already used a postal ballot. They will be asked to participate in a traditional ballot twice, then go back to a postal ballot. If that is not confusing, I do not know what is—and it is exactly what the commission's report said should be avoided.

Mr. Heath: The hon. Gentleman makes his intervention at entirely the wrong point, on a matter that I have not yet addressed. Nevertheless, I will answer his point. Exactly the same argument could just as easily be made by me, in pursuit of my constituents' interests. They had an all-postal ballot for South Somerset district council but will be prohibited by the legislation that the hon. Gentleman is supporting this evening from an all-postal ballot in the European elections.

Mr. Watts rose—

Mr. Heath: Let the hon. Gentleman listen. I have said all along that one should either have a pilot scheme that enables one to address some of the outstanding issues or a UK-wide postal ballot—in which I personally can see some merit.

The Government propose neither. They say, "We will not have a proper pilot scheme because we will not have the two regions that the commission proposed. We will poll the whole north of England. Anybody north of the Trent will have an all-postal ballot. Anybody south of the Trent will be prohibited." Where is the logic for the constituents whom many of us seek to represent?

If the Government had said they wanted a UK-wide, all-postal ballot, we would have raised exactly the same concerns about the potential for personation and fraud but at least there would have been some logic. There is no logic in the Government having a pilot scheme that is not a pilot scheme and determining a region that constitutes half the local authorities in England—saying that an all-postal ballot is not available for the other half. Neither will one be available to Scotland, despite the fact that it was the runner-up in the Electoral Commission report, or Wales. It was not even considered for south-west England because of the addition of Gibraltar—which apparently is a prohibitive factor in an all-postal ballot.

Every argument advanced by the Government has been turned on its head in the next breath—they have been arguing in two directions at once. They know that this development is in the interests of political expediency and nothing else; otherwise, they would look for a pilot scheme or a UK-wide election. After all, we are talking about a single national campaign in which half the electorate will go the polls two or three weeks before the rest of the country. They will watch the same television programmes and see the same campaign unfolding.

Mr. Michael Connarty (Falkirk, East) (Lab): The hon. Gentleman prays in aid the situation in Scotland. He obviously does not take into account the fact that electoral registration officers in Scotland said that they could not cope. Although Scotland was possibly recommended, the electoral officers were the barrier more than anything else. That was not a matter of political choice but dictated by the logistics of the exercise.

Mr. Heath: The hon. Gentleman adduces an argument which in other debates was hotly contested by his right hon. and hon. Friends, who said that that claim was absolute nonsense and that the particular returning officer who gave that indication did not represent the advice of returning officers across Scotland. They said that Scotland had come third and was entitled to the opportunity to engage in this great experiment.

Mr. Watts rose—

Mr. Heath: I have already given way to the hon. Gentleman. The Government plucked two English regions out of the air—

Mr. Leslie: Not out of the air.

Mr. Heath: They were not positively recommended by the Electoral Commission. I accept that they were listed as having potential, which was not realised. I have potential to open the batting for England, which has not been realised yet and is unlikely to be realised in the immediate future. Nevertheless, the Government have chosen to take that line.

There were arguments of the Government's own devising for not including those regions in the pilot scheme: the number of local authority elections on that day, the complexity of the region, and the potential difficulties—they are no more than potential difficulties—of fraud. The hon. Member for Denton and Reddish (Andrew Bennett) made the point that the potential for fraud is diluted because it is such a large area. Of course, he is absolutely right in terms of the European parliamentary elections. At the same time, however, every single person voting in European parliamentary elections also votes in wards in local authority elections. That is where the potential mischief applies and where we must tread carefully if we are to maintain the integrity of the voting system.

8.15 pm

I believe that the Government have made an important concession this evening, and it is the first of two concessions that they will make before the end of this week—[Interruption.] I hear the comment from the Labour Benches that that is not so. We shall see. I believe that they will be forced to recognise that the Electoral Commission's advice on determining what areas should be available is not to be swept aside for political convenience, and not to be arbitrarily ignored. I believe that we will come to a satisfactory conclusion. We are only halfway there this evening. I suspect that we will conclude the business when this matter has been debated one more time in another place, and we shall all return believing that we have done a good job in improving this legislation.

Mr. Andrew Miller (Ellesmere Port and Neston) (Lab): I will be brief, as I understand that other Members wish to speak.

I want to develop the point that was first raised by my right hon. Friend the Member for Manchester, Gorton (Mr. Kaufman). Undoubtedly, there is a contradiction in the position being adopted by the collective Opposition. On the one hand, it is all right to overturn the advice of the Electoral Commission on the issue of signatures, but on the other, it is not all right on the issue of postal votes. The only aspect of my right hon. Friend's contribution with which I disagreed was that he minced his words so much in his criticism of the Opposition, and particularly of the way in which the Liberal Democrats have two stances. That was revealed in response to the intervention of my hon. Friend the Member for Cleethorpes (Shona McIsaac) in which she referred to quotes from a Member of the European Parliament, Mr. Chris Davies, who purports to represent my constituency, too. That particular individual argues against postal ballots on the basis that it is a provision for lazy voters—he does not consider elderly people, shift workers, including many of my constituents, elderly people, people with families and so on.

Ms Dari Taylor (Stockton, South) (Lab): Does my hon. Friend accept that the reason why the Opposition parties welcome the fact that the other place has thought that the north-west and Yorkshire and Humber should not be included in the pilots is that the high turnout will mean that Labour votes are expressed and recorded, and Labour local authorities and Labour Governments elected? That is manipulation coming directly from the other place.

Mr. Miller: My hon. Friend makes a point a behalf of her constituents, whom she represents extremely well.

I want to return to my point about the quotes from that Member of the European Parliament. At least he has some legitimacy, albeit under the bizarre list system, in my constituency. Unlike those at the other end of the Corridor, I was elected to represent Ellesmere Port and Neston. I suppose Chris Davies has some legitimacy in that respect as an MEP, but not a single vote is cast for anyone at the other end of the Corridor. Yet I understand that, by a vote of 174 to 130 dominated by the hereditaries, the will of this House—the will of the people who sent me here to represent Ellesmere Port and Neston—has been overturned.

Mr. Watts: Does my hon. Friend agree that what is missing from the debate is the issue of what the voters want? It has been shown that when a postal vote is held, double the number of people—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. Gentleman should be addressing the Chair, not his hon. Friend.

Mr. Watts: I apologise, Mr. Deputy Speaker. Is my hon. Friend aware that the turnout is doubled when a postal vote takes place? When a Liberal Democrat Member says that this is about lazy voters, he is actually accusing half the voters of being lazy.

Mr. Miller: My hon. Friend makes his point eloquently. His constituency has been subject to one of the pilots, as has Chorley in the north-west. I have examined the statistics carefully, because I am interested in alternative ways of voting. I have investigated other systems such as electronic voting. Although that system benefited the Conservative party in Vale Royal, I am in favour of it. I think it would be very short-sighted of us not to look for new opportunities to enfranchise people in all our communities.

Mr. Cash: The hon. Gentleman mentioned the remarkable result in Chorley, where a postal ballot system increased the turnout from 31 per cent. in 1998 to 61 per cent. How does he explain the fact that the turnout dropped by 0.4 per cent. in Greenwich and by 3 per cent. in Hackney under the same system?

Mr. Miller: I think there are special circumstances that we should examine in all the pilots we undertake, but I also think the Greenwich pilot was far too small for us to make any statistical sense out of the data. I should be happy to debate the point with the hon. Gentleman elsewhere.

My constituents in the north-west undoubtedly want more opportunities to vote. People who work difficult shifts in the chemical and vehicle-building industries in particular often find that that they must either rush to the ballot box after a 12-hour shift or miss their opportunities. Tremendous strides have been made in the recent past in removing some of the constraints preventing people from having postal ballots. I think we should agree, in the interests of those people and the other sections of society that I mentioned earlier, that it is utterly irresponsible of the Lords not to allow the will of the people of my constituency and of this House to prevail.

Mr. Cash: One of the biggest problems involved in the whole question of postal voting is the background to the reasons why people want the turnout to increase. According to a recent opinion poll connected with the approaching European elections, it was stated that no more than 19 per cent. of the people of this country would participate. We know that in the last European elections the turnout was only 24 per cent., and I believe that in one part of the north-west—Liverpool, I think—it was only 9 per cent.

[Mr. Cash]

There is a serious problem. This is a democratic question, and it is also about whether or not politics and politicians in general inspire confidence. We have discovered that, as a result of what has happened in the last few years, confidence in the electoral system has fallen further and further. Indeed, the average turnout in general elections between 1945 and 1997 was approximately 73 per cent., but between 1997 and 2001 there was an astonishing drop of 12 per cent. People in this country certainly need to take account of the fact that this is not just a question of the technicalities that can be applied by increasing the number of people who vote by post. There is a much deeper crisis about our democracy as a whole, which is clearly demonstrated by the figures that I gave for the period 1997 to 2001. It is clear that it is directly connected to the atmosphere of dishonesty, to which the Government have contributed by the way in which they have gone about what they have done.

Andrew Bennett: Will the hon. Gentleman go back over those figures and relate them to how close the public perceived the election to be? Turnout almost every time went up when people thought that it was going to be a close contest.

Mr. Cash: I am not against the idea of postal votes. That is something on which we ought to agree on both sides of the House; I am sure we do. I am speaking for myself here. I am deeply encouraged by the fact that in Chorley, as I said, there was an increase in turnout from 31 per cent. in 1998 to 61 per cent. in 2002. That cannot be anything but a good thing because it is people participating in the democratic process, but the problem is that that is not mirrored throughout the country.

I have to take the point that the hon. Member for Somerton and Frome (Mr. Heath) made, which is simple but none the less valid. We are going to have elections that will affect the outcome in the European Parliament and thereby, because of the power of co-decision, have a vast impact not only on this House but on our electorate, because the power of co-decision is a power equivalent to that of voting in the Council of Ministers. Therefore, we should be taking the matter extremely seriously, and I am sure we are. The point that the hon. Gentleman made that there should be consistency throughout the country is important. In the areas that are disputed in the amendment and in the northern part of the country in broad terms, why should a system be put in place that differentiates sharply from the position in the south? I am afraid that I cannot—

Several hon. Members rose—

Mr. Cash: I will certainly give way. I cannot conceive of any reason for that. I am happy to give way to the hon. Member for Cleethorpes (Shona McIsaac), not the right hon. Member for Manchester, Gorton (Mr. Kaufman).

Shona McIsaac: Does not the hon. Gentleman acknowledge that, in the Yorkshire and Humber region, there is to be a referendum in October that returning officers are preparing for? Many parts of that region had postal vote elections last year. To go back to the traditional way of voting in June will be a backward step, because the majority of people who have had postal votes already assume that they can vote in that way in June. In fact, his own party in my area is already promoting that fact on its website.

Mr. Cash: That is a perfectly fair debating point. I think that we should be taking the whole question—

Shona McIsaac: Answer.

Mr. Cash: Wait a minute. I am not saying that I necessarily agree with that point but it is a perfectly fair point to make. What I am saying is that we should be taking the matter extremely seriously. This may be a truncated debate and our time may run out—my time in particular may run out very soon—but in terms of what is at stake this is a central question for the future of democracy in this country. We had better get this right.

The Deputy Prime Minister was ranting on and asking for the evidence, so I quoted the Alden committee report, which is really very instructive. The Labour council had the good sense to appoint a Conservative city councillor whom they greatly trusted to lead the investigation. The Birmingham Post quoted John Alden as saying that until he had completed his investigation, he had not realised how serious the perversion of democracy had become. That is in relation to postal voting, personation and intimidation at polling stations in Birmingham.

Mr. Watts: Is the hon. Gentleman aware that what he is referring to is in relation not to all-postal voting but to traditional voting? He seems to be advocating doing away with all postal voting in any circumstances.

Mr. Cash: I am not advocating that. The hon. Gentleman heard me just now saying that I could see advantages in postal voting systems, provided that they are free of the perversion of democracy that John Alden identified. I am glad to see the Minister nodding at that. We have been round this track before, and I feel strongly about the need to ensure that we have a proper voting system. The more people who participate, the better. Indeed, the issue of the European elections will become increasingly important because, to my great concern, more and more power in law making is being transferred upwards, in what I believe is an undemocratic way. If we are to have a European Parliament, let us for heaven's sake have a system that cannot be perverted as in the case identified in the Alden committee report.

The Electoral Commission recommended that all-postal voting should become the norm for local elections, but there are concerns about ballot security. It said that investigations into previous postal voting had been both piecemeal and inadequate. What reliable evidence there is suggests that the scope for abuse is wider than the Government might care to admit.

In addition to the problem of fraud, there are concerns about voter confidentiality—

It being one hour after the commencement of proceedings, MR. DEPUTY SPEAKER put forthwith the Question already proposed from the Chair, pursuant to Order [8 March].

Question agreed to.

MR. DEPUTY SPEAKER then proceeded to put the Question necessary to dispose of the business to be concluded at that hour.

Question put, That amendment (a) in lieu of Commons Amendment No. 1A, be made:—

Nuclear Global Threat

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. Kemp.]

9 pm

Llew Smith (Blaenau Gwent) (Lab): The Government's opposition to weapons of mass destruction was given as the reason for going to war with Iraq. Those weapons did not exist in Iraq, but they exist in Israel, and not only does Israel have weapons of mass destruction; it has the ultimate weapon of mass destruction—nuclear weapons. Indeed, it has 200 nuclear warheads. However, there is no talk, and quite rightly so, of any kind of war with Israel, partly, one would have thought, because of its weapons of mass destruction, partly because it daily invades its neighbour, Palestine, and partly because it daily treats UN resolutions with contempt. Obviously, our Government are selective in their opposition to weapons of mass destruction: they are okay as far as Israel is concerned, but they are certainly not okay as far as Iraq is concerned.

The threat of weapons of mass destruction, and in particular of atomic and nuclear weapons, has been with us since 1945, and the bombing of Hiroshima and Nagasaki, the tragedy that went with that and the tragedy that followed it, with the deaths of hundreds of thousands of Japanese civilians and, probably, a similar number of injuries. On some of the anniversaries of those bombings a message has come from the Japanese people: "Step back and learn from us." Sadly, we have failed to act on that message, which the Japanese people wanted to be not only heard but acted on.

Sadly, too, the Government are refusing to support some of the peacemakers, the people who have had the good sense and the courage to warn of nuclear proliferation and its threat to this planet. In particular I think of Mordechai Vanunu, who for the past 18 years has been rotting away in an Israeli jail. His crime, if crime is the right word, and it certainly is not, was telling the truth about Israel's nuclear capability when all around him were lying.

We are also selective in our opposition to weapons of mass destruction, and in particular nuclear weapons, when we consider our own position. I am not saying that the Secretary of State of Defence has learned to love nuclear weapons, but he has accepted the need to use them in certain circumstances. I remember him saying a while back:

> "The United Kingdom would, in the right conditions, in extreme circumstances of self-defence, be prepared to use nuclear weapons."—[Official Report, 10 April 2002; Vol. 383, c. 30W.]

For me, there are no conditions and no circumstances that would justify the use of nuclear weapons. Pressing that button would, for a number of reasons, be the ultimate act of madness.

Nuclear weapons are madness because they are a total waste of money. Trident alone has cost the United Kingdom in the region of £15 billion, and the annual cost of operating those weapons is in the region of £280 million. It is madness to use that money on such a weapon when it could be spent for far more socially useful purposes, such as providing some of the services that for many years people took for granted. If we stopped spending money on nuclear warheads, we could, for example, use it to return to the old socialist principle of free higher education or, indeed, provide more decent pensions for our senior citizens—the list of uses is endless.

Our nuclear industry involves another financial cost. On 2 July 2002, the Department of Trade and Industry announced that the clean-up liability for the civil nuclear industry was about £48 billion, and rising. The Ministry of Defence has not revealed the equivalent figure for the military today, but hopefully the Under-Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs, my hon. Friend the Member for Harlow (Mr. Rammell), will provide the House with such information when he replies to our debate.

There is one cost that I would welcome, but which the Government have failed to meet—proper compensation for the atomic veterans and their families for the suffering caused by events many years ago. It is estimated that the United States spent $3 trillion between 1940 and 1995 on a possible nuclear war. Annually, it spends $27 billion on preparations for such a war. Those figures do not include the costs of environmental clean-ups.

Another act of madness is the waste of skills, talents and creativity in the design and production of nuclear weapons. Imagine what could be achieved if we transferred those skills from military to civilian use. How much more dignified life could be for many more people. The greatest act of madness is the fact that nuclear weapons would kill not only our so-called enemy but our supporters. Ironically, they would kill the people who designed and produced them. Not only would they kill the enemy, our own people and the people who designed and produced those weapons of war but they would kill civilisation as we know it. They would literally cost us the earth.

That is not just my opinion, but the opinion of many eminent statespeople. Many years ago, the former US President Jimmy Carter argued:

"In an all-out nuclear war, more destructive power than in all of World War II would be unleashed every second during the long afternoon it would take for all the missiles and bombs to fall.

A World War II every second—more people killed in the first few hours than all the wars of history put together. The survivors, if any, would live in despair amid the poisoned ruins of a civilisation that had committed suicide."

Khrushchev expressed similar sentiments, when he said that after a nuclear war

"the survivors would envy the dead".

President Carter made his statement more than 20 years ago, and our capacity to destroy our beautiful planet has increased dramatically in the intervening period. No individual or Government has the moral right to agree to the use of nuclear weapons. We have no moral right to take away from our children the opportunity to experience the many beautiful things on our planet. We have no right to take away from them the opportunity to avoid the mistakes of our generation or to achieve something good with their lives. But that is what we would be doing if we ever agreed, as the Secretary of State for Defence has agreed, to use nuclear weapons in certain circumstances.

The use of nuclear weapons would be not just an act of madness, but an act of hypocrisy. We cannot tell other states that they should not produce nuclear weapons or that they should abandon the nuclear weapons that they have if we continue to go down the nuclear road. It has been estimated that 128,000 nuclear warheads have been built worldwide since 1945, 70,000 of them in the United States. Our continued nuclear role is not only an act of madness and hypocrisy, but in my opinion and in the opinion of many lawyers it is illegal. We are signatories to the non-proliferation treaty, yet we daily breach the laws enshrined in that treaty.

While we continue to have nuclear weapons of mass destruction, we are clearly in breach of article VI of the treaty, which calls for each party to the treaty to enter into negotiations at an early date in good faith to achieve nuclear disarmament. That is not happening. Article I forbids any country that has signed up to the NPT, including countries that possess nuclear weapons, to collaborate directly or indirectly with any other country on nuclear weapons. It is obvious that Trident breaks this article. We breach article VI because, as the Secretary of State for Defence admitted,

"Negotiations to implement Article VI have not yet commenced and are not scheduled."—[Official Report, 26 February 2004; Vol. 418, c. 498W.]

Because Trident represents a significant increase in our capability, it is in breach of article VI as a serious act of proliferation. Even if the number of warheads is kept similar to the number deployed on Polaris, the qualitative difference in targeting capacity and accuracy of the missile system makes it a much more potent weapon. On 16 June 2002 an Atomic Weapons Establishment spokesperson at Aldermaston told The Observer that "it had to maintain the capability to design a successor" to Trident. Once again, that breaks articles of the non-proliferation treaty.

The UK is in breach of article I of the NPT, which states:

"Each nuclear-weapon State Party to the Treaty undertakes not to transfer to any recipient whatsoever nuclear weapons or other nuclear explosive devices or control over such weapons or explosive devices directly, or indirectly".

The Trident nuclear WMD system was bought from the USA and its warheads were tested in the USA, which provides targeting technology and command and control support. By any judgment that is indirect support. I would argue that it is direct support.

What is particularly disgraceful about the continued military co-operation between the United States and the UK, which neither Tory nor, apparently, new Labour Administrations can grasp, is that these countries are two of the three depository states for the NPT. In effect, the treaty is held in trust by them. How do they show their respect? By breaking the very first article of the treaty.

The bilateral US/UK mutual defence agreement on atomic energy matters dating from 1958, which facilitates this co-operation, comes up for renewal later this year. It should be cancelled as an international gesture of good faith. Until decision makers and law makers in the nuclear armed powers recognise that the US and the UK in particular have obligations as part of the NPT bargain, no amount of lecturing other states how to behave in the face of nuclear proliferation temptations will have any credibility. If we continue to ignore the NPT or to break its articles, the greater will be the global threat of nuclear weapons.

[Llew Smith]

The policy of successive Governments, Tory and Labour, is that we simultaneously support both our non-proliferation treaty commitments to nuclear disarmament and our need to retain nuclear weapons of mass destruction to protect our national security. Some might perceive a significant internal inconsistency in those policy positions—indeed, some might consider them to be in direct contradiction. That is in stark contrast with a decision that was taken at a Labour party conference in the early 1990s that we, as a future Labour Government, would, among other things, scrap Trident.

In 1985, the UN Secretary-General, opening a review conference on the non-proliferation treaty stated:

"The most safe, sure and swift way to deal with the threat of nuclear arms is to do away with them in every regard. This should be our vision of the future. No more testing. No more production. No more sales or transfers. Reduction and destruction of all nuclear weapons and the means to make them should be humanity's common cause."

Sadly, almost 20 years later they are more of a threat than they were when those words were first spoken.

In my opinion, nuclear weapons will continue to be a threat to global security if we continue to ignore our obligations under the non-proliferation treaty. My hopes, and those of many other people committed not only to the anti-nuclear cause, but to world peace, are embodied in the NPT. If this Government and the Government of the United States continue to treat that treaty with contempt, the hopes of world peace and of avoiding nuclear catastrophe will be sorely diminished.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs (Mr. Bill Rammell): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Blaenau Gwent (Llew Smith) on giving us the opportunity to air these exceedingly important issues. In the time available to me, I hope not only to respond to several of the points that he raised, but to set out the Government's overall position on the possession of nuclear weapons and on nuclear proliferation. I hope to rebut some of the very serious accusations that he made.

The Government's policy on nuclear weapons remains that which was set out in the 1998 strategic defence review and the 2003 defence White Paper. We are explicitly committed to working towards a safer world in which there is no requirement for nuclear weapons and where we continue to play a full role in international efforts to strengthen arms control and to prevent the proliferation of hugely critical chemical, biological and nuclear weapons.

However, because of the continuing risk from the proliferation of nuclear weapons—which I genuinely believe to be one of the most serious threats that we face in the modern world—and the certainty that a number of countries will retain substantial nuclear arsenals, our minimum nuclear deterrent capability, which is currently represented by Trident, is likely to remain a necessary element of our security. We nevertheless continue to support multilateral negotiations towards mutual, balanced and verifiable reductions in nuclear weapons worldwide. When we are satisfied that sufficient progress has been made to allow us to include British nuclear weapons in any negotiations without endangering our security interests, we shall most certainly do so.

Let me deal with the key arguments that my hon. Friend advanced in respect of our progress in meeting article VI of the non-proliferation treaty. We remain fully committed to all aspects of the NPT regime, including global and verifiable nuclear disarmament. In contrast to my hon. Friend's comments, we have an excellent record on fulfilling our NPT obligations on nuclear disarmament. Looking at the issue objectively across the world, we are justly recognised as the most forward leaning of the nuclear weapons states—although one would not have believed that in listening to my hon. Friend.

It is worthwhile setting out in some detail what we have done to meet the provisions of the article.

First, we withdrew and dismantled the RAF's freefall nuclear bomb, so that Trident is now our only nuclear weapons system.

Secondly, we dismantled the UK's last Chevaline warhead in 2002, demonstrating our commitment to irreversibility in reductions in the UK's nuclear weapons.

Thirdly, we reduced our operationally available stockpile to fewer than 200 warheads—that is a reduction of more than 70 per cent since the end of the cold war in the potential explosive power of our nuclear forces.

Fourthly, we have reduced the readiness of our nuclear forces so that only a single Trident submarine is now on deterrent patrol, carrying 48 warheads. The submarine on patrol is normally on several days' notice to fire, and its missiles are de-targeted. I believe that all of those are significant de-escalatory measures.

Fifthly, we signed and ratified the comprehensive nuclear test ban treaty and continue to promote its early entry into force. Sixthly, we have placed fissile material no longer required for defence purposes under international safeguards. We have also continued to press for negotiations to begin at the conference on disarmament in Geneva on a fissile material cut-off treaty. Indeed, we stopped the production of fissile material for nuclear weapons and other nuclear explosive devices some time ago.

Finally, in respect of these specific measures under the NPT regime, we signed and ratified the relevant protocols to both the treaty of Rarotonga, in relation to the south Pacific nuclear weapons-free zone, and the treaty of Pelindaba, in relation to the African nuclear weapons-free zone. All those actions have been undertaken since 1997 as a result of the commitment of this Government.

Llew Smith: The Minister has cited many reasons and many weapons to prove that we are supporting article VI of the NPT. He has not yet mentioned Trident, or told the House how that fits in with the NPT. While I am on my feet, will he tell us whether, in certain circumstances and under certain conditions, he would be willing to press the nuclear button?

Mr. Rammell: I am going to discuss the issue of Trident explicitly in a moment. Before I do so, I want to emphasise that all the measures that I have outlined are significant steps that this Labour Government have taken since 1997, in accordance with our NPT obligations.

My hon. Friend questioned the legality of our possession of nuclear weapons, but it is very clear, in terms of the view of the International Court of Justice on this issue, that our nuclear weapons possession and capability is in accordance with international law. It is important to make that point very clearly. He also referred to the views of my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Defence, and it is important to put in context what my right hon. Friend said. He made it very clear that the circumstances in which any use of nuclear weapons might have to be contemplated would be extremely remote, and that we would use them only in extreme circumstances of self-defence and in accordance with our obligations under international law. That is a very different slant from the one that my hon. Friend put on that proposition.

The UK continues to play a full part in the NPT review process. Indeed, we played a key role in achieving international agreement to the final document that was produced at the last NPT review conference in 2000. We have made considerable progress on the 13 steps set out in that final document. At the second session of the preparatory committee for the 2005 review conference, which was held in Geneva in April and May last year, we issued a working paper on our research into methodologies for the verification of nuclear disarmament. That is a cause that we intend to continue to pursue.

Let me now turn to whether the possession of Trident is consistent with the spirit of article I. I would certainly contend that we are not in breach of article I. The Government have repeatedly made it clear that the UK nuclear deterrent is, and always has been, independent. The UK's nuclear weapons cannot be part of a US system, as the transfer by a nuclear weapon state of nuclear weapons or other nuclear explosive devices, or control over such weapons or explosive devices, is prohibited under article I of the NPT. We have, of course, purchased from the US Trident missile bodies on which we mount our nuclear warheads, which are manufactured at the Atomic Weapons Establishment. Those missiles are carried on UK-built Vanguard class submarines. Decisions on whether to replace Trident are not needed during this Parliament, but are likely to be required in the next one. We will therefore continue to take appropriate steps to ensure that the range of options for maintaining a nuclear deterrent capability is kept open until that decision point.

My hon. Friend made a number of points about Israel and the middle east. It is undoubtedly the case that a peaceful and secure middle east is a critical and continuing goal of this Government's foreign policy. We are strong advocates of a middle east WMD-free zone, which we believe to be an important part of any solution to the conflict there.

We support the principle generally of the establishment of such nuclear weapons-free zones. Indeed, we have already signed in conjunction with the other nuclear weapons states recognised under the NPT protocols to four such agreements covering Latin America, the south Pacific, Africa and Antarctica. In that context, we therefore continue to support the proposal for a middle east nuclear weapons free-zone. Indeed, since it was formulated in United Nations Security Council resolution 687 in 1991, the UK has supported the wider idea of a middle east free of all weapons of mass destruction. I genuinely believe that working towards that objective can only contribute to the prospects for a wider settlement of the region's problems.

Llew Smith: Will the Minister now answer the question whether, under the extreme circumstances referred to by the Secretary of State for Defence, he too would be willing to press the nuclear button?

Mr. Rammell: I set out very clearly the position on our possession and use of nuclear weapons: they would be used only in extreme circumstances of self-defence. That point is very clear.

Let me return to the issue of the middle east. My hon. Friend made a number of comments on the situation in Israel. We have made it clear that we want Israel to sign up to the NPT as a non-nuclear state and we will continue to argue that point. It is also important that, in any debate on nuclear weapons and the dangers that we face, we also consider the considerable dangers that we face from the proliferation of nuclear weapons materials across the world. I said earlier that that is one of the most significant threats that we face in the modern world. We have to ensure that we are vigilant about and focused on it. That is why, for example, we have committed ourselves to the global partnership.

In June 2002, the Prime Minister made a commitment of up to £400 million over 10 years to tackle the weapons legacy of the former Soviet Union—a significant step forward. Those activities are aimed directly at reducing the proliferation risks posed by that weapons legacy. As the Foreign Secretary said in his written statement of 25 February, it is intended that that work should be expanded to include other states such as Libya and Iraq. We are undertaking a scoping study, looking at the requirements for co-operative threat reduction work in Libya. We are working alongside the United States to gauge the needs in Iraq.

It is also within that context that we consider the important proliferation security initiative, which was launched in May 2003. The UK has rightly been one of a core group of countries working to drive that initiative forward. The PSI aims to prevent trafficking in weapons of mass destruction and related technology by states and non-state actors—for example, terrorist groups or criminal networks—through increased interdiction efforts. That is hugely important.

The prospect that such weapons capability can get into the hands of terrorists who have no regard for human rights or for the effect of their actions is one of the most serious and dangerous threats that we face. We must work multilaterally to ward off the dangers that exist in that regard and it is critical that we remain focused on those issues.

I understand the concerns that my hon. Friend has raised: none of us who has lived through the cold war and the continuing dangers, threats and risks that exist with nuclear weapons can look on those issues with equanimity. The track record that I have described, our commitments under the non-proliferation regime and the significant steps that we have taken since 1997 to reduce our nuclear weapons on a multilateral and verifiable basis emphasise that we are committed to working for peace throughout the world, reducing weapons of mass destruction and protecting ourselves from such weapons. The Government are committed to those aims and will continue to take their arguments forward.

Question put and agreed to.

Adjourned accordingly at half-past Nine o'clock.

Oral Answers to Questions

NORTHERN IRELAND

The Secretary of State was asked—

Internet Child Abuse

1. Lady Hermon (North Down) (UUP): What training is provided to Police Service of Northern Ireland officers in relation to combating internet child abuse. [160816]

The Minister of State, Northern Ireland Office (Jane Kennedy): Before I answer, I should explain that my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland is in Washington for the St. Patrick's day celebrations at the White House. It has become a tradition for leading figures in the peace process from both Northern Ireland and the Republic of Ireland to vacate the island on St. Patrick's day, and today they are in America.

The Police Service of Northern Ireland's crime training department provides investigating officers, child abuse and rape inquiry detectives, and specialist detectives in the computer crime unit with the training necessary to tackle internet child abuse. It covers areas such as computer analysis and search and seizure procedures for investigative purposes.

Lady Hermon: I wish you a happy St. Patrick's day, Mr. Speaker.

I am most grateful for the Minister's useful and informative answer, but given the seriousness and scale of the problem of internet child pornography in Northern Ireland and throughout the United Kingdom, is she content that the police have the resources they need to tackle it?

Jane Kennedy: We stay in close contact with the Chief Constable to ensure that resources are available. The nature of the training is very much a matter for the Chief Constable, but I have asked officials, in the light of the concerns that the hon. Lady has expressed, to ensure that internet safety is tabled as a subject for discussion at the next meeting of the Northern Ireland child protection advisory group, at which the Education and Health Departments, the police, the probation service and the National Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Children are represented.

Mr. Seamus Mallon (Newry and Armagh) (SDLP): I, too, wish everyone a happy day, on which we remember a Welshman who came to us some years ago—I refer not to the Secretary of State but to St. Patrick.

I am sure that the Minister shares my revulsion at the increasing number of attacks on elderly people in their own homes. Does she also share my view that those who prevent the police from doing their proper routine work on the streets, and those who refuse, in a cowardly way, to take part in the administration of policing are standing in the way of apprehending those people and bringing them before the courts?

Jane Kennedy: I strongly endorse my hon. Friend's remarks. He is absolutely right to point to the difficulties that the police experience when seeking to police certain areas. The problem is not widespread, but in some areas it is difficult for them to operate normally, so it is hard for them to be effective against crime. However, internet porn crime is taken very seriously by the Police Service of Northern Ireland. By its very nature, it is impossible to say how much of a problem it has become, but it is worth noting that there were 54 recorded offences last year, and the PSNI has an admirable record, with a 46 per cent. clear-up rate.

Small Businesses

2. Mr. Henry Bellingham (North-West Norfolk) (Con): How much public funding is allocated in financial year 2003–04 for support for small businesses in Northern Ireland. [160817]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Northern Ireland (Mr. Ian Pearson): In 2003–04, some £38 million has been offered to small businesses in Northern Ireland out of a total Invest Northern Ireland economic development budget of £107 million.

Mr. Bellingham: Does the Minister agree that if the small firms sector in Northern Ireland is to prosper, it is vital that micro-businesses are given incentives to incorporate through strong fiscal advantages? Does he agree that it will be a disaster if the Chancellor takes away those fiscal advantages, and what representations will he make?

Mr. Pearson: Small businesses and micro-businesses are an important part of the Northern Ireland economy, accounting for about a third of jobs and about half the gross value added. In our regulatory impact assessments, we take account of both small and micro-businesses.

The hon. Gentleman's other comments are perhaps best left to the Chancellor.

Mrs. Iris Robinson (Strangford) (DUP): The Minister will be aware that TK-ECC has decided to pull out of my constituency, leaving 500 employees out of work. What assistance will be given to those who wish to use their enhanced redundancy payments to start up small businesses?

Mr. Pearson: I express my regret at TK-ECC's decision. Through Invest Northern Ireland and other Government agencies, we have put in place a range of measures to support the work force and offer counselling and job advice, as well as advice on setting up in business. The hon. Lady will be aware of the current "go for it" campaign, which shows signs of being a major success. We hope to start 2,500 new businesses in Northern Ireland in the current financial year, and those of her constituents who want to start up their own business will find that support is readily available.

Mr. Iain Luke (Dundee, East) (Lab): Will the Minister join me in congratulating all those who organised the Belfast "start a business" week in late January, which was part of the "go for it" campaign? Does he agree that the 8,000 inquiries received in response to that campaign are a clear sign that enterprise is alive and kicking in Northern Ireland?

Mr. Pearson: I totally agree, and I am very impressed with the enterprise and ingenuity of people and businesses in Northern Ireland. We need to build on the tremendous successes already achieved in the past five years. In that time, we have had the highest increase in employment growth of any UK region and a significant number of new business start-ups. We must build on that success and ensure that we have stable and growing employment.

Police Reserve

3. Mr. Gregory Campbell (East Londonderry) (DUP): If he will make a statement on the future of the full-time police reserve in Northern Ireland. [160818]

The Minister of State, Northern Ireland Office (Jane Kennedy): The Police Service of Northern Ireland human resource strategy, which was endorsed by the policing board, stated that from April 2005 there would be a phased run-down of the full-time reserve over an 18-month period, but that that would be "subject to no further deterioration of the security situation and the continued success of the recruitment campaign for the Police Service".

The Chief Constable will give advice to the board and to the Secretary of State later this year, and we will want to hear the board's views before final decisions are made. In the meantime, negotiations continue with the Police Federation for Northern Ireland about severance arrangements.

Mr. Campbell: The Minister will be aware of continuing concern about police reserve personnel, and of continuing concern in the wider community about the ongoing criminal activities of paramilitaries and others and about the 50:50 police recruitment policy. Is there not an opportunity for the Government to grasp the nettle and deal with those three issues, thereby restoring confidence in the wider community?

Jane Kennedy: I understand the uncertainty felt by full-time reserve members and the anxiety felt by their families, but I do not want to pre-judge the Chief Constable's security assessment and the advice that he might give to the policing board later this year.

Kevin Brennan (Cardiff, West) (Lab): Is it not important that any decisions taken on the full-time reserve are based not on political whim, but on the firm evidence of the Chief Constable's security assessment, perhaps after the heat of the marching season has died down?

Jane Kennedy: Yes, indeed. Any such decision must take into account policing resources and the security environment within which the Chief Constable operates. Again, we must be patient and wait to receive his advice later this year.

David Burnside (South Antrim) (UUP): The Minister appears to have said clearly that the full-time reserve will be retained if security requirements so demand. She will be aware of Gallaher's statement this week about a £1 million robbery of cigarettes on the border in December. A spokeswoman for Gallaher said that it had asked for reassurances from the Police Service of Northern Ireland about the safe transfer of cigarettes across the border, but that such guarantees were not given. Will the Minister ask the Chief Constable to give that guarantee and to maintain the full-time reserve?

Jane Kennedy: On the question of the full-time reserve, I reiterate that any decision will be based on the Chief Constable's security assessment. The final call on that must be based on policing needs, not political whims.

I am aware of the concerns expressed by Gallaher. In the context of organised crime in Northern Ireland, we recognise the difficulties that exist and the connections between the organised criminal networks and paramilitary organisations. Questions of resources are a matter for the Chief Constable, and we remain in close touch with him to ensure that he has the resources he needs to combat these important and serious problems.

Mr. Desmond Swayne (New Forest, West) (Con): The 114 full-time reservists of the force in Belfast, East account for more than half the policemen and women in the divisional command unit. Does the right hon. Lady agree that, given the current level of criminality, we could not even begin to contemplate dispensing with their services?

Jane Kennedy: No, I do not accept that. However, I welcome the hon. Member for New Forest, West (Mr. Swayne) to his new position on the Front Bench. I also wish the hon. Member for Cotswold (Mr. Clifton-Brown) an enjoyable period working in the usual channels, and I hope that he enjoys the job as much as I did. He made a short, but significant, contribution to the Conservative Front Bench when he occupied the position now occupied by his hon. Friend.

On the reserve, the House should consider the fact that a total of £2.1 billion has been allocated for this year and the following two years to policing in Northern Ireland. That is more than £400 per head of population per year—two and half times greater than the average in Great Britain—and a further £125 million has been made available for continued implementation of the Patten recommendations. That amounts to significant resources being committed to Northern Ireland to assist the police in dealing with the many and varied problems that they confront.

Organised Crime Taskforce

4. Mr Adrian Bailey (West Bromwich West) (Lab/Co-op): If he will make a statement on the work of the organised crime taskforce. [160820]

The Minister of State, Northern Ireland Office (Jane Kennedy): The partner agencies of the organised crime task force have had considerable success in the past 12 months against organised criminal gangs in Northern Ireland, and I pay tribute to the Police Service of Northern Ireland, Customs, the Assets Recovery Agency and other partner agencies for their ongoing effectiveness and commitment to tackle that problem.

Mr. Bailey: I thank the Minister. She will remember that there was some concern when the Assets Recovery Agency was set up that it was underfunded and understaffed. Can she assess its impact so far and give a commitment to its having sufficient resources to reach its full potential?

Jane Kennedy: My assessment is that the Assets Recovery Agency is one of the key law enforcement agencies that have recently joined the organised crime task force and that its role will prove crucial in the coming months. It has recently been granted freezing orders in two cases for assets in excess of £500,000. The agency is dealing with 20 live cases with combined assets of about £8 million. Clearly, it is having a big impact, and we expect that to increase. I will reflect carefully on my hon. Friend's point about resources. That is something that I monitor, but the resources for the agency are a matter for the Treasury.

Rev. Martin Smyth (Belfast, South) (UUP): May I support the hon. Member for West Bromwich, West (Mr. Bailey) in his probing question and urge the Minister to keep her eye on the ball? It is important that there are enough people to work with the Assets Recovery Agency to bring the money in, and we should recognise that it will be self-financing. The Treasury should be able to help fund the required policing. What are the current links with the Criminal Assets Bureau in the Republic, and what are the prospects of bringing to justice the chief godfather of them all, who keeps going from north to south?

Jane Kennedy: The hon. Gentleman would not expect me to comment in the House on an individual case, but although it can take years to dismantle an organised crime group or prosecute any key individual, we do not have to wait years to see results. Indeed, we have already seen the results stemming from the work of the Assets Recovery Agency, which is one of a number of key agencies working together. The hon. Gentleman is right to draw attention to the need to develop cross-border relationships, and he may like to know that following last year's seminar between the PSNI and Garda Siochana there is an enhanced understanding of cross-border crime of precisely the type that he mentions. That will help us to build effective joint action against those criminals who use the border to their advantage.

Mr. David Lidington (Aylesbury) (Con): May I urge the Minister to ensure, in particular, that adequate arrangements are in place for information sharing between the task force in Northern Ireland and the law and order agencies south of the border? In that way, the task force can develop links with the Garda Siochana and the Criminal Assets Bureau in the south, as those organisations follow up the belief of the Irish justice Minister Mr. McDowell that Sinn Fein-IRA derive a great deal of their income from the profits of organised crime.

Jane Kennedy: The hon. Gentleman makes a fair point. A cross-border organised crime threat assessment is being prepared and will be available in the next few months. It will be used to focus resources jointly on priority cross-border criminal gangs and crime areas. Such assessments are based on the law enforcement agencies' intelligence and information, which they pool to develop the clearest possible picture of exactly what is happening.

Direct Rule

5. Mr. Harry Barnes (North-East Derbyshire) (Lab): If he will take steps to arrange for legislative proposals for England and Wales to apply to Northern Ireland during the period of the operation of direct rule. [160821]

The Minister of State, Northern Ireland Office (Mr. John Spellar): We aim to propose legislative proposals for Northern Ireland that respond, as promptly as possible, to its needs. In some cases, that will mean applying Bills here to Northern Ireland, but in other circumstances we shall need to move separately. In all cases, we shall seek to ensure that people in Northern Ireland, and hon. Members here, have the best opportunity possible to scrutinise and comment on our proposals.

Mr. Barnes: Does my right hon. Friend remember the Disability Discrimination Act 1995? The original Bill did not apply to Northern Ireland, but the then Government, under pressure, amended it so that it did. Why cannot we do the same during periods of direct rule? For example, the Pensions Bill refers in part to Northern Ireland, but can be made to apply there only by means of an unamendable Order in Council. Why cannot applicability to Northern Ireland be written on the face of the Bill?

Mr. Spellar: First, I congratulate my hon. Friend on his long and recently terminated membership of the Select Committee on Northern Ireland Affairs, to which he made a very considerable contribution.

On the general principle that he raises, he will be aware that Northern Ireland legislation exists in many cases. If we were to specify applicability to Northern Ireland in the Pensions Bill, for example, a measure that is already very long would be even longer. That would add considerably to the pressure on parliamentary time. In addition, when the House debates legislative proposals, it often does so on the basis that the proposals and the general principles will apply to Northern Ireland as well. My hon. Friend will know that separate statutes have been passed for Northern Ireland by way of Orders in Council or regulations in respect of the disability legislation. We shall consult on new proposed legislation later this year.

Lembit Öpik (Montgomeryshire) (LD): First, may I say to the hon. Member for New Forest, West (Mr. Swayne) how surprised and delighted I am to see him commence his Northern Ireland tour of duty?

I am sure that the Minister shares my frustration at the resistance among some Northern Ireland parties to governing Northern Ireland, but is it right to run Northern Ireland by means of statutory instrument Committees that cannot amend legislation? Will he introduce a way to amend legislation so that hon. Members can hold the Government to account? At present, we have to watch Northern Ireland Ministers endlessly steamroller through all sorts of legislation that we have no opportunity to amend. We are therefore forced to make every decision on an all-or-nothing basis.

Mr. Spellar: I, too, extend my congratulations to the hon. Member for New Forest, West (Mr. Swayne). I hope that my kind comments about his predecessor, the hon. Member for Cotswold (Mr. Clifton-Brown), and his positive contribution on the Front Bench did not contribute to his transfer into the silence of the Whips Office.

It is slightly paradoxical that the Government were last week criticised for the length of time that we were spending on consulting about our legislative proposals. [Interruption.] I understand some of the frustration described by the hon. Member for Montgomeryshire (Lembit Öpik). That is why I made it clear that we must strike the right balance between the need to consult parties, organisations and individuals in Northern Ireland before bringing legislative proposals to the House, and the need for us to deal with and remedy the problems that those parties, organisations and individuals identify. [Interruption.] I understand, as does the House, that we must get that balance right. I do not think that the Government can be accused of steamrollering. [Interruption.]

Mr. Roy Beggs (East Antrim) (UUP) rose—

Mr. Speaker: Order. The noise is building up in the Chamber, which is unfair. We must be able to hear the hon. Member for East Antrim (Mr. Beggs).

Mr. Beggs: In spite of what the Minister has just said, he must agree that unamendable Orders in Council are the least acceptable way to legislate for the 1.7 million people in Northern Ireland. Will he assure us that Northern Ireland will benefit at the earliest possible date from legislation allowing us to use antisocial behaviour orders so that we can share the benefits that people in Great Britain already derive from that legislation?

Mr. Spellar: Like the hon. Gentleman and the hon. Member for Montgomeryshire (Lembit Öpik), I want many of those measures to be debated in the Assembly on motions initiated by the Executive, and there will be further talks next week to create conditions in which that will become possible. I have already consulted on antisocial behaviour orders, and, as I indicated in the House last week when we were debating the Justice (Northern Ireland) Bill, I have compressed the consultation period on the wording of the legislation so that we can get it through the House and the other place and on to the statute book by the summer. We cannot be accused of dragging our feet, and I hope that we have the full support of the parties in the House.

Politically Motivated Violence

6. Michael Fabricant (Lichfield) (Con): If she will make a statement on (a) the number of (i) punishment beatings and (ii) expulsions and (b) the level of politically motivated violence in the Province over the last six months. [160822]

The Minister of State, Northern Ireland Office (Jane Kennedy): In the last six months, there have been 172 paramilitary style attacks. There are no official figures on the number of people exiled from Northern Ireland as a result of paramilitary intimidation, as not all incidents are reported. Over the same period there were two murders, 112 shooting incidents and 39 bombing incidents.

Michael Fabricant: The House will be relieved that there has not been a widespread return to bombing, but the figures that the Minister has just announced are deeply shocking. Does she accept that the Provisional IRA perpetrated some of those events, and does she understand why so many people cannot comprehend why the Government feel that PIRA still contributes to a state of ceasefire?

Jane Kennedy: I acknowledge that there is deep concern about the involvement of the Provisional IRA in such activities. The term "punishment beating" is a misnomer; such beatings are nothing less than barbaric, paramilitary assaults designed to maim young people permanently. Although the House is full because of later business on the agenda, it should note with deep concern the 13 suicides in six weeks that recently occurred in the Ardoyne district that were attributed to the activities of paramilitary organisations. Such activities are not about justice; they are about paramilitary groups from both sides, including the Provisional IRA, maintaining power over their communities by fear. Continuing paramilitary activity, including activity by the Provisional IRA, has created the difficulties in the political process that the British and Irish Governments and the parties in Northern Ireland are working so hard to overcome.

Mr. David Lidington (Aylesbury) (Con): I wholeheartedly endorse the Minister's criticisms of the evil work of the paramilitary organisations in Ardoyne and elsewhere. The Chief Constable has said that although the IRA and the UDA claim to be on ceasefire, both organisations are responsible for roughly equivalent violence and other criminality in Northern Ireland. In view of that, the Government should stop treating those two terrorist organisations differently and consider specifying the Provisional IRA under the terms of the Terrorism Act 2000.

Jane Kennedy: The hon. Gentleman should know that we keep those matters under constant review. As I have said, the activities of the Provisional IRA are a cause for deep concern and have been much commented on, and they will feature in the forthcoming talks in Northern Ireland as we seek to find a resolution. [Interruption.] A party such as Sinn Fein that is associated with a paramilitary terrorist organisation has serious questions to answer, and it is for Sinn Fein to answer them.

Mr. Speaker: Order. Once again, the House is far too noisy.

Racial Crime

7. Mr. Ben Chapman (Wirral, South) (Lab): If he will make a statement on measures to combat racial crime in Northern Ireland. [160823]

The Minister of State, Northern Ireland Office (Mr. John Spellar): Racial crime is abhorrent, and the Government will respond robustly to it. Enforcement action by the Police Service of Northern Ireland will continue to be the key, accompanied by preventive actions in relation to issues such as education, housing, health and social policy. In addition, we plan to introduce draft legislation later this year aimed at tackling racially motivated offences.

Mr. Chapman: My right hon. Friend will be aware of the incidence of racial harassment against the Chinese community in Northern Ireland. As many as two thirds of the people in that community have been harassed or abused in one way or another. Will he join me in condemning that and in recognising that the Chinese community in Northern Ireland, as elsewhere, is hard working, committed, longstanding and contributing, and it deserves to be recognised and acknowledged as such.

Mr. Spellar: I endorse those sentiments, and I am aware of the role that my hon. Friend has played in relations with the Chinese community. He will be pleased to know that I shall address the all-party group on China next month because I know of concern in the wider Chinese community in this country about recent events in Northern Ireland. Notwithstanding that, the PSNI and many local political figures have made a major effort to show abhorrence of the events and to put a stop to them. We have made some progress on that, but I fully accept that there is more to do. I look forward to working with my hon. Friend on that.

PRIME MINISTER

The Prime Minister was asked—

Engagements

Q1. [161704] Gareth Thomas (Clwyd, West) (Lab): If he will list his official engagements for Wednesday 17 March.

The Prime Minister (Mr. Tony Blair): Before I list my engagements for the day, I am sure that the whole House will wish to join me in expressing our deep condolences to the Spanish people and the families of those who died in the terrorist attack in Madrid last Thursday. It underlines the threat that we all continue to face from terrorism in many countries, and why we must work together internationally to safeguard our people against such attacks and defeat terrorism in all its forms and wherever it rears its head.

This morning I had meetings with ministerial colleagues and others. In addition to my duties in the House, I shall have further such meetings later today.

Gareth Thomas: I am sure that the whole House would wish to be associated with my right hon. Friend's remarks about the Madrid bombings. What steps are the Government taking to combat the continuing threat of terrorism?

The Prime Minister: We have to take every measure that we can in terms of security, we all have to be vigilant and we have to realise that while there were terrorist attacks before, the present problem began with the attack on the United States on 11 September 2001. When people talk of the most recent attacks being retaliation, they should recognise that 11 September was an entirely unprovoked attack on the people of the United States of America. The truth is that these fanatics will stop at nothing in pursuit of a fanatical cause based on a perversion of the true faith of Islam. The only alternatives we have are to confront it or be defeated by it. I believe that the vast majority of people, in this country and throughout the free world, want to confront terrorism and to defeat it.

Mr. Michael Howard (Folkestone and Hythe) (Con): I join the Prime Minister in expressing the sympathy of everyone on these Benches with the Spanish people, those who were injured and the families of those who lost their lives in last week's appalling atrocity in Madrid. I also endorse the sentiments that the Prime Minister has just expressed.

Do not those events reinforce the harsh truth that Europe is not immune to attack by al-Qaeda and that, as we know from the chilling statements that that organisation has made, there are no concessions that will stop those attacks? Should not everyone now recognise that there is no such thing as an opt-out from the war on terror?

The Prime Minister: I agree with that entirely, obviously. It is worth pointing out that the countries that have been hit by that form of terrorism include Kenya, Tanzania, Indonesia, Turkey, Saudi Arabia,

Yemen, Jordan, Tunisia, Pakistan and Morocco, as well as Spain. There is no way to appease those people. They have no cause that any negotiation can take place upon. They have made that clear, as they did in the chilling statement that they put out a few days ago, in which they said:

"You love life and we love death".

Unfortunately, that is the nature of the people we are dealing with, and that is why we have to defeat them.

Mr. Howard: The Polish Prime Minister has rightly warned that revising our positions on Iraq after terrorist attacks would be to admit that the terrorists are stronger and that they are right. Does the Prime Minister share that view?

The Prime Minister: I do share that view, and I thank the Polish Prime Minister, and the Polish people, for the steadfast position that he has taken in the war against terrorism. It is worth reading the statement put out by the Abu Hafs al-Masri brigades of al-Qaeda last Thursday—I can put a copy in the Library. That statement indicates that the war on which al-Qaeda is engaged is not simply in respect of the issue of Iraq; it also mentions Afghanistan, Palestine and Kashmir. It goes on to say that it is right to kill innocent Jewish people in whatever country they happen to be, apparently for no other reason than that they are Jewish people. The statement then goes on to cite campaigns in Yemen and Pakistan.

In other words, the idea that if we were to give in over the issue of Iraq it would be an end of the matter so far as those groups are concerned is completely and hopelessly naïve. The fact is that those people will continue; it is a war on our way of life—a war on our democracy and a war on our freedom. That is why we must redouble our efforts and defeat it. The best way to do that is for the whole international community to stand firm.

Mr. Tom Clarke (Coatbridge and Chryston) (Lab): Is my right hon. Friend aware that a large number of Kurds were killed or kept in detention after a football match in Syria last Friday? As the Kurds have little confidence in the Government of Syria seeking to defend them, what steps will my right hon. Friend take to restore human rights for Kurds in Syria, as elsewhere?

The Prime Minister: I hope that we will continue to put pressure on Syria to treat fairly all people of whatever ethnic or religious background, but I think that the best thing we can do is to have a state next-door to Syria, namely Iraq, in which Kurdish people, Sunnis and Shi'as all live and work together in peace, in a stable, prosperous and democratic country. Yesterday, there was some surprise at the poll that indicated that a majority of people in Iraq were optimistic about the future. I have to say that the only thing that surprised me was that people were surprised. Iraq has swapped government by a brutal, psychopathic, murderous dictator for the possibility of Kurds and other people in Iraq living together in stability and peace. If that happens in Iraq, it is the best possible omen for the rest of the world.

Sir Menzies Campbell (North-East Fife) (LD): On behalf of my right hon. and hon. Friends, may I associate myself with the expressions of sympathy and condolence that have already been made?

Does the Prime Minister agree that, irrespective of our attitudes towards military action against Iraq, we now have a continuing moral responsibility to the people of that country, in particular with regard to security and reconstruction? Does he believe that a greater role for the United Nations will help us to implement that responsibility; and what progress is being made in New York to find a fresh UN Security Council resolution?

The Prime Minister: I do agree, first, that it is important that we stay in Iraq and that our troops stay in Iraq, working with the Iraqi people, and I thank the right hon. and learned Gentleman for the support of his party for that position, despite our differences over the war. Secondly, yes, we all agree that there should be a greater role for the United Nations. That is why we are working hard with the UN, with Special Representative Mr. Brahimi, to ensure that we get a proper and orderly handover of power to the Iraqi people, because in the end—another thing indicated in the poll yesterday—the vast majority of Iraqi people want Iraq to be run by Iraqis. That is our position as well.

Sir Menzies Campbell: May I ask the Prime Minister to turn his attention to Afghanistan, in substantial parts of which al-Qaeda now appears to have been re-established? How can we best carry on the campaign against al-Qaeda in Afghanistan and at the same time maintain our commitment to the people of Iraq? Will the right hon. Gentleman ensure that Her Majesty's Government provide sufficient financial resources for our armed forces to meet those obligations?

The Prime Minister: We will do that, but the best way to defeat that organisation—we are now looking at the situation in the context of NATO—is to ensure that in those parts of Afghanistan where the Taliban is not strong, which is the vast majority of the country, we have sufficient reconstruction teams, as they are called, working with the military of several nations to restore order in the country. That has obviously been very successful around Kabul, as well as in other places in Afghanistan. Down in the south-east of the country, where the main problem is with the Taliban, it is important that we free up as many of the American troops that are at present elsewhere in Afghanistan to fight the Taliban and al-Qaeda there.

These are all parts of the same struggle. When people ask us, for example, "Why are we in Iraq?", that is a perfectly legitimate question and I can answer it. There is another question that people should ask themselves. That is, "Why is al-Qaeda trying to get into Iraq at present?" Why is it trying to get into Afghanistan again? It is because it knows that if we manage to lift these once failed states into a state of prosperity and stability, that will be a hammer blow to its fanaticism.

Q2. [161705] Mr. Keith Bradley (Manchester, Withington) (Lab): In the light of the Government's welcome announcement of a substantial increase in the funding of science research, and the recognition by the Department of Health of the Wolfsons molecular imaging centre at Christie cancer hospital in my constituency as a world-leading clinical research facility, will my right hon. Friend consider the merits of allocating some extra money to this pioneering centre for cancer treatment, as currently only a small proportion of its budget is allocated from central Government funds?

The Prime Minister: The issue of medical research is obviously extremely important. I think that my right hon. Friend the Chancellor may have something more to say about that in a moment. I pay tribute to the Wolfsons molecular imaging centre, which is on the site of Christie hospital in my right hon. Friend's constituency. It performs a very important research task. It is important that two things happen: first, that we continue with the additional investment in cancer services in the NHS. There has been investment of more than £500 million in that in the past few years, which is making a big difference to the treatment of cancer patients. Cancer deaths have fallen by 10 per cent. over the past few years, alongside a 20 per cent. fall, or more, for cardiac deaths. Secondly, we need to invest in research for the technology and the cures of the future. I am sure that people will have heard with interest what my right hon. Friend has said.

Mr. Michael Howard (Folkestone and Hythe) (Con): Will the Prime Minister rule out further tax rises if his party wins the next election?

The Prime Minister: We will continue to run the economy in a stable way and generate money for investment in our public services. Whatever pledges we make on tax will be in our manifesto. The pledges that we have made so far on the basic and top rates of tax have, of course, been kept.

Mr. Howard: I am sorry that the Prime Minister cannot give a straight answer to a straight question. There was a time when he was very free with his promises, even if they turned out to be wholly worthless. In 1995, he said that his party had no plans to increase tax at all. Since then, we have had taxes on marriages and on mortgages. We have had taxes on petrol and on pensions; taxes on small business and large business; and taxes on those who buy a house and on those who go on holiday. Council tax is up by 70 per cent. To take just one of the right hon. Gentleman's tax rises, will he promise not to increase national insurance again—his tax on jobs and pay—if he wins the next election?

The Prime Minister: We certainly did put up national insurance, and that was to increase the investment in the NHS. The right hon. and learned Gentleman voted against it. He therefore voted against the investment in the NHS. When we are talking about tax promises, I am surprised that he has the nerve to come to the Opposition Dispatch Box. Does he remember promising not to put VAT on fuels? Does he remember promising not to double VAT? Does he not remember the tax rises under the Conservative Government all through the period when he was sitting in Government?

Yes, this Government put up national insurance to fund our NHS, but we have managed to run the economy with lower mortgages, lower inflation and lower unemployment than the Conservatives, and we have increased investment in public services. When did the Conservatives ever do that?

Mr. Howard: Let me remind the Prime Minister about some rather more recent events. Before the last election he said that people should not suppose that he would raise national insurance, but he did exactly that in the first Budget afterwards. So in return for these taxes does he agree with one of his Ministers who said last month:

"Too often a lot of money has been spent but very little seems to have been achieved"?

The Prime Minister: I will tell the right hon. and learned Gentleman exactly what has been achieved. We have just heard figures for what has been achieved from investment in the health service. Not only do we have new hospital buildings and the biggest hospital building programme since 1948, but we have 50,000 extra nurses and 14,000 extra doctors. Cancer deaths are down 10 per cent. and cardiac deaths are down over 20 per cent. There are extra operations and out-patient appointments, and lower waiting lists and waiting times. That is what the extra money has bought us, and the right hon. and learned Gentleman voted against every penny of it.

Mr. Howard: That is not what the Prime Minister's Energy Minister says—a man who was a rising star in the Government, at least until today. He said:

"In a year or so we're going to have an election in the UK"—

he is clearly well informed—

"... when people will say, 'We've paid a lot of taxes, but what has really been achieved with all that money?'"

He is spot on—people will indeed say so at the time of the next election, and if they know that Ministers think so too, why on earth should anyone disagree?

The Prime Minister: I explained what the money in health had bought, so let us look at the money for education. I am absolutely delighted that we are having this argument. Go into any primary school in this country—results are up by more than 50 per cent. compared with when the right hon. and learned Gentleman was in office. Look at the school results on GCSEs and A-levels. Go into the schools and see the new buildings and new computers. See how many extra police officers there are in the country today. All that is in stark contrast to the position when the right hon. and learned Gentleman was in government. When he was Home Secretary he cut police numbers. When he was Employment Secretary unemployment went up; when he was Minister for Local Government he introduced the poll tax; and when his whole shower were in power we had higher inflation, higher interest rates and higher unemployment, so let us continue this argument between now and election day.

Hon. Members: More!

Q3. [161706] Martin Linton (Battersea) (Lab): While we are on the subject of education, will the Prime Minister find time in his schedule to write to the leader of Wandsworth council to ask why he has gone back on his promise to passport this year's school budget in full and is withholding more than £0.5 million intended for Wandsworth schoolchildren, yet supports his party's plans for a pupils' passport, which could take between £1 billion and £2 billion out of school budgets?

The Prime Minister: We certainly will not adopt that policy, but I must tell the House that if one studies the policy statements from the shadow Education Secretary and the chairman of the Conservative party, it is quite hard to work out what their policy is. As far as I can make out, it is for a pupils' passport that would allow people to leave the system and take that money to private schools.

Mr. Tim Yeo (South Suffolk) (Con) indicated dissent.

The Prime Minister: The hon. Gentleman says no, but the brains of the Tory party—I cannot remember his shadow position—said on the "Politics Show":

"I'm talking about using the pupil passport as a... contribution to higher fees already being charged by private schools."

I can tell my hon. Friend the Member for Battersea (Martin Linton) that if I could work out what their position was I would attack it; but in any event, we should be clear that the best way to get education not for a few but for many, and to push standards up, is to carry on with the programme of investment and reform under this Government.

Mr. Peter Luff (Mid-Worcestershire) (Con): Can I drag the Prime Minister back to reality and invite him to bang a few heads together in the Department of Health, which is threatening one of his major projects in my constituency, Jobcentre Plus, a service that I welcome? Is he aware that arbitrary and retrospective funding changes—[Interruption.]

Mr. Speaker: Order. Allow the hon. Gentleman to speak.

Mr. Luff: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Is the Prime Minister aware that arbitrary and retrospective changes to the funding rules for the Department of Health are threatening eight major health projects in Worcestershire, one of which is a one-stop shop in Droitwich that brought together Jobcentre Plus, a major new health centre, the police, the district council, the county council, the citizens advice bureau and other voluntary groups? His Government are threatening the creation of precisely the kind of joined-up government that they claim to support.

The Prime Minister: I shall certainly look into the project that the hon. Gentleman mentions. Surely he should recognise that what he is calling for is even more money in the national health service. [HON. MEMBERS: "No."] No, he is just calling for more money in his own constituency, not in anyone else's. I will look into the point that he makes, but the intelligent thing, surely, is to recognise that the investment in the national health service is yielding results. That is why it is so unfortunate that the Opposition propose to cut it.

Q4. [161707] Mr. Andy Reed (Loughborough) (Lab/Co-op): As it is national science week this week, has the Prime Minister had time to reflect on the neglect of our science research and development and technology base over the past 50 years? Is he aware that companies such as Intelligent Energy in my constituency, which has grown out of the university, are excellent examples of what can be achieved? It is a world leader in fuel cell technology and in developing its products for the developing world, with projects in South Africa already.

Will my right hon. Friend ensure that any increase in spending is evenly spread around the country so that institutions such as Loughborough university, which has a track record in innovation, delivery and collaboration with business, get their fair share, rather than being concentrated in the hands of a few universities, to ensure that the growth we have seen in our local economy continues and is a model that will be replicated across the whole of the UK?

The Prime Minister: I understand that the Department of Trade and Industry is providing over £3 million to Intelligent Energy to assist in the development of fuel cell technology at Loughborough university. The point that my hon. Friend makes is right. The UK is one of the best places in the world for biosciences. It is important that we carry on with the huge investment in science that we are making. That is why it is so unfortunate, again, that the Opposition are pledged to freeze, and therefore cut in real terms, the spending on science. Investment in science is one of the surest ways to entrench the economic stability we have for the future.

Mr. Edward Garnier (Harborough) (Con): Does the Prime Minister now regret sacking Lord Irvine last summer?

The Prime Minister: I will tell the hon. and learned Gentleman what I do not regret: I do not regret at all that we are proceeding with the proposals to make sure that the person who is in charge of our court system sits in the Department running the courts and delivering a better court system for the people of this country. The present incumbent is the first holder of that office to have his office in the building from which the courts are administered. That is why it is the right thing to do.

Q5. [161708] Mr. Ronnie Campbell (Blyth Valley) (Lab): Although it was good to see the minimum wage being increased this week, does the Prime Minister agree that anything under £5 an hour in this day and age is peanuts? I will give the Prime Minister one thing—it was his Government who introduced the minimum wage. If it had been left to the Tories or to the wishy-washy Liberals, we would not have had an agreement.

The Prime Minister: That is as close as I will get to an unqualified statement of support from my hon. Friend, and I welcome it. We have not merely extended the minimum wage to 16 and 17-year-olds, but from October 2004 the adult rate will increase to £4.85. That will help 1.8 million low-paid people. It is a huge bonus for some of the poorest families in the country. Alongside the working families tax credit and the child tax credit, it indicates how much we are doing to help hard-working families get into work, stay there and make work pay.

Q6. [161709] Mr. Simon Thomas (Ceredigion) (PC): I have a letter from a 10-year-old constituent who lives on a sheep farm at Tregaron. He writes:

"I would like to run the farm someday when I'm older and I'd like to ask if there is a future for me in farming."

Does he have a future in farming?

The Prime Minister: Of course there is a future in farming. However, it is important that we recognise that our farming industry, like other farming industries in Europe and around the world, will undergo great change. That is why when Sir Don Curry headed up our commission that looked into the future of farming he came out with recommendations that will put farming on a more sustainable basis for the future. If the hon. Gentleman's constituent grows up and talks to people who are in farming, he will find that they recognise that change has to happen, but they want the Government there working with them to make the change happen in a proper way. That is what we are doing.

Q7. [161710] Ross Cranston (Dudley, North) (Lab): I congratulate my right hon. Friend on publishing the alcohol strategy on Monday, which set out in hard evidence the social and economic costs of binge drinking in this country, but can my right hon. Friend confirm that unless some parts of the industry smarten up their act in relation to advertising and promotion, which contribute to this culture, further Government regulation is inevitable?

The Prime Minister: It is important that we work in partnership with the industry to encourage responsible drinking, and my hon. and learned Friend is entirely right in what he says on that. It is also important to recognise that as a result of legislation passed in this House the police now have considerable powers to shut down pubs or clubs where disorder as a result of excessive drinking is routine, and they also have a full range of measures, including fixed penalty notices, to deal with drunk and disorderly behaviour. Therefore we need two things: we need a more responsible attitude on the part of the industry, but we also need to make full use of the police powers that have now been introduced.

Q8. [161711] Mr. Julian Brazier (Canterbury) (Con): The Prime Minister knows that the Conservative party has solidly supported him in the war against international terrorism, but I urge him to read the report of the Defence Committee, chaired by one of his right hon. Friends. Is he really happy that, when we face this threat, we have the smallest Regular Army for more than a century, the smallest reserves for several centuries, and our logistic capability has been so emasculated that we cannot even get chemical protection and body armour, and in some cases even ammunition, to the front line?

The Prime Minister: We will respond fully to the Defence Committee's report, but it is important not to exaggerate the situation. Our armed forces have performed magnificently in extremely difficult circumstances, not just in Iraq but in other arenas in the world, and they are a huge credit to this country. As for defence spending overall, contrary to some newspaper reports, the Government are increasing defence spending in real terms. I have no doubt at all that we will continue to make a big commitment to defence, and I hope that, as the hon. Gentleman rightly says that it is important to have a cross-party consensus on these issues, he will change the position of his own Front-Bench spokesmen, which is to freeze defence spending in real terms, which would mean a cut in the amount of money going to defence.

Dr. Ashok Kumar (Middlesbrough, South and Cleveland, East) (Lab): I thank my right hon. Friend for coming to my constituency last week to open the King's academy, which is a great testament to the Government and their contribution to education. Will he join me in congratulating David Vardy and his team, who put the project together, with the local authority and the Government, to build this great monument in my constituency? What support will the Government give to ensuring that the academy excels in the same way as all the other education initiatives for which the Government are responsible?

The Prime Minister: I thank my hon. Friend for welcoming me to his constituency. The King's academy is a remarkable achievement by Mr. Vardy and his team. The city academies are just being opened now; there is a programme to roll them out across the country. They are important because they provide state education to some of the poorest and most disadvantaged communities in this country. There is nothing more inspiring, particularly when one knew the old school that the King's academy replaced, than to see the brand new buildings, the total commitment of the teachers and staff, and the pupils there eager to learn. It is one of the best examples of modern social justice that I can think of.

Q9. [161712] Mrs. Cheryl Gillan (Chesham and Amersham) (Con): Just down the road from Chequers, Chesham hospital, the Misbourne ward at Amersham hospital and the intensive care baby unit at Wycombe hospital are all threatened with closure, and the acute trust and the mental health trusts have huge deficits. Yet the Government spend 18 per cent. less on health care than the national average on every man, woman and child in Buckinghamshire. Can the Prime Minister tell me why the people of Buckinghamshire are worth 18 per cent. less?

The Prime Minister: I shall look into the precise figures that the hon. Lady uses, but according to my figures the Chiltern and South Bucks primary care trust has had over £117 million of funding for the last year. I entirely understand why she would like even more money going into her primary and secondary care services, but it is important to recognise that we are making a huge additional investment in the NHS.

I hope that people realise that there is clear choice, which was made even more manifest by what the Leader of the Opposition did earlier today, even if the hon. Lady wants more money: we are in favour of the money that we are investing continuing to go towards the national health service and delivering results to the people of this country, and the Conservative party, whatever its members like to say, opposes that investment. That is the difference between a party that is committed to maintaining, reforming, changing and renewing the national health service and one that is committed to getting rid of it.

Q10. [161713] Mr. Mark Lazarowicz (Edinburgh, North and Leith) (Lab/Co-op): My right hon. Friend knows that some of the poorest countries in the world, especially Ethiopia and Niger, are currently denied additional debt relief, effectively by the US, German and Japanese Governments, even though they are entitled to such debt relief under the agreements of the G8 countries. I am sure that he agrees that if the world community fails to live up to its promises about such matters, it will make it more difficult to tackle other issues, such as the threats from world terrorism. Will my right hon. Friend speak to the leaders of those countries and urge them to stop blocking the debt relief?

The Prime Minister: We will do all we can. My right hon. Friend the Chancellor has been leading initiatives to ensure that we get debt relief for the poorest and most highly indebted countries. I assure my hon. Friend that we will use every means possible not only to maintain a leadership position for this country, but to try to relieve the debt burden on some of the poorest people and countries in the world.

WAYS AND MEANS

Financial Statement

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Alan Haselhurst): Before I call the Chancellor of the Exchequer, it may be for the convenience of hon. Members if I remind them that, at the end of the Chancellor's speech, copies of the Budget resolutions will be available in the Vote Office.

INTRODUCTION

12.32 pm

The Chancellor of the Exchequer (Mr. Gordon Brown): The purpose of this Budget is to lock in for Great Britain the economic stability that can and will endure.

And it is a sign of the stability that Britain has already achieved and a tribute to the dynamism and hard work of the British people that, even after the creation of 1.8 million jobs since 1997—1.3 million in the private sector—and over 100,000 extra businesses, today and every working day in our country, 600 new businesses are starting up, 25,000 men and women each and every day are finding new jobs, and an additional 10,000 new vacancies are each day being advertised, with new jobs being created at three times the rate of the 1970s, 1980s and early 1990s.

For decades after 1945, Britain repeatedly relapsed into recession, moving from boom to bust. But I can report to the House that since 1997 Britain has sustained growth, not just through one economic cycle but through two economic cycles, without suffering the old British disease of stop-go. Overall growth since 2000 has in Britain been almost twice that of the euro area and higher even than that of the United States.

Indeed, in the pre-Budget report, I told the House that Britain was enjoying the longest period of sustained economic growth for more than 100 years. I have to apologise to the House. Having asked the Treasury to investigate in greater historical detail, I can now report that Britain is enjoying its longest period of sustained economic growth for more than 200 years—the longest period of sustained growth since the beginning of the industrial revolution.

And with Britain not only more stable but better off than seven years ago, it is time for us, facing new global economic challenges, to combine a new British confidence about our economic potential with a new resolve to make the right long-term decisions and reforms to achieve excellence in education, science and enterprise. No industrial national can ignore those challenges, where other nations are moving forward and in which I want Britain to lead.

Our advantages as an island nation are a global reach wider than that of almost every other country, a historical record of scientific achievement that is longer than that of almost any other country, and a foundation of political and now economic stability that goes deeper than that of almost any other country.

And this Budget's judgment is that to be a world economic leader in this new global era, we must now make the necessary investments in our science, education and enterprise.

Last year we forecast growth for 2003 of between two and two and a half per cent. When I made that forecast a year ago, the Leader of the Opposition said that it was not just incautious and wrong but—I quote—"a deliberate misrepresentation" of Britain's economic prospects, and said that not to meet it "destroyed credibility".

I can report to the country that our growth in 2003 has indeed met our forecast. The British economy grew in 2003 by 2.3 per cent.

And it is because of Bank of England independence, new fiscal rules, a symmetrical inflation target, the sanctions of the new deal, and the reduction of national debt—it is because Britain had the strength to take these long-term decisions—that, over the last four years, while economic growth in Germany has averaged less than 1 per cent., Japan 1.4 per cent., Italy 1.4 per cent., France 1.8 per cent., the euro area 1.6 per cent., the United States 2.4 per cent., growth here in Britain in these years has averaged 2.5 per cent. And it is growth combined with, consistently, the lowest inflation for 30 years, the lowest interest rates for 40 years and the highest levels of employment in our history.

In the past, Britain has been first in, worst hit and last out of world recessions. But in recent years, by contrast with the two previous world downturns in both the early '80s and the early '90s, employment, which fell by 1.3 million in the early '80s and by 1.5 million in the early '90s downturn this time has not fallen but risen, and as today's employment figures confirm, claimant-count unemployment is just 2.9 per cent., which is the lowest since November 1973, and Britain is closer to full employment today than for a generation. Inflation, which rose to 20 per cent. in the early '80s, and to almost 10 per cent. in the downturn of the early '90s, has this time averaged just 2.4 per cent. Interest rates, which peaked at 16 per cent. in the '80s and at 15 per cent. in the '90s downturn, are today 4 per cent. And mortgage rates, which rose to around 15 per cent. in both the early '80s and early '90s are 5 per cent. today, and still the lowest for 40 years.

And now having come through this world downturn and as trade strengthens—rising this year by seven and three quarters per cent. according to our forecast—the challenge for British industry is to make the most of the new opportunities of the world upturn.

We expect domestic demand to grow by three and a half per cent. this year and three and a quarter per cent. next year as consumer spending moderates and growth becomes more balanced.

And our belief is that British manufacturing and service industries will rise to the challenge. Fixed investment, which has fallen round the world, is expected to grow in Britain by more than 5 per cent. this year and more than 6 per cent. next year. Business investment is expected to grow by just under 4 per cent. this year and 6 per cent. in 2005.

Manufacturing output, which was most affected by the global slowdown, has grown in four successive quarters and is now expected to grow in Britain by just under 2 per cent. this year and over 2 per cent. next year. And imports and exports are both expected to grow by more than 5 per cent. this year.

So, overall, I can report a British economy strengthening throughout 2004.

And while always vigilant to the risks, growth in 2004 is expected to be: 1.7 per cent. in France, Germany and the euro area; around 2.8 per cent. in Japan; but between three and three and a half per cent. this year in Britain; with, of the G7 countries, Britain and America again growing the fastest.

And I can confirm that under our new inflation target, inflation is expected to be just 1.75 per cent. this year, and 2 per cent. next year and the year after.

Our long-term stability and strength depend on avoiding the two great economic mistakes of the past; so there must be no weakening of anti-inflation discipline and there must be no neglect of investment in our wealth-creating base.

And based on sound fundamentals, monetary and fiscal discipline, and making the right decisions at the right time in the cycle to invest in education, science and our enterprise—based on these sound fundamentals, I would forecast growth in Britain in 2005 to be three to three and a half per cent. and in 2006 to be two and a half to three per cent. as the economy returns to trend.

Looking forward, while vigilant to the global economic cycle, the challenge is to strengthen the British model for stability, and our objective must be to lock in that stability—not just for a year or two, or for an economic cycle, but for a generation. So a year ago, I initiated a series of studies to examine how we can tackle potential inflationary pressures in housing, and potential bottlenecks and deficiencies in the supply side of the economy; how we can deal with potential fiscal pressures from ageing, health care and the costs of unemployment; and what the most appropriate fiscal rules for the long term are.

Last week, Professor David Miles reported and recommended a more transparent and competitive market in mortgage finance, a set of recommendations that will now be considered by us and the Financial Services Authority. The report by Ms Kate Barker published today concludes that the supply of new homes consistently lags behind demand and that the number of houses built in Britain—currently 175,000 a year—must rise substantially if we are to reduce house price inflation and increase the number of affordable homes for people wishing to buy and rent.

The Government today accept the Barker recommendations for the new British real estate investment trusts that would improve the supply of rented property; for the release of more public sector land; for, in each region, one body responsible for housing and planning; and, in principle, for extending the contaminated land tax credit in brownfield areas. The Deputy Prime Minister will now consult on how we can increase the supply and affordability of housing, and what goals we should set, while striking the right balance between the economic and social case for development, and environmental and social needs.

While the business rate sets a tax on developed properties, Ms Barker's report states that there is none on the unearned increment in land values when undeveloped land is granted planning permission. Because this is a long-term issue for both the future of housing and for stability, the way forward is not only to consult widely on this proposal but to see whether a long-term consensus can be agreed. So I hope that over the next year all parties will study the Barker proposal, and it must be in the interests of the whole country to see whether we can forge a shared approach that would safeguard our environment, lead to more affordable housing, and at the same time keep interest rates as low as possible and contribute to the greater stability of Britain.

Last year we identified the housing market, housing finance and other inflexibilities in capital, product and labour markets as major barriers to meeting two of our five tests for euro membership. Today we are publishing, alongside the Budget, a detailed report on flexibilities in Britain and Europe, and I can inform the House today that while the Government do not propose that a euro assessment be initiated at the time of this Budget, the Treasury will again review progress at Budget time next year and report to the House.

Fiscal discipline is and must be at the heart of our strategy for long-term stability. While vigilant on personal debt, we have studied the three main sources of fiscal pressure in the advanced industrial economies: the costs of unemployment; pension costs in Europe, with state pensions costing, by 2050, up to 15 per cent. of national income; and the rising cost of public sector subsidy for private health care, as in the United States of America. We have concluded that it is prudent for Britain to take further steps to move the unemployed from welfare to work and reduce the costs of unemployment, and that we are right also to maintain a rising level of pension credit, rather than link pensions to earnings, and right to avoid uncapped public sector liabilities from subsidies to private health care.

I have also studied proposals for alternative approaches to the fiscal framework, and I am today publishing a paper comparing our British framework with the rules of the European Union's stability and growth pact and examining the principles, based on our experience, which should guide the evolution of fiscal policy in the future.

The conclusions of our study are that, first, the flexibility to take the right monetary and fiscal decisions at the right time to sustain stability and growth requires countries to take tough decisions to achieve low levels of long-term national debt. The second principle identified by our study is that, based on low levels of public debt, fiscal policy can and must take account of the economic cycle, supporting monetary policy by allowing borrowing to rise when the economy grows below trend, and reducing borrowing when the economy is above trend. The third principle identified by the study is that it makes sound economic sense for low debt countries such as ours to borrow for investment.

Rigidly balancing the budget year on year means that fiscal policy could not support monetary policy over the cycle and, even in low debt countries, the debt to GDP ratio would fall year on year even when it is obvious that more investment is important to the long-term strength of the economy.

Our fiscal rules—to keep the debt to GDP ratio low and stable while balancing the current budget over the economic cycle—allow us to borrow for investment every year of the cycle and these rules have been tested and have succeeded at every stage of the last two economic cycles.

So, it was in the national interest, first, to follow rules on debt and to cut debt in the late 1990s; it was in the national interest to enable fiscal policy during the recent world downturn to support monetary policy; and now and in the future, it is in the national interest, on the basis of low public debt, to borrow for investment to strengthen our economic fundamentals.

So, I will not neglect the need for long-term investment in our country and I will not impose a balanced budget rule, which would cut spending regardless of the debt level or the economic cycle. Such a policy—whether imposed by a future Government or by a rigid interpretation of the European stability and growth pact—would, in fact, be an exact replica of the mistakes of Britain's stop-go past and would put at risk Britain's stability and growth.

I welcome the support for our monetary policy framework that I have received—of late—from Opposition parties.

But the experience of the past few years is that stability requires support for both pillars of our British macro-economic framework—monetary and fiscal policy working together.

So let me set out today's detailed fiscal figures.

Our projections are based on assumptions audited by the National Audit Office which include, for public finance purposes, trend growth at 2½ per cent. rather than 2¾ per cent.; and do not take full account of the expected gains to the public finances from lower unemployment, compliance and VAT receipts.

But after all the decisions announced today, our current budget figures for 2003–04—and for the years to 2008–09—are, in billions, minus £21.3 falling to minus £11, minus £5 and zero, then rising to plus £4 and plus £9.

Our first fiscal rule is that over the cycle we balance the current budget.

Having accumulated surpluses at the start of the economic cycle, we meet our fiscal rule—the golden rule. Indeed we have an average annual surplus over the whole cycle—an overall margin or surplus of £11 billion.

I have also tested the golden rule against not just our cautious assumptions but a more cautious case and again the current budget moves back to balance by the end of the forecast period.

The average current budget for the first four years of the next cycle is not just in balance but in surplus. So having met our rule in this cycle, we are also on track to meet it in the next.

Our second rule is our sustainable investment rule, demonstrating our ability to borrow for investment.

I can report that debt this year is just 33 per cent. of national income. Our rule is that debt should be kept below 40 per cent. of national income and in future years it will be 34, 35, 36, 36 and 36 per cent. compared with debt of 44 per cent. in 1997 when we came to power. So we meet our second rule over the cycle in every year and by a margin in excess of £50 billion.

I turn therefore to net borrowing. Compared with 8 per cent. 10 years ago, and an average of 6 per cent. net borrowing over the early 1990s, net borrowing this year and in future years to 2008–09 is, as a percentage of GDP, 3.4, 2.8, 2.5, 2.1, 1.9 and 1.6 per cent. of GDP, with, for this and for future years, the cash figures £37.5 billion, £33 billion then £31 billion, £27 billion and £27 billion, falling to £23 billion.

Net borrowing adjusted for the economic cycle is just 2.4 per cent. this year and in future years 2.1, 2.3, 2.1, 1.9 and 1.6 per cent. of GDP.

A decade ago after the end of the last world recession the British deficit was the equivalent of £90 billion, around two and a half times higher than it is today.

In fact, our deficit is now lower than all our major competitors of the industrialised world. As a percentage of GDP, the deficit in 2004 is: nearly 4 per cent. in Germany and France; 6 per cent. in Japan; 5 per cent. in America; but the comparable British figure is just 2.8 per cent.

Net debt is now 45 per cent. of national income in France, in America it is 50 per cent., in Germany it is 55 per cent., in Japan it has risen to 86 per cent., in Italy it is 94 per cent., but this year in Britain it is just 34 per cent.

So with our deficits lower than our competitors, lower than in past decades, with our debt lower than our competitors and lower than in past decades, we meet both our fiscal rules.

And it is because of this that I am now able in this Budget, at one and the same time: to afford all our existing commitments, including our ongoing and additional commitments in Iraq, Afghanistan and in the fight against terrorism, amounting in total to £6 billion; to be able to set aside as a prudent margin £1 billion next year and £2 billion in future years as a reserve for annually managed expenditure; and to have in addition the flexibility and freedom in this year's Budget and in the coming spending review to release extra resources for the nation's priorities.

Unemployment is now costing us £3 billion a year less than in 1997, and debt interest payments are costing us £7 billion less than in 1997—a total of £10 billion less this year, part of the dividend from difficult decisions that we made in 1997. And stability and growth themselves have yielded even greater gains, and give us a clear Budget choice as to whether to cut taxes, invest more or cut borrowing.

So I am able in this Budget—with a strengthening economy and the strong and sustained monetary and fiscal position—to set out the Government's choice on how to allocate these extra resources.

And I have had a number of Budget representations about priorities for tax and spending.

The debate that we now have about the nation's priorities and the choices that we make will help to determine the economic strength of Britain and the fairness of our country far into the future.

And I hope that the whole House can agree that given Britain's position today and the challenges ahead, the priorities for our country are: first, not to endanger but to entrench the stability and growth that we have achieved; secondly, not to imperil but, in supporting our armed forces, police and security services, to ensure and enhance our national security; and thirdly, I believe that the whole House would also want to ensure that all our citizens are fully prepared to meet the challenges of a global economy and to ensure also that the coming generation start from a position not of weakness but of strength.

As we make our judgments for the Budget and spending review, one option—having secured in recent years the gain from cutting unemployment and cutting debt and from stability and sustained growth—would be to cut borrowing or taxes. But on borrowing, as I have told the House, both debt and deficits are lower than our major competitors, much lower than in the past and well within our fiscal rules.

And on tax, while I have raised national insurance to pay for the national health service, I have cut long-term capital gains tax for business assets from 40p to 10p, introduced a 10p starting rate for income tax, and in previous Budgets since 1997 cut the basic rates of income tax, corporation tax and small business tax.

So let me now set out the Budget's decisions on tax.

I have examined rates of corporation tax and capital gains tax. I have no need to raise them so I propose to freeze rates.

On air passenger duty, on insurance premium tax, and on vehicle excise duties for cars and lorries, I propose to freeze rates.

On the climate change levy, I will freeze rates and at the same time extend the numbers of businesses who can benefit from 80 per cent. discounts.

On the aggregates levy, I will freeze rates, and in Northern Ireland, extend the reliefs to cover all aggregates.

On betting duties, I will freeze rates, and I will review the tax treatment of betting exchanges and their clients.

On stamp duty, I will freeze stamp duty.

On inheritance tax, I will not only freeze rates but I will exempt more estates from inheritance tax, raising the starting point of tax to £263,000—95 per cent. of estates will pay no inheritance tax at all.

For this Budget's other tax decisions, my priorities are: the needs of enterprise; ensuring fairness to families and pensioners; and the environment.

My priority for enterprise at this stage of the economic cycle is to encourage rising levels of investment.

Venture capital is the seed bed of future enterprise and so for the next two years, venture capital trusts will secure tax relief for investments at a higher level—now up to £200,000 a year—and not at the lower rate of tax, 20p, but at the higher rate of 40p. From 1 April, firms with turnovers under £58,000 will not have to register for VAT, and that is the most generous VAT threshold in Europe. From 1 April, an additional 13,000 businesses will benefit from simplified VAT accounting. From next year, in 2,000 enterprise areas, we will further increase the tax incentives available for firms to invest.

The Government are determined to achieve our goal of balanced economic growth to the benefit of every region and every nation of the United Kingdom. So today, the Government are accepting and will implement the Lyons review for the relocation of civil service jobs. We will relocate out of Whitehall a total of 20,000 public sector jobs, creating new employment opportunities in the regions and nations of the United Kingdom.

And today, to further assist regions and local communities, I can announce the full details of the new local authority incentive under which local authorities that help create more local businesses will share the additional business rate income. For local councils in all parts of the country, I am able to allocate for the next three years a total of £1 billion extra—money available for local services.

In the last seven years, we have raised over £4 billion a year through the sale of surplus assets and land, and for the years until 2006 we now expect the sale of surplus assets to raise over £5 billion a year for new investment.

We will also be selling off the last of the remaining Government shareholdings in the utilities.

When we announced deregulatory measures in December, I said that we would be working with business to identify further reforms both in Britain and in Europe. The Secretary of State for Trade and Industry is announcing that she will devolve Business Link services to the regions; we will review the burden of inspection and the overlap between enforcement regimes; sector by sector, we will tackle unnecessary regulation starting with chemical, construction and retail industries; and having accepted the case for the Inland Revenue to pay the working tax credit directly to employees, we will consult now with employers on detailed implementation. And we have submitted today to the European Union our detailed proposals for tackling regulation in the European Union.

I would like to do even more to encourage new and growing businesses to invest and expand.

I can only do so if we close a loophole under which some have, without changing their economic activity, used our zero tax rate for small business not to invest and grow but simply to avoid tax and national insurance by reclassifying their income as dividends.

There are those who have proposed that to tackle this avoidance we should abolish the zero and reduced rates altogether.

Instead, I propose to retain the zero rate and also the reduced rates for retained profit, and indeed do more for investment. But I will close the loophole by taxing distributed profits at 19 per cent., bringing the tax on distributed profits for those small companies into line with other companies.

And to do more for investment, I will increase, initially for one year, investment allowances for the smallest businesses from 40 per cent. to 50 per cent.

So, overall, a small company making pre-tax profits of £25,000 and investing £10,000 in plant and machinery, which paid over £5,000 in tax in 1997, will pay £2,375 in tax—almost £3,000 less—as we maintain and improve the incentives for small company investment.

Since 1997, support for the British film industry has been worth £2 billion and the numbers of films that have been made here in Britain have doubled in that time. I now propose to transfer the available reliefs for British-made films with budgets below £15 million from the third parties, a minority of whom have abused these reliefs, and to pay reliefs directly to the filmmakers themselves. The new relief will be set at a new and higher level of 20 per cent.

It has been put to me that we should now introduce a general anti-avoidance rule. I do not at this stage intend to introduce this but I will today close loopholes in partnerships, finance leasing and VAT, and I will make it a requirement—as in the United States of America—that accountancy firms and those promoting these schemes register them with the tax authorities: the Inland Revenue.

I turn now to the environment. I am pleased to report that as a result of the incentive announced last year, the fuel industry is ready, from 1 September this year, to move to the more environmentally friendly sulphur-free fuel. This fuel will be available throughout the country by September, so I will delay for the second year running the annual rise in fuel duty for nearly six months. And while the duty rise for low-sulphur fuel will be 1.9p per litre, the duty rise for the new and soon to be standard sulphur-free fuel will be, from 1 September, just 1.4p, in line with inflation. I will also raise red diesel, fuel oil and liquid petroleum gas by 2.4p a litre. Duty for fuel oil will still be just 6.24p a litre, duty for red diesel 6.64p a litre, and duty for liquid petroleum gas 7.82p a litre.

To encourage cleaner fuels, I will give the same incentives to bioethanol from 1 January next year as I am extending to biodiesel: until at least 2007, a 20p per litre reduction in duty compared to petrol and diesel. And for the same environmental reasons I set out last year, I will go ahead with the changes that have already been announced in landfill duty. Enhanced capital allowances will also be available now for energy-efficient technologies.

From next Monday I will implement the normal annual inflation rise of 1p on a pint of beer and 4p on a bottle of wine. But I will freeze duties on cider and sparkling wine. And for small breweries, I will not only continue the successful tax relief scheme but extend it further, and double the volume of beer production that is eligible for relief.

I announced in the pre-Budget report that—owing to continued high levels of spirits duty fraud—we would legislate to implement the Roques report recommendation to stamp spirit bottles unless a workable alternative could be found. In making my decision today that stamps are necessary to tackle fraud, I will help the trade with cash flow costs and defer payment for tax stamps, and I will assist firms with their capital investment. I have also decided—for the seventh Budget in a row—to freeze spirits duty. And I will do so for the remainder of this Parliament. This will be the longest freeze on duty in nearly half a century.

My decision on cigarettes is, for public health reasons, to go ahead with a rise, but only the annual inflation rise of 8p a packet.

At a cost of £165 million by 2008, I will replace the eight existing tax schemes for pensions with a single lifetime allowance I will set the allowance at £1.5 million for the first year of the scheme, from April 2006, and will set the allowance now for the years until 2010 when the figure will be £1.8 million.

Gift aid is now worth £2.3 billion a year to charities and voluntary organisations which are at the heart of British civic life. I propose a cash incentive to encourage small and medium-sized firms to set up their own payroll giving schemes. With 2005 the British Year of the Volunteer, the Home Secretary and I will consider, in the spending review, new resources for two volunteering initiatives: first to encourage and extend mentoring in the United Kingdom, and second to encourage national community service by young people.

Churches and sacred places of worship are not just an essential part of our religious life, but an important part of the history and the fabric of our country. Before 2000, Churches paid 17½ per cent. VAT on all church repairs. Since 2000, grants we introduced have covered 12½ per cent. of the VAT bill. I can now announce that until March 2006, churches and sacred places will be able to reclaim not 12½ per cent. but all 17½ per cent. of VAT. This will wipe out their liability in full.

The year 2005 is also the year in which, as the Prime Minister has said, the needs of Africa will be the focus of the UK's G7 presidency for development. I can tell the House that in the spending review this Government will not freeze or cut international development aid, but we will increase it. Today I can announce matched funding for a year for the Commonwealth Education Fund, which supports the objective that by 2015 every child everywhere has primary education, and there will be matching funding also for the Sport Relief charity, which will work with Comic Relief in tackling AIDS and poverty in Africa.

Following these decisions on tax and tax reliefs, the normal Budget tables, published in the Red Book, confirm for the three-year period ahead that these Budget measures are fiscally neutral. And the fiscal stance is unchanged from the pre-Budget report.

In making my Budget judgment I had a clear choice. Falling unemployment and low debt interest have themselves yielded an extra £10 billion this year over 1997. Stability and sustained growth are yielding additional revenues. The choice in this Budget was whether to cut tax rates or to continue our programme of rising public investment in order to meet the priorities of delivering stability, security and economic strength.

We know, Mr Deputy Speaker, the scale of the threats we as a nation face to our security at home and abroad, and the obligations we owe and the investment we need to support our police, security services and armed forces. And while our schools have 20,000 more teachers and 80,000 classroom assistants and our hospitals 50,000 more nurses and 15,000 more doctors, this Government hold firm to the belief that sustained investment is necessary to sustain world-class public services.

We know also the scale of the economic challenge we as a nation face from global competition, and I have no doubt that the nations that will succeed long term will be the nations that make the long-term choice to invest in the drivers of future prosperity—education, science and enterprise.

And I hope that all Members of this House would agree that if the long-term case for investment in the pursuit of excellence in education, science and enterprise is made, it is our duty in the interests of the whole nation to put short-term considerations second to ensuring that Britain is fully equipped for the future to compete.

[Mr. Gordon Brown]

And because it is also our duty when we consider public investment to do everything to secure value for money, last year the Prime Minister and I decided to review the future of the Inland Revenue and Customs; and for rural services, the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs set up the Haskins review; and to prepare for our decisions of the 2004 spending review, in the Budget of 2003, here in this House a year ago, we set up the efficiency review. We asked Sir Peter Gershon to work with us to identify how new technology, changing work practices and better procurement could free up resources in departmental budgets that we could allocate in the years ahead to front-line services.

Alongside work-force reforms—in which the co-operation of public servants has been much appreciated—we are investing over £6 billion in modern technology, creating the potential for greater economies in back office and transactional services.

I will report in the spending review on individual departmental plans, but I can announce three decisions today.

The Department for Work and Pensions—building on the merger of benefit offices and jobcentres, and the investment of £2 billion in new technology—is able to unlock savings in back office administration, and at the same time move resources to the front line so that we can expand our successful service of personal advisers.

While improving front-line services, the Secretary of State for Work and Pensions and I have agreed, by 2008, a reduction in the DWP budget of in excess of 5 per cent. in real terms. And the Secretary for Work and Pensions is announcing today for his Department a gross reduction of 40,000 staff posts, a redeployment of 10,000 posts to new priorities, and thus an overall reduction over four years of 30,000 posts. Staff numbers will fall from 130,000 now to—by 2008—100,000.

We are also announcing that as a result of the O'Donnell review, we will merge Her Majesty's Customs and Excise and the Inland Revenue. Whereas in the past business had to deal both with the Revenue and Customs, business will now deal with a single tax service, which, because of the investments we have made in the new technology, can make large savings in back office costs.

While improving front office services, I have decided in the spending review on a budget reduction by 2008 of in excess of 5 per cent. in real terms.

The Inland Revenue and Customs and Excise are announcing today a gross reduction of 14,000 staff posts, a redeployment of three and a half thousand, and thus an overall reduction by 2008 of ten and a half thousand staff posts.

In these two Departments covering 40 per cent. of the civil service, there will be a gross reduction by 2008 of 54,000 posts, and after redeployment, an overall reduction of 40,500 staff.

And the Government have also decided that in the spending review all Departments will cut their administration budgets by at least 5 per cent. in real terms by 2008, and as part of his efficiency programme, the Secretary of State for Education and Skills is today announcing a 31 per cent. reduction in headquarters staff by 2008, which will enable him to direct more funds straight to schools and spend more cash per pupil in the classroom.

By cutting in real terms the administrative budgets of Departments, by reforming procurement both nationally and locally, by unlocking productivity gains from technology and work force improvements, Departments are to achieve—in the spending review period—annual efficiency savings of 2½ per cent. a year, boosting effective front-line service delivery by £20 billion a year by 2008.

Planned administration costs, which were an average of 5 per cent. of total spending in the 1980s and rose to 5.7 per cent. in the early 1990s, will fall to 4 per cent. and then to 3.7 per cent. by 2008—the lowest level since the running costs regime was introduced.

Having made these reforms, I can now set the guidelines for overall spending and investment to 2008. I have already allocated money for 2005–06, and I propose to confirm that allocation. I have also allocated funds to the national health service through to 2008. The Secretary of State for Health is reporting today that since 1997 there has been a 20 per cent. rise in elective admissions; a 66 per cent. rise in MRI scans and a 50 per cent. rise in CT scans; a 50 per cent. rise in the number of heart operations; that 99 per cent. of cancer patients are now seen within two weeks of urgent referral; and that of the 114 new hospital developments commissioned since 1997, more than 40 have now opened.

To support the Health Secretary's plans for greater flexibility, diversity and local accountability, I can now confirm that, as previously announced, the NHS will receive, each year to 2008, a 10 per cent. cash rise—a 7.2 per cent. rise each year in real terms.

Having made these allocations, I am still able to release substantial resources while meeting all our fiscal rules. Current spending will rise in the years 2006 to 2008 by 2¼ per cent., in line with our cautious view of the trend growth of the economy, and investment will rise to 2¼ per cent. of gross domestic product, as we make up the backlog of investment while meeting our fiscal rules. Let me set out the figures.

Total managed expenditure will rise from £459 billion this year and £488 billion next year, to £520 billion in 2005–06, £549 billion in 2006–07 and £579 billion in 2007–08. This means that we have in 2006–07, for departmental and annually managed expenditure, after our health allocations, additional resources available of £20 billion, rising by 2007–08 to an extra £40 billion a year as a result of gains from growth, falling unemployment and low debt interest. In this Budget, and later in the spending review, I will allocate these resources.

When the allocation of additional resources was made 10 years ago, 75 per cent. had to go to pay debt interest and the rising costs of unemployment, and only 25 per cent. was left for priority services, but debt interest payments are now and will remain around 2 per cent. of national income—less than at any time since 1915—and unemployment costs are falling.

Let me summarise. I have shown how the British model for monetary and fiscal policy is locking in stability for the future, with lower debt and lower deficits than our competitors; I have shown the dividend from stability and growth that allows rising investment to meet our priorities of delivering stability, security and economic strength; and I have now shown how the investments we make are not only affordable but fully financed and linked to reform.

I will set the total amount for departmental spending and allocations at the time of the spending review, when I will also publish forecasts for annually managed expenditure, including debt interest and social security costs. The growth rate of both overall spending and departmental spending will be lower in this spending review than in the last, but with administrative costs cut and with wider efficiency improvements, we will be able to deliver substantial further increases in resources direct to the front line—to patients, pupils and users.

As I consider what these allocations should be, I have had a number of representations about the path and priorities for public spending in the years ahead. Full announcements will be made in the spending review in July, but I can confirm the following decisions.

It has been put to me that we freeze the defence budget and cut it in real terms. At a time when our armed forces are now serving in Iraq, Afghanistan and Kosovo as well as in Northern Ireland and elsewhere—I applaud their dedication to the work of this country—such a course would be irresponsible, contrary to the national interest, and I reject it. In the last spending review, we allocated the largest spending increase in 20 years to defence, and I can tell the House that I propose real terms increases in defence spending in the coming round.

There have also been representations to freeze the Home Office budget and to cut it in real terms. I have agreed with the Home Secretary that, having increased the numbers of police, this would be exactly the wrong time, and contrary to the national interest, to freeze expenditure on the Home Office.

I have also received representations that we should freeze the transport budget, cutting it in real terms. I have consulted the CBI and business organisations, and they feel that it is critical to the economy to press ahead with investments in our infrastructure, and that we should not return to the old stop-go in spending, which left under the last Government hundreds of road projects planned but never completed, so the spending review will provide not for cuts but for real terms growth in transport in our country.

I have also rejected representations to freeze spending on housing, local government, and services to children and the elderly.

I have received proposals to cut the science budget and the skills budget and to abolish the new deal, but instead of cutting these budgets, I believe it essential that, as skills, knowledge and technology become more central to our future prosperity, now is exactly the right time to invest in British science and British education. This is our Budget choice, because we cannot be a strong economy if we are weak in education and science. We will work with the scientific community and our science-based companies, so that in this spending period we can raise the level of science funding as a share of national income, with one purpose: to make Britain the best and the most attractive location for science and innovation in the world.

Today, the Government are also announcing a 10-year framework for medical science. Our health budget is what we spend not just on the national health service but on medical research that is bringing new treatments and cures. Modelled on the successful National Cancer Research Institute, the Health Secretary's 10-year plan will fund specialist research institutes for other diseases, and a new British national clinical research network that brings together public and private sectors and medical charities. I can confirm today that the combined budget for medical research and research and development within the NHS will rise, and by 2008 it will approach £1.2 billion a year.

From 1997, the new deal has helped 1 million men and women move from unemployment to employment. As we upskill our economy, the next challenge, the challenge for every advanced industrial nation, is to equip people to move from low-skilled work to higher-skilled work, so we will now constitute a new deal for skills that will offer in jobcentres, for the unemployed and the employed, a one-stop service advising on skills, with access to personal skills advisers and training.

In line with our policy of matching rights with responsibilities, not only will jobseekers be required to undergo a skills check but new incentives will be piloted to encourage lone parents, incapacity benefit claimants and partners of the unemployed also to gain new skills.

The new deal for skills will mean a guarantee of opportunity for every adult to gain level 2 skills. Building on the successful first phase of employer training pilots, I can announce their extension, working with employers, to the north-east, Lancashire, the black country, Devon and Cornwall, Cambridgeshire and West Yorkshire.

The new guarantee to adults will be matched by a guarantee to the young: with new junior apprenticeships and pre-apprenticeship courses, allied to improvements that I am announcing today in benefit rules for young people, every teenager will have the offer of training or education until age 18.

Having, in the last spending round, tackled under-investment in schools and in teaching staff, the primary focus of this spending round must be on excellence and improving standards for all, by supporting strong leadership in schools and diversity of provision throughout education. The aim is that we use modern technology and teaching to offer our pupils tuition and learning tailored to their needs, and so move Britain to the top of the world league for results and standards in education.

Matching our new investment to reform, the Education Secretary is announcing today the next stage of his modernisation of primary and secondary education. Building on previous reforms to raise standards—the literacy and numeracy hours; excellence in cities; the new deal for schools; reform of the teaching profession—he is designating up to 1,000 more specialist schools alongside more city academies; offering greater autonomy and flexibility for schools that are succeeding; providing more discretion for head teachers over school budgets; training more teachers and assistants for coaching and learning matched to individual pupil needs, with wider options for their curriculum; encouraging new partnerships between schools and within communities; extending school hours with additional classes and services; and thus empowering our nation's schools to raise standards for all pupils.

And to advance these modernisation plans, the overall capital investment budget for English in education, which was just £1 billion a year in 1997, will be £6 billion next year, rising to £8.1 billion a year by 2008. Similar announcements will be made for Scotland, Wales and Northern Ireland. And our capital investment allocations will ensure for every constituency in the country that by 2015, every secondary school can be refurbished or rebuilt with world-class technology in every school, and the best state-of-the-art learning support in every classroom.

In line with our commitment to get resources to the front line, the settlement for education that the Secretary of State is announcing today will ensure that more money goes direct to the school and the head teacher, to spend on his school's priorities. And for the year 2005–06, we can announce that there will be a payment in the typical primary school direct to the head teacher of over £55,000, and in the typical secondary school a payment direct to the head teacher of £180,000.

It has been put to us that our guarantee of increased educational investment should be limited only to schools, and that in the years to 2008 we should freeze cash spending and cut it in real terms for universities, further education colleges, apprenticeships, adult skills and lifelong learning, as well as for nursery education, day care, and child care for the under-fives. But this cannot be the right decision when we know that chances in life are determined as much before the age of five as after, and when we know also that 8 million adults do not yet have basic skills for a modern economy.

Sure Start is tackling child poverty. Early years education and child care are vital to parents and to child development, so the Secretary of State for Education is announcing today that funds for Sure Start, early education and child care will not be cut, but will rise from 2004–05 to 2007–08 by £669 million—an average annual real-terms rise of 17 per cent. And the Secretary of State is also announcing that by 2008, there will be a total of 1,700 children's centres—one in each of the country's 20 per cent. most disadvantaged wards—as we advance towards our goal of a children's centre for every community.

The Secretary of State for Education is also announcing that our university and student finance reforms will be matched by rising real-terms funding, to progress towards the 50 per cent. target for students in higher education that would give thousands more students with qualifications the opportunities that they deserve. The settlement will maintain the level of real-terms student funding per head, and ensure that universities receive in full the benefit of additional revenue from the Government's higher education reforms.

So to fund our further school reforms and a rising number of teaching assistants and teachers, I can announce for England the educational settlement in full for the three years to 2008: that compared to growth of 1.4 per cent. a year in the 18 years to 1997, there will be a real-terms rise averaging, after inflation, 4.4 per cent. a year. In 1997, when we came to government, England spent just £2,500 per pupil per year; today that figure is already £4,500. By 2007–08, it will be £5,500—twice the 1997 figure and £1,000 more per pupil between now and 2007–08. So the education budget for England, which was £29 billion in 1996–97, will rise from £49 billion this year and £52 billion next year, to £60 billion in 2006–07 and £64 billion by 2007–08. And the education budget for the United Kingdom, which was £37 billion in 1996–97, will rise from £59 billion this year and £63 billion next year, to £72 billion in 2006–07 and £77 billion by 2007–08.

So with our new announcements today, for UK education there is an additional £8.5 billion in 2007–08 compared to 2005–06. That is £8.5 billion extra that is not only affordable, but fully funded and linked to standards and reform; the gains from stability and economic success; the dividend from the strength to take hard decisions about priorities every year from 1997; and at all times meeting our fiscal rules. UK education expenditure, which was just 4.7 per cent. of national income in 1997, will rise to 5.6 per cent. in 2007–08—from one of the lowest in the industrialised world in 1997 to among the best in 2007–08.

And I have one final announcement. This summer, the review of local government finance will report. But I do understand the difficulties today faced by older pensioners on fixed incomes, especially the over-70s. The evidence shows that their council tax bills take a higher share of their income than the rest of the population. So for this year, for those over 70, on top of the winter fuel payment, we will pay an additional £100 to each household. Together with the winter fuel payment, pensioners aged over 70 will this year receive a total of £300, and pensioners aged over 80 a total of £400. I hope that Members on both sides of the House will welcome the extra support for pensioners.

Our foundation: economic stability. Our achievement: sustained growth. Our choice: more investment, not less, now and into the next Parliament. Our prudence is for a purpose. I commend this Budget to the House.

PROVISIONAL COLLECTION OF TAXES

Motion made, and Question,

That, pursuant to section 5 of the Provisional Collection of Taxes Act 1968, provisional statutory effect shall be given to the following motions:—

(a) Rates of tobacco products duty (motion No. 2);

(b) Rate of duty on beer (motion No. 3);

(c) Rates of duty on wine and made-wine (motion No. 4);

(d) Amusement machine licence duty (rates) (motion No. 17).—[Mr. Gordon Brown] put forthwith, pursuant to Standing Order No. 51 (Ways and means motions), and agreed to.

Budget Resolutions

AMENDMENT OF THE LAW

Motion made, and Question proposed,

(1) That it is expedient to amend the law with respect to the National Debt and the public revenue and to make further provision in connection with finance.

(2) This Resolution does not extend to the making of any amendment with respect to value added tax so as to provide—

(a) for zero-rating or exempting a supply, acquisition or importation;

(b) for refunding an amount of tax;

(c) for any relief, other than a relief that—

(i) so far as it is applicable to goods, applies to goods of every description, and

(ii) so far as it is applicable to services, applies to services of every description.—[Mr. Gordon Brown.]

Mr. Michael Howard (Folkestone and Hythe) (Con): May I congratulate the Chancellor on the delivery of his Budget? He has chosen to deliver his Budget on St. Patrick's day. St. Patrick famously described himself as "the most humble-minded man". That is not an accolade for which the Chancellor is a contender. His Budget begged the central question that goes to the heart of his performance: if everything is going so well, why does he have to borrow so much?

The Chancellor made great play of the fact that the Budget controls the growth of spending and borrowing, but let us look in some detail at what he means by that. Three years ago, in his 2001 Budget, he forecast borrowing over five years at £30 billion. By 2002—just a year later—that forecast had risen to £72 billion. Today, he is predicting borrowing of over £140 billion, and he is on course to borrow this year alone almost four times as much as he forecast at the time of the last election—and this at a time when he claims that the economy is doing well! How much would this Chancellor be borrowing if the economy went into a downturn? That is the response to all his rigmarole about balanced Budgets.

The truth is that this is a credit-card Budget from a credit-card Chancellor; and a "borrow now, tax later" Budget from a "borrow now, tax later" Chancellor. If he has his way, the country will pay for it later in Labour's third-term tax rises.

Under this Chancellor, we know the importance of looking at the small print. Page 232 of the Red Book, just published, shows that the amount people save has fallen from 10 per cent. of their income in 1997 to just 5 per cent. this year—and that from a party that promised a savings culture. As a senior manager at one of Britain's biggest investment companies said only two weeks ago:

"The Government's policy on savings is a mess and it will take years to repair the damage."

The Chancellor talked about enterprise, as he does every year. Page 225 of the Red Book shows, however, that business investment has fallen for two years in a row. Page 237 shows that our trade deficit is at the highest level since the 17th century; and page 240 makes it clear that manufacturing output, in common with manufacturing investment, is lower than it was in 1997 and that the number of people employed in manufacturing is falling by 6,000 a month. All that from a Chancellor who promised "an industrial policy so that our manufacturing industries can grow again".

There are, of course, some things in the Budget that we welcome. We welcome, as I am sure does the whole House, the fact that the Chancellor is increasing the resources available to combat terrorism. We also welcome the potential savings that could arise from merging the Inland Revenue with Customs and Excise, but can the Chancellor guarantee that there will be no political interference in the enforcement of tax law? After the debacle that followed the transfer of responsibility for tax credits to the Inland Revenue, can he assure us that disruption on a similar scale is not likely to happen again?

The Chancellor has also published the Barker report into housing supply, and we shall scrutinise with care the implications of the proposals for that sector. So far, all that the Government have achieved is to hold the record for the lowest number of new houses built in peacetime since 1924.

We welcome the announcement of increases for pensioners over 70, but those pensioners should be warned: what this Chancellor gives, this Chancellor takes away.

We particularly welcome the Chancellor's announcement that Britain will not be joining the euro—though to save the blushes of his right hon. Friend the Prime Minister, he did not put it quite like that. So much for his claim in June that there has been "significant progress" in achieving "cyclical convergence"! Last year, he promised that we were "within the Maastricht criteria" on deficits. We now know that he failed to keep that promise: he was not within the criteria then, and he is certainly not within them now. He has broken the rules and he has not even joined the club.

It would be churlish not to congratulate the Chancellor on getting one growth forecast right, but the growth is fuelled by a public sector boom paid for by a public sector Chancellor—and, of course, growth forecasts were not the only forecasts that he made. In last year's Budget, his forecasts for revenue were wrong; his forecasts for the deficit were wrong; and his forecasts for borrowing were wrong. None of the Chancellor's bluster can disguise the fact that this Government have increased taxes and increased borrowing, and the borrowing that he announced today is simply unsustainable.

This Budget has made it clear that if Labour gets a third term, tax rises are inevitable. When in opposition, the Prime Minister said that he had no plans to increase tax at all. At the weekend, the former Paymaster General, the hon. Member for Coventry, North-West (Mr. Robinson), told us why. They did discuss tax rises privately two years before the election, but, as he explained:

"It's very difficult to win an election if you go out there saying 'look, if you elect me I promise you I'm going to absolutely smash you with taxes you've never heard of'".

So they said that they had no plans to increase tax at all, and ever since then they have indeed been smashing people with taxes that they had never heard of. There have been more than 60 tax rises, and we are paying half as much tax again as in 1997. Last year, the real value of people's take-home pay actually fell, and after another inflation-busting rise in council tax, average bills have now risen by 70 per cent. since 1997.

Business is paying more tax, too. The Chancellor has burdened it with £15 billion a year in extra taxes and red tape. As the chief executive of Tesco told the Chancellor at one of his intimate gatherings:

"Like a tide the level of taxes seems to be forever rising. The water is now above our waist".

As David Frost, director general of the British Chambers of Commerce, says:

"British business cannot compete with a £30 billion millstone around its neck".

Yet despite all those taxes, the Chancellor still has to borrow more and more. This is a Chancellor who said in 1996 that we could not build "the new Jerusalem on a mountain of debt".

A mountain of debt is exactly what he is creating today.

That is why independent commentators say that third-term tax rises are inevitable under Labour. The ITEM Club, which uses use the Treasury's own model, says that the public finances "continue to deteriorate alarmingly". The Organisation for Economic Co-operation and Development warns of a possible "sizeable structural deficit". The Financial Times says that the Chancellor should be preparing options for a tax rise after the election. After today's Budget, that black hole is still there. That is what happens if you have a "borrow now, tax later" Budget from a "borrow now, tax later" Chancellor.

It is not as though the money that the Chancellor has borrowed to spend has been spent wisely. After all the years when the Government said that they were spending our money really well, we now learn that their own adviser has revealed £15 billion a year of waste. This is the Chancellor who said that not "one penny more" would be spent on the health service until he secured the changes to allow the reforms necessary to "carry out the modernisation" that it needs. This is the Chancellor who said that extra money spent on public services was dependent on the release of efficiency savings. He said that in his 1998 spending review, in his 2000 spending review, in his 2002 spending review—and he is saying it again today. This is the Chancellor who said that he was "determined to get value" for "every penny we spend" to give people the public services that they want. He makes that promise every time, and he breaks it every time.

The annual cost of running central Government is up by nearly £7 billion under the Chancellor's stewardship. An extra 511 civil servants were hired every week last year, and now we discover from the Gershon report that the Government secretly plan to hire more than 300,000 extra public sector workers over the next three years—after taking into account the reductions that the Chancellor has announced today.

What has really been achieved? The number of children playing truant is up by 22 per cent.—[Interruption.] I should have thought that Government Members might be a little worried about the number of children playing truant from our schools. What hope is there for the future if, under the present Government, children do not even go to school?

NHS waiting times are getting longer and violent crime is at its highest level ever. A 37 per cent. increase in spending on the NHS has led to only a 5 per cent. rise in the number of hospital treatments. The OECD says:

"In the health sector there are few indicators showing unambiguous improvements in outcomes over and above trend improvements that were already apparent before the surge in spending".

It goes on to say—[Interruption.] The Chancellor is fond of quoting the OECD, so he should listen to this. It states that, in some areas, "such as numbers of patients treated and average waiting times, performance has actually deteriorated".

As the Minister for Energy, E-Commerce and Postal Services told a conference in America, in a speech mysteriously missing from the Government website:

"Too often a lot of money has been spent but very little seems to have been achieved . . . In a year or so we're going to have an election in the UK, when people will say, 'We've paid a lot of taxes, but what has really been achieved with all that money?'"

He was telling the truth. I am afraid that his prospects of survival in this Government cannot be high.

A year before he became Chancellor, the right hon. Gentleman said:

"I want our Labour Government to be remembered not as a big spender but as a wise spender."

However, it was not long before the tax and spending habit kicked in.

Very soon, the nation will face a choice. We on this side of the House want to give patients, parents and professionals more control. We want to bring in real reform. That is the way to end the cycle of tax and spend and fail. This Government will never deliver real reform of the public services. All they offer is more of the same: higher spending, higher borrowing, and higher taxes.

This Budget will go down in history as the "borrow now, tax later" Budget, the Chancellor will go down in history as the "borrow now, tax later" Chancellor, and the Government will go into oblivion as the "borrow now, tax later" Government. And the sooner they go, the better it will be for our country.

Dr. Vincent Cable (Twickenham) (LD): As I did when I responded to the pre-Budget report, I shall start by acknowledging the positive things about the economy and the Budget.

There has been greater economic stability than before 1997; the employment and unemployment statistics are enviable; inflation is low; and the relationship between debt and gross domestic product is fundamentally healthy. All those things are positive. However, the Chancellor's finest hour came in his first week in office in 1997, when he made the Bank of England independent. Many of the problems now evident have been building up ever since. The big decision in this Budget was not to tackle them until after the general election.

Let me list some of the problems that we face. First, there is growing evidence of a very serious imbalance in the economy, based on very high levels of consumer debt and inflated house prices. That has exposed many families to financial disaster if interest rates rise and house prices fall.

I raised this matter with the Chancellor six months ago on the Floor of the House. He rather derided the matter as some personal eccentricity of mine but, as he may have been too busy to see it, let me point out what the Monetary Policy Committee said only this morning. In its minutes issued today, it notes that household financial positions could well become unsustainable and so increase the probability of an eventual abrupt adjustment process.

The problem stems from a remarkable boom in house prices, which even the International Monetary Fund says has led to an overvaluation of between 30 and 35 per cent. The Chancellor mentioned the very useful reports from Miles and Barker. I welcome the practical suggestions that they make. I was amused that, after decades of Liberal Democrats promoting the idea of site value taxation, the notion at last seems to have taken root on the Treasury Bench. However, the technical improvements that Barker and Miles point to do not even begin to address the problem of the speculative bubble that lies behind the housing market, which supports household debt worth a trillion pounds. That bubble could well collapse, with disastrous consequences.

The other side of the imbalance is what is happening to the productive sector of the economy. The Chancellor talked about his projections for manufacturing investment, but he failed to mention that it had fallen by a third over the past three years. His 200-year history of the British economy did not point out that there was an all-time record trade deficit of £4.6 billion in January.

My second point has to do specifically with the Budget. I disagree with the Leader of the Opposition: I do not believe that there is a fiscal crisis, but there is a fiscal deficit problem that needs to be addressed. The Chancellor slipped into his speech an acknowledgement that the fiscal deficit will be £6 billion higher than estimated in the pre-Budget report. He has gone some way towards acknowledging what we believe: that the growth in public spending must slow down until it is comparable to the growth of the British economy as a whole. My party does not favour the extreme measures apparently adopted by the Conservatives.

The Chancellor listed the submissions from the Conservatives, but it was interesting that he did not mention their proposal on local government finance, which would raise council tax by 10 per cent. I suspect that he did not mention it because nowhere in his Budget speech did he give his own estimate of what council tax rises are likely to be next year. That is a matter of absolutely critical importance, because it lies at the heart of our disagreement with the Government about taxation policy. The disagreement is not about the aggregate level of taxation, but about its fairness. The Chancellor has a legitimate record of concern for social justice, but he should be most ashamed that the bottom 20 per cent. of the population, in terms of income, pay a higher percentage of their income in tax than the top 20 per cent.

The major reason for that disparity is the system of council taxation, which the Government inherited from the previous Conservative Government but which they have done nothing fundamentally to reform. I hope—and sense—that our argument for local income tax is beginning to win the day. A Government spokesman said only the other day that the Government recognised that local income tax was a "realistic option" and a "strong, sustainable source" of funding for local services. We repeat our belief that ability to pay must underpin all direct taxation. It does not underpin local income tax. We know that the Prime Minister is hostile to the reform, and the Chancellor has wisely kept mum about it.

The Chancellor introduced some welcome top-ups for older pensioners—an idea that we have promoted consistently over the years, as it targets help on those who need it most. However, he will apply it not in its own right, but as a sticking plaster for the injustice created by local income tax.

Another disagreement in terms of tax policy, which the Chancellor did not touch on today, has to do with marginal rates of tax. We accept that very high earners—people earning more than £100,000 a year—should pay a marginal tax rate of 50 per cent. The Government have condemned that proposal, but they have never acknowledged that their own proposals incorporate marginal tax rates of 50 per cent. or more for several key groups. As a result of the change in provision for students, people earning more than £35,000 a year, when they pay their graduate tax, will be paying a marginal rate of 50 per cent.

The Chancellor slipped in a quiet reference to the lifetime cap on pensions. He said that he had increased it a little, but he did not acknowledge that the marginal rate of tax on the pension pots applicable to people such as airline pilots, for example, will be not the horrendous rate of 50 per cent. associated with the Liberal Democrats, but 55 per cent. So much for the Government's concern about high tax rates.

Thirdly, I turn to the issue of tax simplicity. When I first raised this matter, I made an analogy with the gentleman who has earned the nickname "Tinkerman"—Mr. Ranieri at Chelsea. As the Chelsea team is progressing rapidly through the Champions league, I should perhaps look for a less successful analogy, but my point remains valid. The Government and the Chancellor have introduced an endless succession of gizmos, wheezes and gimmicks, and we had more today. They have complicated the tax system, without improving it in any way.

One matter mentioned briefly by the Chancellor was the failure of his attempt to introduce an incentive last year for incorporated businesses. I should be grateful for clarification of the passage in the Red Book that states that the proposed reform will raise an extra £490 million in one year. Effectively, that will penalise all those businesses that, in perfectly good faith, went to the expense and trouble of shifting to incorporation.

Over the years, the Liberal Democrat view on public spending has been clear and transparent. We argued for an increase in investment in public services and for the taxes to pay for that, and we campaigned on that basis at the last general election. The Government have delivered the investment, which we voted for and supported. Unfortunately, they did not deliver it openly and honestly, which has contributed to the general public's cynicism about the tax system.

[Dr. Vincent Cable]

The Government face tough choices on public spending, and today the Chancellor has hinted where he proposes to make some economies—we fully support the implementation of the Gershon report, which is entirely sensible. What is missing is an indication of the tough choices that must be made. Neither the Government nor the Conservatives can get away with arguing that the only way to rein in public expenditure is to cut waste, and tough choices are needed.

Some Departments—for example, the Department of Trade and Industry and the Department for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs—are grossly overstaffed and, moreover, do far too many things that should be stopped. The Government are introducing low priority proposals that are wasteful. The Chancellor referred to the need to maintain the Home Office budget, and we agree with that. But he did not point out that up to £3 billion will be taken out of the Home Office budget and spent on identity cards. His Department is responsible for introducing the baby bonds scheme, which is a superficially attractive but extremely inefficient, ill-thought-out way to use hundreds of millions of pounds that could be better used on early-years education.

Today, the Chancellor has introduced what sound like radical proposals for civil service relocation—we are totally in favour of the Lyons report. He did not point out, however, that fewer than one in 10 civil servants located in London and the south-east of England will be affected. For example, the Treasury will reduce its London staff from 1,152 to 1,134. Eighteen officials—fewer than one in 100—will be moved, which is not leading by example.

The Iraq war is one important reason why public expenditure has grown faster than expected. The cost of the Iraq war is approaching £3 billion, and it is rising by an extra £200 million a month. It is not appropriate to rehearse the political arguments in this debate, save to point out one crucial point: this country has been to war before in the middle east—in the early 1990s—as part of a genuine multilateral campaign, as a consequence of which the international community paid 80 per cent. of the costs. Because of the Government's approach to the recent conflict, the British taxpayer must pay every single penny.

On the euro, the Chancellor raised his usual annual laugh by kicking the issue ever further into the grass. The euro is obviously the biggest single economic issue confronting this country. A decision must be made sooner or later, and the Chancellor should be honest and state that costs are being incurred as a consequence of not making it. For the past seven years, British manufacturing has traded at a competitive disadvantage of around 30 per cent. as a result of the appreciation of the real exchange rate.

The collapse of Britain's share in foreign direct investment from 27 per cent. in 1998 to 7 per cent. in 2002 is a clear sign that international business is moving to the eurozone. Had we held on to our 1998 share, an extra £80 billion would have been ploughed into productive investment in parts of Britain such as the north-west and Wales. That real cost has been paid as a result of fudging and repeatedly postponing the decision. The Budget simply avoids the key decisions that must be made for the long-term future of the economy.

Mr. John McFall (Dumbarton) (Lab/Co-op): I welcome the Budget, which emphasises stability, growth and productivity, employment and public services. We do not want to return to the times when savings were wiped out every few years by bursts of double-digit inflation.

I welcome the Chancellor's assertion that the trend rate for growth—the best engine for delivering sustainable returns for savers and those in work—will be 2.5 per cent. until 2008. I agree with him that we must invest for the long term. The need for long-term investment is urgent, so it makes sound economic sense for low-debt countries to borrow to invest and not to impose balanced budget rules. I welcome the latest unemployment figures and the Chancellor's statement that employment is up by 1.3 million compared with the 1980s and by 1.5 million compared with the 1990s.

The hon. Member for Twickenham (Dr. Cable) discussed the euro. A housing market reform programme has been implemented, the inflation target has been changed, fiscal stabilisation has been achieved and the flexibility of the UK markets has been enhanced, and we must now follow through on those changes.

I remind the House of what the Prime Minister said in Tokyo last July:

"Treasury studies have established that over the long term monetary union is in the national interest . . . We are not looking for completion of the impact of reform in all areas before recommending entry, and neither are we keen to reduce the hurdle through one of a mere balance of probabilities. A clear and unambiguous decision requires sufficient material change to give us real confidence that we will benefit from entry. But it is the aggregate nature of the changes that matters."

The Government must get on the euro caravan, which, as the hon. Member for Twickenham says, will be of vast economic importance to us over the next few years.

I welcome the Chancellor's announcement on tax avoidance. I have been asking for an examination of the issue because the top four accountancy firms made £1.5 billion in fee income from tax work in 2002–03, and experts say that those profits have risen rapidly since 1997. Schemes offered by the most respected firms of accountants and their partners include concerted attempts to avoid tax by manipulating the gilts markets.

Tax avoidance thrives on concealment. I recognise that the issue is international and that the choice is between following the Australian route by implementing a general tax avoidance measure, or the American route or requiring accountancy firms to disclose the schemes they sell to companies. I am glad that the Chancellor is taking up that issue, because, as Deloittes recently stated, up to 40 per cent. of avoidance schemes are successfully hidden. The Government have acted in every Budget since 1997 to close tax loopholes, but they have not had great success. They have not clearly defined tax avoidance or introduced a clear mechanism for ruling whether schemes are legitimate or illegitimate, and they should get on with such definitions as quickly as possible.

I welcome the Government's adoption of the recommendations of the Barker report, in which Kate Barker particularly emphasised social housing. The number of social houses built in the UK has fallen from about 42,700 per year in 1994–95 to about 21,000 in 2002–03. Expenditure on social housing has increased from £800 million in 2001–02 to more than £1.4 billion in 2003–04, but the rate of supply has continued to decline. Over the next 10 years, it is estimated that the number of social and affordable houses must increase by at least 17,000 per year, which will require annual investment of about £1.2 billion to meet the flow of new needy households. The lack of social housing has been a scandal for many years, but the Government now need to pay the issue urgent attention.

The central focus of my right hon. Friend's approach to his Budget has been productivity. I welcome the 10-year strategy for science spending, under which Government support for research will rise annually by at least 2.75 per cent. above inflation. I also welcome the consultative document published on the eve of the Budget, which invites business leaders, research councils, charities and scientists to advise on how the new money should be spent.

Two weeks ago, colleagues on the Treasury Committee and I visited Germany as part of our inquiry into productivity. We visited Berlin and former East German areas, including Jena. We examined the role of the research institutes, which help regions to develop their research and development. The research institutes are spread around the regions. One institute, the Fraunhofer, has links in every region of Germany. In Saxony, I pointed out to a businessman that if we developed a similar system people would say that it is for individual companies, not research institutes, to develop their research and development. He said, from a right-wing perspective, that he could not have developed his business if it had not been for the help of research institutes. There is a pressing need for a regional approach to research institutes in this country to improve competitiveness and innovation. I hope that the Government will consider that issue.

At the risk of being parochial, I must express my dismay at my right hon. Friend's imposition of tax stamps on the Scotch whisky industry. I took the Economic Secretary to my constituency and we toured the Allied Distillers plant. I put a hard hat on him and took him round the production lines. He saw for himself the effect that such an imposition would have on competitiveness and productivity. Sadly, when he went back to the Treasury, he failed in his mission, but I learn from my pager that he will meet me at 3 o'clock to discuss the issue. I warn the Government that productivity and competitiveness are extremely important to the Scotch whisky industry. It is a £2 billion industry, and we need to support it. Manufacturing has been declining year after year, and the Government should not engage in any activity that will affect productivity and competitiveness. I put the Government on warning that we will be back, week after week, to ensure that my right hon. Friend the Chancellor's rhetoric on innovation and assisting businesses is translated into action on the ground.

Mr. Alan Reid (Argyll and Bute) (LD): I wholeheartedly back the hon. Gentleman's support for the Scotch whisky industry. When he meets the Chancellor later, will he draw his attention to the fact that he has promised the industry only £3 million in capital investment assistance? The hon. Gentleman will know that that is nowhere near enough—the cost to the industry will be far greater.

Mr. McFall: I have great respect for the hon. Gentleman, but I always like to have Liberal Democrat statistics checked. When I have done so, I will discuss the issue with my right hon. Friend the Chancellor. However, I pay tribute to the hon. Gentleman for the work that he and other colleagues have done with me on the all-party Scotch whisky group.

The Treasury Committee is concerned about credit cards and debt. Much has been made of the issue, but we approach it from the point of view of transparency and competitiveness. We look to the industry to improve the situation because, at present, consumers are left in the dark. They do not understand how annual percentage rates are calculated, because there are two definitions of them; nor do they understand how interest rates are calculated, because there are 10 different ways of doing it. That deceives the consumer, and the sooner the credit card industry realises that, the better. It is making record profits on the back of consumers' ignorance. I tell the industry that the Treasury Committee will bear down on it and that if it does not do anything over the next few months its representatives will have to reappear before the Committee, in June or July, to go through the whole rigmarole again.

We need a victory for the consumer. Last week, we heard of the tragic case of Mrs. Lewis, whom I had the opportunity to meet. When her husband died, he had 19 credit cards and excessive debt of more than £65,000. The industry does not share information about credit history. I have had some lively exchanges—all very positive—with the managing director of MBNA in this country, General Chuck Krulak, a four-star Purple Heart Vietnam veteran. He cannot understand why our industry does not adopt the open system that operates in the US: if the US has it, why cannot we have it? An information-sharing system would reduce the opportunities for people such as Mrs. Lewis's husband to get into unmanageable debt. It is important that the credit card industry ensures that that happens.

The Financial Secretary knows that the Treasury Committee is conducting an inquiry into long-term savings. Last week was a terrible one for the retail savings industry, starting on Monday with Lord Penrose's report. On Thursday, the Treasury Committee published its endowment mortgage report, which showed that the saver has no confidence in the savings integrity of the life assurance industries. Until that confidence is re-established, it will be bad news for the savers and for society. Paul Myners and Ron Sandler appeared before our Committee. Ron Sandler said that the insurance industry was trusted less than local supermarkets. That trust must be re-established, and the Government must look at the issue.

I hope that the Financial Secretary will think about reaching out to the less affluent, because the insurance industry has not tackled that issue. The less affluent are gradually being priced out of the savings and pension market. Not only has the old industrial branch, which collected premiums by making monthly home calls, disappeared, but most direct sales forces have been wound down. With the best will in the world, independent financial advisers will not make a living concentrating on the poor. The result is that long-term saving is increasingly becoming a middle class pastime. The Government and the industry need to have a long, hard look at how we might get financial advice and financial services to the less affluent.

The Committee will take evidence from several groups that are interested in the issue. It is curious, however, that the UK industry seems happy to ignore a slice of the population that others here and overseas have found to be a profitable and growing market if it is approached innovatively. Sandler products might well provide an ideal platform for selling via the workplace—regulated products with a lightly regulated sales process—but the industry's generally negative response to them has been telling.

The industry has focused on commission, but the investigation of endowment mortgages convinced the Treasury Committee that the sales-driven approach to upfront commission ensures that when the sale is made the relationship between the provider and the customer is severed. As Paul Myners said when he appeared before the Committee, there is no duty of care for the insurance and savings industry towards the saver. When the industry comes knocking on the Financial Secretary's door saying that a cap of 1 per cent. is not enough, I advise caution, because we have to address what those sales are for. Are they merely to provide up-front commission or are they to ensure that we have a well-regulated suite of low-cost products in which the consumer has confidence and that a long-term relationship is established between the industry and the consumer?

The focus should be not on selling but on what is provided over the long term. The mixture should be selling, investment performance and after-sales care. Those three ingredients are important to restore confidence in long-term savings. The Treasury Committee is looking for a much more intelligent debate within the industry, which is why my colleagues and I will meet industry representatives to ask them to come up with ideas that go beyond their complaint about a 1 per cent. cap on commission. If a product, such as a pension, is sold to an individual over a 50-year period on 1 per cent. commission, the probable cost to the customer over that period would be 30 per cent; in other words, a third of that contribution comes from the customer. That is not a bad deal.

The Financial Secretary must ensure that the industry lays out exactly what its approach to the customer will be, and after-sales care must be at the heart of that approach. The Committee is asking the industry to come up with initiatives and, over the coming weeks, we shall question it about restoring confidence in long-term savings. We shall also invite my hon. Friend to tell the Committee about her links with the industry and to confirm that new, positive measures will be put in place.

Savings are extremely important. As I said, I do not want us to go back to the days of double-digit inflation, because if we do the people who will lose out are the elderly and ordinary, low-paid individuals. A stable economy is essential and I wish the Government well in that respect, but I also want them to take cognisance of the points that we have made so that the stable economy is married to a fair environment.

2.12 pm

Mr. Peter Lilley (Hitchin and Harpenden) (Con): I am a supporter of annual Budgets, with all the drama that we associate with them. However, one of the dangers of Budgets is that they give the illusion that economic performance is primarily the result of short-term decisions—that performance in the current year has been largely the result of decisions taken in last year's Budget, and that performance in the coming year will be largely the consequence of decisions taken in this one. That is nonsense. In fact, economic performance is primarily the result of the cumulative impact of budgetary, tax, spending, regulatory and other policies, which ideally move only in the direction of improving performance, although, in other circumstances, sadly, they may move in the other direction and cumulatively undermine performance.

I was one of those involved in developing and subsequently implementing the reforms introduced in the 1980s and early 1990s. I learned two things that I did not expect from that experience. The first was that the cumulative impact of those reforms exceeded our expectations; they did more to transform the performance of the British economy than we had dared hope. However, the second was that they took rather longer to have that impact than we had expected. The cumulative impact of reforms of trade unions, taxation, nationalised industry, the competitive environment and the regulatory framework took longer than we had expected to feed through to an improvement in our performance relative to that of other countries. We should thus bear in mind the fact that policy is long term and cumulative when we assess the Chancellor's performance in this and previous Budgets.

The Chancellor undoubtedly deserves his share of credit for the relatively strong performance of the British economy in recent years. However, I submit that that share of credit is relatively small. The strong performance is largely due to the fact that, unlike his predecessors, the Chancellor has not rapidly undermined the reforms and the strength of the economy that he inherited. None the less, he should also be held to account in due course for the long-term changes that will, as they already are, cumulatively undermining the long-term performance of the economy. They may take longer to feed through than some people anticipate but they will steadily and surely, as night follows day, reduce the performance of our economy relative to what it could have been.

The greatest single change that we made in the relative advantage of doing business in this country compared with other countries was the reduction of our tax burden relative to that of other countries. Before I spoke to the French equivalent of the CBI recently, I looked up the figures for the tax burden as a share of national income in this country since 1979 compared with that in our continental EU partners. In 1979, the share of national income going to tax and public expenditure was almost the same for all of us; at the beginning of the 1980s, it was marginally higher in the UK than on the continent. By 1997, however, partly because we had somewhat reduced its share of national income at a time when other countries had seen that share rise substantially, the gap between the share of our national income going to tax and that of our continental competitors had risen to nearly eight percentage points of gross domestic product. That was a substantial relative advantage for businesses working in this country. It meant that our cost burden was lower, so people's incentives to work, invest, save and take risks were higher, and the size of the competitive economy relative to the less competitive public sector was improved.

I have delivered a series of speeches on that topic in France, as it is of much concern there and, sadly, each time I speak the gap between us and our continental partners, in terms of the share of GDP going to taxation, seems to diminish. There are two reasons for that. In part, it is because the Chancellor has reverted to tax and spend and, in recent years, has increased expenditure taken in taxation faster than national income, after pausing for the first couple of years when he implemented the savings plans that he had inherited from us. However, it is also because other countries have followed our example of the 1980s and early 1990s and begun to reduce the share of their national income taken in tax, and done so without destroying their public services. Indeed, they have continued to improve their public services by adopting the time-old Dickensian recipe of increasing their public expenditure marginally less than their national income so that they can reduce tax rates, while we have been increasing our public expenditure somewhat faster than national income and have thus had to increase the tax burden. Public expenditure has increased on both sides of the channel, but the moderation of the increase on the continent has enabled those countries to reduce the share of national income going into taxes, thereby somewhat eroding our relative advantage. Sadly, this Budget continues the damage.

Mr. James Plaskitt (Warwick and Leamington) (Lab): If the right hon. Gentleman is preaching the virtue of the French approach to taxation as a share of income, can he explain why our economy has been growing so much faster than the French economy and why unemployment is falling in the UK but rising in France?

Mr. Lilley: I am sorry that the hon. Gentleman clearly was not listening to the early part of my speech. The consequences of tax, regulatory and policy changes do not follow immediately, in the same year or the next year; there is a cumulative impact. Just as the changes that we made in the early 1980s did not show their full fruits until the early 1990s, one would not expect changes made in the UK or France to show up as an immediate impact on economic performance in the same year, or even necessarily in the same half of the decade. That is a lesson that we need to learn. We must start thinking long term instead of the short-term manipulation of each Budget for a quick headline, despite the damage that that may do in the longer term.

The Government were originally elected on a pledge that they would improve public services without increasing the burden of taxation. Instead, they have increased the burden of taxation without substantially improving public services. I shall explain how they have achieved that and how we can have better services without increasing tax rates, and in due course reduce them.

How is it that Labour is spending more and getting less? In terms of the NHS, the Organisation for Economic Co-operation and Development's recent report clearly spelled out the situation. I recommend that right hon. and hon. Members on both sides of the House read it. The report states that, since 1999, when the Chancellor took his foot of the brake and put it on the accelerator—expenditure has been increasing rapidly in health and other public services—we have seen a slow-down in the rate of improvement in those services compared with the previous 10 years when there was growth, but it was moderate and within the capacity of the economy to provide it and for services to absorb it and respond to it.

In the 10 years up to 1999, when my right hon. Friend the Member for Charnwood (Mr. Dorrell), among others, was responsible for the NHS—he did a very good job—we saw an increase in the number of operations performed of 2.9 per cent. every year, on average. Since 1999, when the brakes have been off and expenditure has been pouring in, the increase has slowed to only 1.9 per cent. per annum.

The Government say that that relates to operations and that they have shifted the emphasis to day care. Figures for day care come from the same source, the OECD. They show that in the 10 years up to 1999, the number of treatments on a day-care basis was rising by 3.9 per cent. per annum. That growth has slowed even more since 1999 to an increase of only 2.4 per cent. per annum. It will not do for the Prime Minister to say that this has gone up and that has gone up. It has been going up since time immemorial. The point is that the rate of improvement has slowed, and the concerns of patients have increased.

The Prime Minister hopes that he can appeal to personal experience and the public perception. I tried that during the 1980s. Whenever I had a public meeting, I would ask everyone who grumbled about the health service whether anyone present had had any experience first hand or second hand through their families or friends of the health service. Many hands would go up. I would then ask how many of them thought that the experience was good. Exactly the same number of hands would go up. My next question would be, "Why do you all think that it is getting worse?" The answer would be, "We read in the newspapers that it is getting worse." [Interruption.] That was during the 1980s.

If we read the complaints that are registered now by patients—not just those in newspapers—we see that the numbers are increasing. Expressions of concern about cleanliness in hospitals are rising. Is that merely a perception? No. According to the EU, the problem of infections in hospitals is greater in this country than elsewhere. Nearly one in 10 patients have an infection in hospital that they did not have when they entered. Nearly 10 per cent. of beds are occupied by people who got their ailment in hospital. That demands a huge share of our resources. The rate is higher in the UK than any other country in western Europe, and it is getting worse faster than in any other country in western Europe.

Mr. Barry Gardiner (Brent, North) (Lab): Does the right hon. Gentleman appreciate that the privatisation of cleaning services in hospitals, which his Government introduced, precipitated the crisis, which, as he said, has a long-term tail on policy?

Mr. Lilley: We are talking about a problem that kills between 5,000 and 20,000 people a year. It is not the sort of problem about which we should make party political points. If the cause were what the hon. Gentleman suggests, I would support any change that would solve the problem and thereby cure it. However, the Government have decided that that is not the cause, and they have been in power for seven years. Why is that? Ministers go to other countries, as the Conservative Government's Front-Bench health team did, accompanied by the BBC. They went to Germany and saw sparkling, pristine hospitals. They said, "I bet you don't contract out your health care to private cleaners." They replied, "Of course we do. We want specialists involved in cleaning while we specialise in health."

The BBC journalist said, "We have had privatisation and all the unions say that that is the cause of all our problems. They say that the contractors do not keep things properly clean." The German official replied, "Why don't you change the contractors?" The benefit of the process is that, if it is not good enough, an improvement can be made, which would be more difficult if the system were run in-house.

If that analysis is mistaken and the hon. Gentleman is correct, let us all agree to change the system, but let us not make silly party political points when lives are at stake. It must be a silly party political point; otherwise he would have raised it with his right hon. and hon. Friends and urged them to make changes, and condemned them for tolerating something for seven years that he thinks is the cause of 5,000 people dying each year.

Mr. Stephen Dorrell (Charnwood) (Con): I entirely agree with every word that my right hon. Friend has said in response to the point made by the hon. Member for Brent, North (Mr. Gardiner).

Is not the fundamental argument that my right hon. Friend is advancing that our health structures are not as efficient as they need to be to deliver the services that patients require and that taxpayers are entitled to see for their money? Is not that argument exactly the one that the Chancellor made two or three years ago, when he said that the extra money that he intended to provide for the health service must be conditional on fundamental reform of the delivery mechanism? The basic point to be made against the Government is that they have made the money available but forgotten about the conditionality that the Chancellor understood at the beginning of the process was fundamental for success.

Mr. Lilley: My right hon. Friend is absolutely right, and I shall address that point. Undoubtedly, the Government have increased the level of spending more rapidly than happened on a sustained basis under the previous Government, but they have seen a slow-down in performance improvement, and deterioration in some key areas. That is partly because they have intensified the central problem that the NHS and other public services face in achieving improvements: centralisation.

We know that centralisation does not work. We have seen its failure on a massive scale in the Soviet Union, in the former eastern bloc and in centralised services in this country. We have seen it even in centralised companies in the private sector. An attempt to run a large organisation from the centre, top down, with command and control does not work. The resources that are thrown in never seem to filter through to the sharp end. Mr. Gorbachev, a well-intentioned man, thought that he could transform the Soviet Union without changing its fundamental structure just by setting targets, urging people to do better and sacking them if they did not.

The Prime Minister is perhaps Gorbachev's last remaining disciple on earth, because the Government have made centralisation worse. Though they have given up socialism, their belief in it has been replaced by a belief in spin and press manipulation. The whole public sector is run for good headlines. If a Government are trying to get good headlines about the health service, there must be centralised initiatives announced from Downing street that determine how money is spent. Ultimately, that means that decisions about how money is being spent that should be taken by individual hospitals or by people who are aware of clinical priorities are taken by Alastair Campbell or someone who is aware only of newspaper priorities.

Centralisation in the health service has been intensified in all respects because the Government want to take credit at the centre for everything that the NHS does that is good and for any initiative that they can think up that will win the next day's headlines. When I visited a hospital, I was told that the Government had set a waiting list target, which made a good headline. They then announced, to get another good headline, that they were appointing a waiting list manager in every hospital, which was duly done. Finally, they announced that they were going to set a centrally allocated waiting list budget for every hospital. In the hospital that I visited, the waiting list manager, to meet his waiting list target, had used his waiting list budget, ring-fenced from everything else, to introduce operations on a Sunday performed by locum consultants. That was more expensive but, in theory, should have reduced the waiting lists. However, the hospital did not employ extra sterilisation teams, so by the end of Sunday all the equipment had to be sterilised and no operations could take place on Monday. However, money to deal with that came out of the hospital's general budget, which was not ring-fenced. There was therefore an absurd procedure that resulted in no net improvement in the number of operations but an increase in cost.

That is just a micro-example of the consequences of centralised decision making. The other problem that we face in the health service, which my party is working to remedy, is the fact that the NHS and other public services tend to lack the dynamic forces that drive up quality and efficiency in most areas where choice prevails. If the user of a service can choose between providers, those providers must compete to be at least as good and efficient as the alternative, and that dynamic force of choice determines where resources go. Providers get the extra resources only if they satisfy more customers or users leading to a constant dynamic to improve quality and efficiency.

We therefore need three things in the NHS. First, patients need to be given choice again. We should not forget that one of the early decisions that the Government made for the first time in the history of the health service was to remove the right of patients referred by their GP to go to the hospital of their choice. They can no longer do so, except under the reintroduction of patient choice, whereby they must go through an incredibly bureaucratic procedure with appointed choice advisers. The Government have removed that choice, and we must restore it. Secondly, we must make taxpayers' money follow that choice. In the NHS, if a patient goes to hospital A rather than hospital B, hospital A should get the extra money to provide the resources to treat that patient and reward it for doing so. If hospital B is not getting enough patients, it must take action to remedy the situation. That does not mean closing down or starting a spiral of decline—indeed, there is usually a pattern of improvement. If a hospital realises that people are not coming because, for example, it has a reputation for dirty wards, it will clean those wards. If it has a reputation for not washing hands between operations, it will remedy that practice.

Those things do not cost any extra money. A hospital's consultants may not be performing as well as they should, and may need to be retired and replaced by new consultants. It may cost less to employ a relatively young but extremely able consultant instead of a senior consultant who is past his prime. Those things do not cost extra money, but they drive up quality if we have choice and the taxpayer's money follows that choice. Thirdly, patients must have the information on which to make informed choices if that dynamic is be reintroduced in the health service.

The same applies to schools and elsewhere. The Government deserve some credit for not undermining the long-term benefits that began with the reforms of the 1980s, and for introducing improvements such as the independence of the Bank of England and so on. However, they have started a policy of tax and spend that will undermine our relative advantage and, in due course, our economic performance. It is already undermining our productivity. I remind the House of an issue that I raised in the Budget debate last year. The Chancellor claims credit for a growth rate of 2.3 per cent. this year. Growth is made up of two things—growth per head of those employed and the number of people employed. The number of employed people is rising quite rapidly, partly because we are continuing to reduce unemployment, which is excellent and to the great credit of all those policies that brought it about. The big increase, however, stems from net immigration. I have asked the Chancellor what share of our growth rate is due to net immigration—it is 0.4 per cent. of that 2.3 per cent. Without net immigration, the growth per head of the indigenous or resident population is less than 2 per cent.

We should recognise that it is only if output per head rises that income per head will rise, along with our well-being and the standard of living throughout the economy. The Chancellor should not pretend that growth that comes from increasing our population will necessarily increase net wealth per head. Indeed, it can create problems, which show up on the other side of the equation—housing problems, congestion and increased use of all the public services, to which people who come to work here naturally have the right of access. That does not show up in the Chancellor's figures, but it shows up in the demands on his Budget. The Government have therefore pursued policies that reduce productivity growth per head, and unless and until those policies are changed, there will not be an improvement in the average wealth or the growth of wealth per head, which everyone in this country wants.

2.36 pm

Denzil Davies (Llanelli) (Lab): Unlike the right hon. Member for Hitchin and Harpenden (Mr. Lilley), I welcome the Budget. I congratulate the Chancellor on his eighth Budget and, more importantly, on a remarkable seven to eight years of stability in the British economy, with good rates of growth and low inflation and unemployment. Before I turn to the Budget itself, I should like to refer to the Chancellor's announcement about the Barker report on the supply of land for building. I was not going to mention it, but I changed my mind when the hon. Member for Twickenham (Dr. Cable) said that the Liberal Democrats favoured site value taxation. As a Minister I introduced such taxation.

Rob Marris (Wolverhampton, South-West) (Lab): It was development land tax.

Denzil Davies: My hon. Friend is right—we did not call it site value taxation but development land tax. If my right hon. Friend the Chief Secretary to the Treasury and, indeed, the hon. Member for Twickenham wish to have the benefit of my experience, I am prepared to pass it on—obviously, in private.

To return to the Budget, my right hon. Friend the Chancellor announced that next year the growth rate would increase to 3 to 3.5 per cent. He also announced—the right hon. and learned Member for Folkestone and Hythe (Mr. Howard) made something of this—that borrowing on the Maastricht criteria would be 3.4 per cent. this year, but would go down in future years. I have not seen this year's Red Book, but previous Red Books suggest that despite the reasonable growth that we have experienced in Britain—it is better than most countries, with the possible exception of the United States—the yield from the two main taxes, VAT on goods and income tax on wages and employment, does not appear to have met the Treasury's expectations. That may change in the next few years with increased growth, but I suspect that it will not. I believe that the United States has the same problem. There are many causes, including what the Chancellor described as the new global economic challenge. Some people call that globalisation, some globalism and others global capitalism. However, goods and money can travel quickly and almost unhindered around the globe, and developing countries can speedily acquire technology, expertise and skills that in the past were the preserve of the western democratic countries.

I recently tabled a question requesting from the Treasury the figures for the yield from import VAT in the past three years—the VAT charged on imported goods. The figures were quite surprising. For 2000–01 the yield was £17 billion. For the next year, 2001–02, the yield was £16.194 billion. For 2002–03 the yield was £15. 523 billion. I thought the figures might be the wrong way round. Clearly, the reduction in yield cannot be due to the increase in the volume of imports. There probably has been an increase in the volume of imports—our trade deficit seems to imply that. The reduction in yield might be because of the strength of the pound. Over that period, the pound being relatively strong, the price of imports was reduced.

I suggest that another reason may be the pressure of globalisation. Because countries, especially in the far east, are trying to acquire a greater share of the UK domestic market, they are prepared to reduce their prices, and in fact prices are lower. Of course, if the prices of imported goods go down, the amount of VAT at 17.5 per cent. also goes down. [Interruption.] Does the right hon. Member for Charnwood (Mr. Dorrell) wish to intervene?

Mr. Dorrell: I am grateful to the right hon. Gentleman. I was simply saying—to myself, mainly—"What's wrong with that?"

Denzil Davies: It is not a question of wrong or right. It is a statement of fairly clear fact that if prices go down—including the price of domestic goods, because if domestic manufacturers have to compete with lower-priced imported goods, they have to try to reduce their prices—that must reduce the yield from VAT, unless the volume is sufficient to carry that reduction and VAT stays at 17.5 per cent. That is not a great or a grand point, or even a philosophical point.

Having been surprised by the answer to that question, I tried a similar question to the Inland Revenue in relation to yield from wages and income tax, but all I got was a reference to a website somewhere. I am not sure where the website is; I still cannot find it. I understand that if one looks at the yield from income tax over the past two or three years, and if one subtracts from that yield last year's increase in national insurance, the same phenomenon appears. Despite the growth in the economy, the yield from income tax is not as great as the Treasury hoped. That may well be putting pressure on public expenditure. Unless other taxes are found to make up for it, we are likely to have a greater deficit on the public accounts.

It could be said that globalisation has the effect of depressing wages, and if wages are depressed, the income tax yield is depressed, and another tax or taxes will have to be found. If the House will bear with me, I shall give a constituency example that, in a minuscule way, reflects my argument. I have a car component factory in Llanelli. It has been there for a long time and is under pressure, as most car component factories are. It has had to announce the outsourcing—that is the vogue word—of some 90 jobs to eastern Europe or, probably, to Asia.

We hope that we can save the jobs, but given the fairly buoyant state of the economy, I would expect—especially with the unemployment figures announced today—that a majority of those 90 workers will find other employment, possibly locally, if their jobs go. In my experience, the wages they will be paid in their new employment are likely to be lower than the wages that they now receive from the car component factory. So again, presumably, they will pay a little less in income tax. For some of them, their wages may be driven down so far that if they are family men or women they may have to claim working tax credit, or top-ups as they are called on the other side of the Atlantic. That must involve some kind of public expenditure. If they do not get jobs at all, they will have to be paid jobseeker's allowance, unemployment benefit, or whatever income support is called these days. Again, on a small scale, because of outsourcing and the pressures of globalisation, wages are going down and, as a result, the yield from income tax is falling.

Outsourcing in manufacturing is nothing new. We have seen it over the years. We are now seeing outsourcing in the service sector as well. It would be dishonest of me to pretend that there is an easy answer to the problems. I was surprised when my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry, and the Leader of the House, my right hon. Friend the Member for Neath (Mr. Hain), whose constituency is not far from mine, seemed to say that outsourcing was good for the British economy. Somehow, the argument is that outsourcing enables us to create better quality jobs. What is to stop those better quality jobs in turn being outsourced, I do not know. However, it seems to be the general view that outsourcing is good for the British economy.

I have some candidates for outsourcing, but I shall not go through the whole list. I am sure there are some economic think-tanks around Whitehall that could easily be outsourced, to the benefit of the British economy. I am probably the only Member left in the House who does not believe that central bankers have contributed much to the lower rate of inflation. I believe that that has been caused by globalisation, which has driven down prices and interest rates. The Chancellor was rightly waxing lyrical about the amount of money saved because of debt interest. That has gone down because inflation has gone down. My view is that inflation has gone down towards the realms of deflation because of the global economy.

Be that as it may, there are those of us who do not believe that central bankers have made much contribution. Perhaps we could outsource the Monetary Policy Committee. I am sure the Indians could do the job very well. They are good mathematicians, which means that they could probably be good economists, and they speak English well. We must be careful when we argue that outsourcing is good for the British economy.

The economic and political establishments in Britain are united in the view that globalisation is a universal absolute good and that we must all worship at its altar. Curiously, in that most capitalist of countries, the United States, the view seems to be changing. I know one should not take the views of the United States from primary elections, but it is remarkable how much attention has been visited upon the problems of outsourcing in the primary presidential elections and, I suspect the same will be true in the presidential election in November. US politicians are clearly concerned about outsourcing. It is not just those at the bottom of the wage chain who are concerned. A poll published in The Wall Street Journal recently showed that most concern in the US at outsourcing was felt by people who earned $100,000 or more every year. So outsourcing is gradually moving up the wage chain, and that will present a serious problem.

The classical economic theorists in the United States, as in Britain, say that globalisation is an absolute good and we must not question it in any way. They give a number of reasons why it is good. First, they tell us that globalisation creates more jobs: it certainly has not so far in the United States, as far as I can see. There is a terrible scramble going on in the Bush Administration, aided by the most right-wing chairman of the Federal Reserve the United States has had for some time, with taxes being cut, a huge budget deficit and interest rates at 1 per cent.—in fact, if we take inflation into account, minus 1 per cent.; a huge effort is being made and no jobs, certainly in the private sector, are being created.

People wonder why. The answer, of course, is that jobs are being created in China and various other places. When it is pointed out that the United States has an enormous trade deficit, the classical economists say, "Well, that's all right. It doesn't matter. The Chinese merely reinvest the money in Treasury paper and lend the money back to the United States, so that the United States can buy more goods from China." Fine. I remember the aftermath of the Yom Kippur war in 1972 or 1973 when all the money that was obtained by the Arab countries from selling oil at $70 a barrel, or whatever it was then, had to be reinvested in London and Washington because the Arabs did not have a currency. They do not have a country, therefore they do not have a currency. But the Chinese have a currency. Well, yes, only the Chinese currency, but one of these days the Chinese will reform their financial system. The Chinese currency will become a proper currency and the Chinese will then decide to use the money to buy their own currency or spend it within their own country, taking it away from Treasury assets. Again, the classical economic theory that somehow this huge trade deficit is good, eventually will not work.

Finally, the economists say, "There is nothing new about globalisation, so what is all the fuss about? It is the 20th century that is the aberration." Of course there was globalisation before the first world war. Goods could move freely, perhaps even more freely than now; money could move freely; and certainly persons could move more freely—although not with the speed with which goods, persons and money move today. Yes, indeed there was globalisation before the first world war and for centuries previously, but the real difference is that that globalisation was our globalisation. Western countries were in charge of it. Western empires controlled it. When America became a strong country, America controlled it. The difference with today's globalisation is that it ain't ours. There are new kids on the block, and they are growing and learning fast. The biggest capitalist country on earth is now extremely worried.

Was it Trotsky who said, "You cannot have socialism in one country"? [Interruption.] I am told by my hon. Friend the Member for Middlesbrough (Sir Stuart Bell) that it was Lenin. Perhaps we cannot have socialism in one country. We have globalisation, global capitalism, and the United States, the most capitalistic country of all. It will come to western Europe as well. The Liberals tell us that if we join the euro, somehow everything will be fine and we will get all the investment into Europe. Europe has not started to feel the real pressures that come from globalisation.

Alan Simpson (Nottingham, South) (Lab): Would my right hon. Friend also acknowledge that one of the big changes in the last 20 years is in the nature of capital itself? Those of us who may have no particular affection for capitalism at least recognise that in previous eras the capital was either the ownership of land or of production, and in that context, the owners of that capital also identified themselves with the country that they were in. In the last 20 or 25 years, capital has become finance capital, moved offshore, and its owners have become uninterested in the countries in which they earn their moneys and reluctant to pay tax into anyone's economy.

Denzil Davies: That is absolutely right, and the movement is much more rapid.

To digress, I am reminded of something that I read some time ago about Karl Marx. Apparently, his mother, who was not a disciple of his theories, wrote to him and said, "Karl, you have talked a lot about capital. Why don't you now try to make some?" I apologise for that digression.

My hon. Friend may be right, but there is now a challenge to western economies. We may not want to believe that, but we will have to look at the classical economic rules governing free trade and the movement of capital because at the end of day democratic Governments—we are seeing some of it in the United States—will have to protect the employment of their people, their electorate; they will have to try to preserve the tax base, which is becoming increasingly difficult; and they will also need to safeguard their public services.

Most hon. Members will not agree with me, but during the past 10 or 15 years I have seen democratic Governments in Britain and elsewhere transferring power over the economy to so-called independent or semi-independent bodies—for example, monetary power to central bankers. Fiscal policy is very often entrenched in these rules, and I am glad that the Chancellor has managed to stay within his own golden rule; and we have the rules of international trade as well. With the pressure of globalisation, Governments will have to look at those rules again and, in the interests of their economies and their own electors, will have to do something about it.

The best way to deal with the problem is to recognise it. Then, perhaps, we can come to some kind of mutual international arrangement where the benefits of free trade—because there are benefits—can be adapted and modified to preserve jobs, the tax base and our public services.

2.56 pm

Mr. Stephen Dorrell (Charnwood) (Con): I begin by declaring an interest as a director and shareholder of a manufacturing business, which means that, as always, I listen with interest to what the Chancellor has to say in Budgets. I always listen to what the right hon. Member for Llanelli (Denzil Davies) has to say about globalisation, but on this occasion, if he will forgive me, I do not propose to follow him down that path.

[Mr. Stephen Dorrell]

Whenever a Chancellor speaks with such rapid-fire delivery as this Chancellor does for virtually an hour, there is always something in what he says that can be welcomed, so I should like to begin with that. Both sides of the House welcomed his announcements concerning the efficiency of the Government machine—the first fruits of the Gershon process. If I may say so, my right hon. and learned Friend the Leader of the Opposition is entitled to a share of the credit for that. It is an example of more effective opposition starting to put the Government on their mettle. The fact that my right hon. and learned Friend set up the David James process to shadow the Government's efficiency review is part of what good opposition is about, and I enjoy the fact that we can claim some credit for improving the Government's performance. I hope that the Chief Secretary will be gracious enough to welcome my welcome for the Chancellor's announcement.

I do not think that even my right hon. and learned Friend would claim credit for another of the Chancellor's announcements, which I certainly welcome: that he accepts Kate Barker's recommendation that we establish real estate investment trusts in this country. Where that structure has been established elsewhere in the world it has a proven track record for making the property market more efficient and I warmly welcome the Chancellor's indication that we will go down that road. However, while I welcome that aspect of what Kate Barker had to say, I have much less time for some other aspects on which the Chancellor commented. He appeared to say—I hope that I am wrong—that he was attracted to the idea of regional housing plans as a way of enhancing house building and improving supply and demand in the housing market. If Kate Barker and the Chancellor are two people who think that regional housing plans will improve the efficiency of the housing market, I hope that there are not too many more, because the weight of experience is against the proposition that introducing yet another bureaucratic planning process into the housing market will improve the flow of land and houses on to the market.

The idea that introducing a development land tax will improve the flow of development land on to the market goes to an even greater extent against the weight of experience, including that of the right hon. Member for Llanelli. It is a perfect example of not needing to look into the crystal ball, but simply reading the book. We have been there and had a development tax. It impeded the efficient operation of the development land market and I can envisage no arguments that would support a return to that policy. I therefore hope that the Chancellor's words on that subject were designed to kick the proposal firmly into the long grass.

The Budget was extraordinary for several other reasons. It is the first time in my experience that a Chancellor, in announcing his stance on individual taxes for the following year, chose to say every time a tax was not changed that it was frozen, as if there were an expectation that tax rates would go up. Indeed, there is such an expectation and the Chancellor did nothing to knock it on the head. He appeared to want to claim credit for the fact that the majority of tax rates would not increase. He wanted us to cheer the fact that they were, in his word, "frozen". It is not only because I am old fashioned that I prefer a world where it is assumed that tax rates do not change unless a Chancellor announces that they will, rather than one where it is assumed that they will change unless he announces that they are frozen.

I do not believe that I exaggerate when I say that the Chancellor appeared to spend 20 minutes of his hour-long speech replying to a speech that my right hon. Friend the Member for West Dorset (Mr. Letwin) made two or three weeks ago. That is eloquent testimony to the extent to which the shadow Chancellor determines the terms of debate. The Chancellor devoted 20 minutes of a speech that lasted an hour to commenting on proposals that my right hon. Friend is solely responsible for putting on the table. I strongly support those proposals.

On previous occasions, the Chancellor has chosen, with great theatre, to dress in the clothing of productivity. Numerous initiatives of the sort that he dearly loves are announced, and we are asked to believe that they are designed to improve the productivity of the British economy. I am open to correction, but I do not remember the word "productivity" being used today. I shall explain why that omission may have been wise in the context of the Chancellor's policy package.

Mr. Michael Jack (Fylde) (Con): Has my right hon. Friend noticed that the Chancellor is fond of fiddling with the economy at a micro level to achieve the objectives that he has just presented, but that we never have feedback about whether the initiatives have any measurable success?

Mr. Dorrell: My right hon. Friend is right. Whenever the Chancellor announces periods within which his policies will be assessed, the timetable is always x plus one, where x equals the remaining years of the Parliament. My right hon. Friend is therefore right to point to the Chancellor's predilection for micro-fiddling. To be fair to the right hon. Gentleman, there was slightly less of that this year than in previous years, perhaps because he was trying to avert our eyes from productivity, to which I wish to revert.

The central problem that faced the Chancellor in preparing the Budget—he did not ignore it, but spent much time trying to persuade us that it did not exist—was the sustainability of his budget deficit and borrowing requirement. He should have addressed that key issue when he prepared the Budget. He announced, with a great flourish, that borrowing for the year that is finishing will be, as he predicted in December, £37 billion. It is a commentary on our position that the Chancellor can say, almost with a sigh of relief, that this year's borrowing requirement is "only" £37 billion. It is worth remembering that, at the beginning of the Parliament, he was running a budget surplus of £16 billion and that, at the time of the previous election, he predicted for this year a budget deficit, through the operation of the normal stabilisers, of £10 billion.

The prediction of a budget deficit of £10 billion for this year has been revised repeatedly—I shall not weary hon. Members with an account of every occasion when it has been revised—until it reached £37 billion, which is the outcome in the last month of the year. Against the background of that track record, the central message of the Chancellor's Budget was that the borrowing was okay and we did not need to worry about it. I shall revert to that judgment shortly.

The Chancellor tried to substantiate his assertion that the borrowing was okay by saying that, in the current cycle, the borrowing requirement satisfied his golden rule. I am prepared to believe that that is broadly arithmetically true within the margins of error. However, the analysis ignores a sharply deteriorating trend through the life of the cycle. If the golden rule is fulfilled in the cycle, it will be only through surpluses that were built up at its beginning and resulted from the spending plans that the Chancellor inherited from the previous Conservative Government and did not change. The Chief Secretary shakes his head, yet he is responsible for controlling—or failing to control—public expenditure.

The deteriorating trend in public finances has been corrected throughout the cycle's lifetime. I shall repeat figures about which the Chief Secretary should go to bed worrying. In the Parliament, on the Chancellor's projections, gross domestic product will increase by approximately 25 per cent. and total managed expenditure will rise by 33 per cent. One does not need a degree in mathematics or economics to work out that a trend over five years whereby growth increases by 25 per cent. and managed expenditure rises by 33 per cent. is not sustainable. That is why the Chancellor has a problem when he tries to persuade us that borrowing is under control.

The right hon. Gentleman's answer is that he can sell gilts and finance the debt throughout the lifetime of the Parliament. I agree—there is no obvious problem with the ability to finance the debt in the short term. However, he said two more things with which I fundamentally disagree. First, he said that we should not worry if the borrowing is required to pay for investment—"investment" is a much loved word of the Chancellor's. Unlike "productivity", "investment" appears repeatedly in today's Budget, as it does in all his other speeches. It refers to a variety of expenditure. The Chancellor is fond of saying that he will invest in health or education. While we can all understand the desire to make expenditure on those objects a priority, making something a priority is not the same as properly defining money spent on it as investment. The Chancellor appears to believe that as long as he attaches the label "investment" to a particular spending proposal, that in itself will make it financeable, as debt-financed expenditure that can be outside the operation of the golden rule.

A further inadequacy of that principle is that merely saying that something is investment, even if it is properly described as such in economic terms, is not the same as saying that it is good investment. For example, we have seen substantial sums of money put into the transport infrastructure, with sharply declining rates of return. We must ask whether that investment policy aids or undermines the Chancellor's oft-stated—although not today—commitment to productivity. His desire, expressed in good faith on other occasions, to see the productivity of the British economy improve is not assisted by an approach to investment that simply says that if an item of expenditure is investment, it is all right and we can afford to borrow to finance it.

The Chancellor also said of his current borrowing requirements that no tax increases will be required to finance them, either now or in the future. I have to say that I, in common with most observers, regard that as simply implausible. The Chancellor came quite close to arguing that it was implausible, saying more than once that he had a Budget choice to make: whether he, as Chancellor, should use his judgment to reduce expenditure, to trim his spending plans, to trim borrowing or to cut tax. That was how he saw the choice. That is very close to saying that unless he does one of those things, some time beyond the next election there will be tax increases round the corner. As my right hon. and learned Friend the Leader of the Opposition made clear in his speech, there is no need to look into a crystal ball because we have been here before and can read the book. In the same way as before the 1997 and 2001 elections, the spending plans cannot be supported without tax increases.

In the Budget, the Chancellor is averting his eyes from his commitment to productivity enhancement and from an emerging deficit problem, on the basis of what he hopes to be able to do after the next election. Without having to face up to difficult spending decisions—the Chief Secretary would clearly prefer not to address those with his colleagues, or disappoint their possible expectations—the Chancellor hopes that it will be possible to resolve all the problems after the next election with another round of tax increases. I believe that there is a near certainty of tax increases from a re-elected Labour Government.

I have mentioned the effect of the Chancellor's stance on productivity. My right hon. Friend the Member for Fylde (Mr. Jack) who, like the rest of us on this Bench—my right hon. Friend the Member for Hitchin and Harpenden (Mr. Lilley) and I—is a former Financial Secretary to the Treasury, referred to the Chancellor's long track record of obsessive micro-regulation of the economy. That has the effect of imposing costs on the economy. One of the great deceptions of being a Minister is to believe that we can require other people to do things, and that that is free. It is too easy to think that, because we in the Treasury, or in our Department, do not have to pick up the tab and are obscured from any resource implications, we can therefore make a decision without having to find the resources with which to implement it. In fact, regulation costs money. It imposes a cost, and unless it enhances output it also imposes reduced productivity on people elsewhere in the economy.

This Chancellor has a track record, over the whole of his chancellorship, of imposing extra costs—as have the Government more generally. Many of those costs are not huge but, as my right hon. Friend the Member for Hitchin and Harpenden stressed, incrementally over a long period they have the effect of increasing [illegible] cost burden, and so reducing the productivity, of the private sector of the economy. Despite the fact that the Chancellor enjoys talking about being the productivity Chancellor, he has on previous occasions marched resolutely in the wrong direction on that matter. Today he had an opportunity to start to reverse that trend, but he did not take it where the private sector is concerned.

[Mr. Dorrell]

I see that the Chief Secretary is holding up one page of the Budget—[Interruption.] Perhaps it is 30 pages, but that is out of several hundred published today. I suspect that that is simply another lot of micro-regulation that the Chancellor neglected to report to the House when giving his Budget speech.

If it is true for the private sector that the Government's record on securing output for their expenditure input is truly appalling, it is true in spades for the public sector. A core criticism that will be made of the Chancellor's tenure—as I said in an intervention that my right hon. Friend the Member for Hitchin and Harpenden was gracious enough to take—is that although he has unleashed barrel-loads of money on key public services, the priority of which is not in dispute between the two sides of the House, he has totally forgotten about the conditionality that he said at the beginning of this phase of his Chancellorship would be a precondition to that money's being made available.

My right hon. Friend the Member for Hitchin and Harpenden gave some telling figures for the national health service, which I myself had noted down to cite. A 37 per cent. increase in expenditure on the NHS since 1999 has produced an increase of a fraction under 5 per cent. in the number of completed consultant episodes. Despite that huge increase in expenditure, average mean or median waiting times in the NHS have been extended. I shall not spend a long time talking about the NHS today, but a key reason for those problems—quite apart from the cost and salary issues in the service itself—is the Government's unwillingness to face up to the crisis in the residential care sector, which is backing up into hospitals and manifesting itself in the NHS as blocked beds. There are 13 per cent. fewer beds for residential care of the elderly available in the UK today than there were in 1997. We do not need detailed knowledge of that subject to know that demand is rising for that aspect of care. However, under the Government's watch, the availability of such care has been reduced by 13 per cent.

Those examples are aspects of a much bigger problem with the efficiency of public sector operations. The inefficient use of money in the public sector is a problem in itself, because it undermines the quality of services. It is also a problem for the wider economy, because it ties up in the inefficient delivery of core public services—whose importance we all understand—resources that could otherwise be used to assist the general productivity of the economy and deliver improved living standards to all.

That is why the shadow Chancellor, in the speech that the Chancellor took 20 minutes to reply to today, stressed that the Conservative priority is now to ensure that, in the core public services of schools and the NHS, we provide space and political support for the reform that the Prime Minister and the Chancellor say they recognise is needed but for which they have lost the political will. The reality is that the Government will not deliver world-class public services. Furthermore, by failing to do so, they will undermine the productivity of our wider economy. They will go on doing that until they address the need for real reform and real productivity enhancement within the public services.

The central message of this Budget is that Labour will deliver more spending. The Chancellor made that crystal clear. That is lesson one. Lesson two is that Labour has lost interest in reform. There are two consequences of that: more tax and poor public services. I am pleased to say that my party is now starting to evolve a real alternative, which involves real reform and, critically, better-funded public services. We offer better public services and an end to Labour tax increases, and that will come not a moment too soon.

Sir Stuart Bell (Middlesbrough) (Lab): I welcome the opportunity to participate in this debate and to follow the right hon. Member for Charnwood (Mr. Dorrell). I listened to his speech with great interest. As he said, we have among us today a number of former Financial Secretaries—talk about yesterday's men from yesterday's century! We have the hon. Members for Sevenoaks (Mr. Fallon), for Sutton Coldfield (Mr. Mitchell), for North-West Norfolk (Mr. Bellingham) and for West Derbyshire (Mr. McLoughlin), and the right hon. Member for Fylde (Mr. Jack). Of course, I exempt from the term "yesterday's men" my right hon. Friend the Member for Llanelli (Denzil Davies).

Interesting though the speech of the right hon. Member for Charnwood was, he was a little curmudgeonly in his summary. When he mentioned the surplus that we had of about £16 billion, which is now a deficit of £37 billion, the Chief Secretary reminded him that in 1997 the Conservatives left us with a £51 billion deficit, which reminded me of Joseph and his coat of many colours. I think that it is perfectly legitimate for the Second Church Estates Commissioner to refer to that. Joseph interpreted the dream of the pharaoh, who had dreamt of seven fat cows and seven lean cows. Joseph told him that that meant that we have seven prosperous years, when the economic cycle is in our favour, and seven lean years when the economic cycle turns the other way, and that we must save in the good years for the bad years. The fact that the Chancellor of the Exchequer had a £16 billion surplus and that we are now able, as a nation, to live quite comfortably with a £37 billion deficit within the framework of the Budget is something that I shall be happy to delineate later.

Mr. Jack: Does the hon. Gentleman acknowledge that, by the time the 1997 general election came round, the controls that we had imposed on public expenditure were biting, that tax receipts were rising and that our monetary policy—as witnessed after the first year of the Labour Government—enabled the United Kingdom to hit its inflation target spot on?

Sir Stuart Bell: I remind the right hon. Gentleman that the Chancellor of the Exchequer at the time of that election stated that he had laid a series of elephant traps for the future Labour Government. That is precisely what he did with his toughening of public expenditure. Many Labour Members regretted that we stayed with that framework, as it did not help the economy. What did help the economy, by reducing the inflation rate, was the independence of the Bank of England, which the present Chancellor brought about.

The right hon. Member for Charnwood made a good point about freezing tax rates, but we know what the Conservatives are building up to at the next general election. It was Franklin D. Roosevelt who said, "We have nothing to fear but fear itself", and the Conservative Opposition are going to try to terrify the British public by telling them that the Labour Government have hidden tax proposals and that there will be a price to pay. I remind the right hon. Gentleman of two promises. The first was made by the then Conservative Opposition before the general election in 1979, when they said that they would not increase VAT. After the election, it went up from 8 per cent. to 15 per cent. The present Prime Minister made the second promise when he was Leader of the Opposition, and it was that a Labour Government would not increase direct taxes. In their seven years in office, our Government have not done so.

Mr. Dorrell: What about national insurance?

Sir Stuart Bell: I am always grateful for a sedentary intervention. I was Parliamentary Private Secretary to Lord Hattersley when he was deputy Leader of the Opposition. We cleverly put a question to the former Prime Minister, Lady Thatcher, to ask whether there was a difference between national insurance contributions and taxation, and of course she said no. I give the same response to the right hon. Gentleman.

Mr. Dorrell: The hon. Gentleman is citing no less a person than the former Prime Minister, Lady Thatcher, to confirm that he was wrong to say that there had been no increase in direct taxation.

Sir Stuart Bell: Lady Thatcher made the point, and I am not going to try to contradict what she said in her years of office.

I shall turn to the speech made by my right hon. Friend the Member for Llanelli, who has quietly left the Chamber. That is one of the facts of life in this place. He stated that Leon Trotsky had said that socialism was not for one country but for all, and I pointed out that actually Vladimir Ilyich Lenin had said that. I am sure that someone out there in the country who reads Hansard will write to me, giving me chapter and verse and referring me to the precise page on which Leon Trotsky made that statement. Anyway, it was part of the communist dogma at the time that communism—rather than socialism—was universal and should be exported. I have to say with some regret that it was exported, which created misery and havoc for some 80 years. That is not to say that communism and enlightened socialism are the same thing—they are not.

My right hon. Friend the Member for Llanelli mentioned the pressures of globalisation, but that part of his speech was more fitting to the last century than to this one. However we look at the world economy, globalisation is here to stay. The Chancellor's speech addressed that fact by addressing the challenges in relation to monetary and fiscal policy priorities. I was interested that the right hon. Member for Charnwood referred to Aneurin Bevan and the crystal ball. Aneurin Bevan also said that the language of socialism was the language of priorities, and today we have seen the Chancellor prioritising education and health in the interest of our country and of trying to steer our economy in the right direction to deal with the globalised threats and challenges that we face.

I am glad that the right hon. Member for Hitchin and Harpenden (Mr. Lilley) is still with us. He will remember, as a former Secretary of State, that we had many an intelligent debate, especially on a Friday, on economic matters, when I was on the Opposition Benches and he sat over here. I enjoyed those debates and I enjoyed his speech today. He made an important statement when he said that short-term decisions do not create the right climate for the economy; that is achieved through long-term decisions all coming together. He was right about that. He was also right to say that delivery is a matter for politicians, statesmen and Ministers, because policy and delivery are not necessarily the same thing. He recognised the fact that the delivery of a policy can take some time, and we have to recognise it as well.

I know that the right hon. Gentleman has a house in France. I congratulate him on that, as someone who lived there for 20 years. I admire his taste; to live in France is an excellent thing to do. Some of his comments about France, however, did not reflect my understanding of the French economy. He talked about the growth gap, but France has lower growth than we have.

He talked about VAT, which is 19.5 per cent. in France. He also talked about employment, social charges and the tax burden. Employers in France tell me that for every €100 they pay to a salaried worker, there are €46 of social charges, so 46 per cent. is added to the wage bill because of France's health, social insurance and taxation structure.

Mr. Lilley: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for giving way and, in the spirit of constructive debate in which he is speaking, may I make it clear that I was not speaking about the performance of France? I was referring to the average of all other countries on the continent relative to us. I suggested not that France is superior to us, but that it is moving in the right direction—in due course, that will have beneficial effects on its poor performance—while we are moving in the wrong direction, which will damage our good performance. I hope that I have made things clearer, if I did not make them clear before.

Sir Stuart Bell: I am grateful for the right hon. Gentleman's intervention. He is right in the sense that France is seeking to move in a particular direction. He mentions the average of all the various figures, but the fact is that growth rates in France are lower, unemployment is higher and it has severe administrative burdens and severe problems. All of France's scientists have decided to go on strike because there is not enough funding for them, and every day French newspapers report mayhem somewhere or other. Although I might be a Francophile, I am not enthusiastic about comparing the French economy with ours.

The right hon. Gentleman mentioned a report by the Organisation for Economic Co-operation and Development, which I am happy to look at, but he is wrong to say that Government investment over seven years has not yielded any improvement in public services. He also spoke of perception over reality. The other day, I visited the James Cook university hospital in my constituency, where waiting lists are coming down. We are also tackling the question of illness and disease in the hospital.

[Sir Stuart Bell]

The right hon. Gentleman referred to a point made by my hon. Friend the Member for Warwick and Leamington (Mr. Plaskitt). We have to make this point, which I remember well: a Conservative Government began to dismantle hospital cleaning services and introduced contracting out. Whether it was right to do those things or not, the fact is that they began at that time. If I may say so, the problems that we face relate, with some longitude and latitude, to the past.

I would not want to make a political point—not even to encourage my right hon. and hon. Friends—but listening to the debate and the speech of the Leader of the Opposition I realised that the Conservative party is not yet a party of the 21st century. It still has not come to terms with the global economy, the changed nature of our society or the view, which my right hon. Friend the Chancellor expounded, that monetary and fiscal policy must be brought together.

The Conservatives see things in isolation, not in the round, and they seem to denigrate the fact that we have placed so much emphasis on education. Again, I come back to my constituency. My hon. Friend the Member for Middlesbrough, South and Cleveland, East (Dr. Kumar) referred to the Prime Minister's visit to his constituency 10 days ago to open a city academy. The Prime Minister also came to my constituency to open a new wing of the university. When I was our parliamentary candidate in Middlesbrough in 1983, we could not even get 6,000 students at our polytechnic. We now have about 21,000 students at our university. The centre of our town has been changed. We have a town campus with the university at the centre of it all.

When I visit the schools in my constituency, I see the computer equipment that they have, the money that they have been given—directly by our Government—and the improvements in standards. I would say that the quality of life has changed in my constituency and there is an improvement in public services. We cannot use what I call the wildebeest theory: in Africa, a herd of 100 wildebeest run towards the river, but two decide to skip off and are eaten by lions. We cannot spend our time, rather than praising our public services, taking the isolated case of a trolley in a corridor and saying, "That is our health service." That is not our health service.

We must consider the question of choice, which was mentioned by the right hon. Member for Hitchin and Harpenden. My hospital in Middlesbrough is now one of the finest heart centres in the country and we have patients coming from Newcastle. Early on in my time, patients went from Middlesbrough to Newcastle for heart operations. People come the other way now; they have choice.

We now have a spinal unit in our town, which is the centre for the whole north-east, so there is choice in our health service. We are not complaining about the health service—I have never met anyone in my constituency who has left hospital complaining.

I also want to refer to lifting aspirations. There is not only a concrete improvement in the services, hospitals and education system in our town, but a lifting of aspiration. People in my constituency think that they can achieve things—it can be done. That is one of the lasting gifts of our Labour Government. The hon. Member for Twickenham (Dr. Cable), who spoke for the Liberals, claimed that the euro is the most important aspect of our economy. I am a great fan of the European single currency. I believe that we should join and that we will do so at some point, but, as St. Francis said, "Make me pure, but not yet."

Mr. Lilley: It was St. Augustine.

Sir Stuart Bell: I am grateful to the right hon. Gentleman. Hansard may have had me wrong had it not been for that correction. I say, yes, we should join the single currency, but of course we should wait until the conditions are right. When they are right, it will be appropriate to join.

My right hon. Friend the Chancellor went to great lengths today to talk about stability and growth. He brought stability and growth together. Japan had stability for many years, but no growth. There can be stability without growth, but my right hon. Friend is saying that we can bring the two together, as one. That is part of his long-term plan.

One thing that strikes me about my right hon. Friend is that he has a vision. When I used to go to Sunday school, a Methodist preacher would stand up—my right hon. Friend the Chief Secretary will understand this with his religious background—and say, "Where are the men of vision?" Well, there was a man of vision at the Dispatch Box today.

My right hon. Friend the Chancellor has a vision for the global economy, stability, growth and priorities such as health and education. His vision means that he will not freeze, to use the word employed by the right hon. Member for Charnwood, the increase in expenditure on these important matters. The Budget is excellent, and I say that modestly, non-politically and objectively as one who follows the global economy and the changes that are necessary.

You will not believe this, Madam Deputy Speaker, although possibly you will, but I am on my feet as Second Church Estates Commissioner. Today, the Chancellor extended the listed places of worship grants scheme until 2006. He knows, as does the House, that the Church has had many discussions on a permanent arrangement for reducing VAT on church repairs. Those have involved the Economic Secretary, my right hon. Friend the Chancellor himself and Mr. Frits Bolkestein, the European Commissioner in charge of VAT affairs.

The Church of England VAT group, and, ecumenically, the Churches Main Committee under the chairmanship of the Bishop of Derby have been persistent in keeping the issue at the forefront of economic and national debate, for which I thank them. Parishes have also campaigned vigorously. Right hon. and hon. Members have been particularly assiduous, and I am particularly grateful to the hon. Member for Vale of York (Miss McIntosh) for keeping this flame burning.

In his Budget of 2000, the Chancellor graciously introduced a grants scheme that reduced VAT on church repairs to listed buildings from 17.5 per cent. to 5 per cent. Today, he extended the scheme, in terms not only of time but of money. VAT has effectively been reduced to zero per cent., which is welcome news for those within the Church who are seeking to restore listed places of worship. I urge parish churches to come forward with their schemes so that the Chancellor's new arrangements can be fully taken up.

As the House knows, our churches play an inherent part in our national life and in our communities. They support charity work and their influence may be found in national and local government and in industry. Our church services, of whatever religion, are not an adjunct to reading the Sunday newspapers or watching football on television. Religion is not an oddity within society in the face of what is now becoming an aggressive and belligerent secularity. It is a deep and abiding influence throughout national life.

It is, of course, not possible to anticipate a time when all church repairs will be completed—the painting and repainting of the Forth bridge is as nothing compared with the consistent work in upholding our national heritage. Even the best materials will need to be replaced over time. With 13,000 listed churches within the Church of England, and some 20,000 listed churches in total, the cycle of repair and renewal will be ongoing, but will be greatly aided by the Chancellor's announcement today.

To put the scale of repair in perspective, parochial returns show that the Church of England spent £86 million on major repairs in 2001. A report has identified a repair need of some £110 million per annum. Given the scale of the problem, the Church greatly appreciates the fact that the Chancellor has not looked on the grants scheme solely in financial terms, but has understood its importance to our national heritage and our national life. The scheme offers congregations, all of whom depend on their own voluntary organisational and fundraising abilities, a much-needed incentive to carry out works and repairs in a way that benefits those who regularly visit churches. We are thankful for the Chancellor's statement today. It is a great gift to the Church and a great act of generosity on his part. The extension of the scheme is, as he declared, in the national as well as the Church interest and it is welcomed and appreciated within the Church of England and other Churches.

3.42 pm

Mr. Michael Jack (Fylde) (Con): Listening to the hon. Member for Middlesbrough (Sir Stuart Bell), I thought that he was about to rewrite the first line of a well-known hymn to read, "All things Brown and beautiful". I share his delight at the announcement on VAT changes in respect of church refurbishment. I look with renewed optimism at the prospect that the refurbishment of St. John's in Lytham, which I attend at 8 o'clock on Sunday mornings, will eventually benefit from that.

I and my right hon. and hon. Friends have clocked up many Budgets, and having sat though a Budget speech, it is an interesting first challenge to say, "Well, what did you think of it?" Some Budgets are full of whiz-bang excitement. Everybody charges out to the media to make great statements about how the world will be a much better place because the Chancellor has done X, Y and Z. I do not think that there are any fireworks in this Budget. In fact, the Chancellor made a virtue out of announcing little by way of significant change in how the UK tax structure will operate. He seemed, however, to complete the public expenditure round in allocating at least half the money to health, education and defence. If those are the beneficiaries, I would not like to be in the Departments that remain to have their moneys allocated.

I suspect that this Budget will be seen as a bit like one of those Chinese meals in which one seems to get an awful lot, but the next day one wakes up and cannot quite remember what one ate the night before. The Chancellor's speech required a lot of padding to reach an hour in length. In terms of novelty and benefit for the British economy, however, the message was simply, "Steady as we go." It is interesting to couple one of the answers that the Prime Minister gave to a question from my right hon. and learned Friend the Leader of the Opposition in Prime Minister's Question Time with the words uttered by the Chancellor.

The Prime Minister went on at length to point out that he remained pledged effectively to no change in the main marginal rates of our tax system. We now know that the main standard rate of tax will not be changed, and indeed the higher rate will not be changed. That rules out any changes in personal taxes. I am sure that Treasury Ministers will be only too happy to say that they want to run a competitive corporation and company tax system, so another possibility is ruled out. I therefore conclude that when the Chancellor must look for new resources—as is inevitable, for reasons that I will explain shortly—it is likely that other taxes will be raised in due course, or alternatively that new taxes will be devised.

None of that should surprise us. Over the period covered by the "Financial Statement and Budget Report", tax receipts again constitute a rising share of gross domestic product. The share increases from the 2002–03 outturn figure of 35.6 per cent. of GDP to the figure projected for 2008–09 of 38.3 per cent. We can safely say that the tax burden under Labour is increasing. To an extent, that too is not surprising. As others have pointed out, there is a fragility in the receipts structure faced by the Chancellor. The right hon. Member for Llanelli (Denzil Davies) put his finger on it when he drew attention to leaks in both VAT and, as we know, other revenue receipts. They have made it more difficult for the Chancellor to generate the extra moneys that he needs to sustain his substantial and ambitious spending programmes.

I question the assumptions that underpin some of the numbers in the Red Book. We are consistently told that those numbers are the subject of National Audit Office scrutiny and audit. I shall choose just one year's statistics from the various publications produced by the Treasury over the past couple of years—the projections made in "Budget 2002" for the financial year 2004–05, on which we are about to embark. On the basis of all the auditing assumptions, net borrowing was projected at £13 billion. The same auditing exercise meant that in "Budget 2003" the figure for the same year had risen to £24 billion. The document published today shows that the same exercise—the same validation of the Chancellor's assumptions, numbers and calculations—has raised the figure to £31 billion.

[Mr. Michael Jack]

I begin to question whether the exercise of validation is actually capable of producing valid numbers. As Treasury Ministers know, a certain amount of horse trading is inevitably involved in the construction of a Budget. A Chancellor may well be audited for some of his assumptions, but it is clear that his judgments are still down to him.

In the context of accurate data to justify what the Chancellor has presented to us, the figures that I have taken from past Red Books and the pre-Budget report bring the validity of the numbers that he gave into sharp focus. If receipts are fragile, as evidence suggests they are, the time has come for the Treasury to be a deal more transparent in publishing the models and methodology according to which they calculate the UK's tax receipts. It is very happy to put the Treasury model into the public domain, as has been the practice of Governments for some time, so that people can understand how the economy in total works; but when pressed Treasury Ministers say, "It has not been published before, and we do not need to publish it." There is now a case for publication of the data and modelling that determine our tax receipts. If we are to be able to track the progress of the economy, that is the kind of detail that we need.

I welcome some elements of the Budget. I am glad that the Chancellor is going to study possible sources of inflationary pressure. He is right to concentrate on that and ensure that, when problems can be predicted, action is taken to tackle them.

I also welcome the change in venture capital trusts, which have been the Cinderella of new investment, and I am pleased that the Chancellor has given a boost to investment in small and medium-sized companies through that mechanism.

To return to tax, while the Chancellor was at pains to stress the areas that he was freezing, he tried to make a great virtue of the fact that he was raising the inheritance tax threshold to £263,000. It is little wonder that people spend so much money trying to find legitimate schemes to avoid paying inheritance tax when they realise that, in many cases, their single biggest asset—their domestic residence—is likely to be heavily taxed. Those houses have been bought and paid for out of earned income, and many people have an innate wish to leave something to the next generation. Inheritance tax threatens that, and I personally believe that it has had its time and should go, especially if 95 per cent. of estates, as the Chancellor says, are not affected by it. There may be characteristics of the other estates that could be taxed in other ways, leaving the 95 per cent. to pass on the wealth without having to find ways of avoiding inheritance tax.

Rob Marris: The right hon. Gentleman has just suggested that the Government forgo a considerable source of revenue. He and his colleagues have suggested that the Government do not have enough revenue, so will he say how much the abolition of inheritance tax would cost in the next financial year?

Mr. Jack: I apologise for not having declared my business interests as a company director at the outset—the omission was a discourtesy, but I now correct it on the record.

In response to the hon. Gentleman's question, I have the luxury of being able to say what I would like to see. If I had access to the data that I used to have as a Treasury Minister, I might well be able to give him chapter and verse on how the missing billions could be made up, but there comes a time when we have to look at taxes in principle and see whether they are still doing the job that they were designed to do. Inheritance tax was brought in when we did not have the current range of taxes on income, investments and other resources. I would not dispute that the £4.5 billion involved is a significant sum, but it is not so significant that it could not be recovered by some other mechanism. That is my personal view. It does not bind my party, which has its own views.

Rob Marris: I believe that the figure for the forgone taxation for next year would be £2.8 billion, which is a considerable sum. It is no good the right hon. Gentleman just saying, "Well, I'm in opposition, so I needn't make any positive proposals." That does not help public debate.

Mr. Jack: With great respect, that is not what I said. I said that I had the luxury of being able to give a personal view. [Interruption.] My right hon. Friend the Member for Charnwood (Mr. Dorrell) informs me that inheritance tax amounted to £2.5 billion, which is less than I had thought. Given the resources that I formerly had, I am sure that I could find ways of recovering some of that money.

The Chancellor, who was seduced by the film luvvies, has now realised what a waste of money it was to plough resources into film finance, and he is now having to change and restrict the mechanisms. He probably blew far more on one year's profligacy on the film industry than my modest change, which would be of great benefit to so many people with modest means, would cost. He tried to make a virtue of those changes, but it was he who created the problem in the first place.

The Chancellor said that he hoped to recover some of the missing tax billions through new anti-avoidance procedures. But with due respect to him and the Paymaster General—she is in her place on the Front Bench—part of the reason why people have such fun with the tax system devising complex avoidance schemes is that the tax law itself has not been written well enough, or with sufficient perceptiveness in terms of what the real world would make of such proposals.

It is all right asking people to self-report to the Treasury any new tax avoidance scheme, so that the Inland Revenue can immediately leap into action and close tax loopholes, but the Revenue and the Treasury would be better advised to use some resources to carry on with the tax law rewrite exercise and expand its scope and scale. Plain English could thus be employed as rapidly as possible on the rest of the tax code so that people could with greater clarity understand the vulnerabilities of the tax system and rules that in many cases were devised for a world different from today's financial and accounting regime. Avoidance exists only because people look at the wording of the tax statute and take a view of its applicability that differs from that of the original authors, whose words we enshrine into law yearly through the Finance Bill.

One intriguing thing about the process of closing tax loopholes, as described in the Inland Revenue's press notice 5, is that there is absolutely no prediction or measurement of effectiveness. No target is set and we have no idea what the successes will be. Having listened to the Inland Revenue when I was in the Treasury, I know that its major company inspection exercises reveal threats to the tax system. Very large sums of money are presented to the Minister with responsibility for the tax system with a view to protecting it, and measures are introduced. But if the Chancellor is investing a great deal in avoidance, he will already know what kind of avoidance schemes have been discovered. There is no mention of how much money has been identified by the work to date, and there is no target for the future. I am beginning to think that this is a last-ditch pre-Budget effort to say, "I am shoring up tax revenues, but I am not quite certain what kind of fishing expedition I am on."

Mr. David Laws (Yeovil) (LD): In fact, the right hon. Gentleman is being kind to the Chancellor. The largest item of tax avoidance that the Chancellor has identified is the loophole that he himself opened two years ago when he introduced a 0 per cent. corporation tax rate, which caused so many businesses to incorporate. By closing that loophole, he will take £850 million of yield over the next three years.

Mr. Jack: I am most grateful to the hon. Gentleman for reinforcing my argument. Perhaps this lack of awareness of what is going on in the real world of tax accounts for the figures in table C of the Red Book, which is entitled, "Changes in current receipts by tax since Budget 2003 and the 2003 Pre-Budget Report". The table shows that net taxes and social security contributions for 2003–04 are down by £4.7 billion, and down by £5.5 billion for 2004–05. There is a haemorrhaging of tax receipts, which, for the reasons that I gave earlier, brings into question the validity of the receipts line in today's Red Book. By definition, that also brings into question the amount of borrowing that the Government have put before the House today.

My right hon. Friend the Member for Charnwood challenged the Chief Secretary to the Treasury by saying that "productivity", like "prudence" and "savings", was a word that seemed to be absent from the Chancellor's speech. I do not know which table the Chief Secretary subsequently waved at my right hon. Friend, but I draw his attention to box 3.1, on page 49 of the Red Book, which points out the historical problem of productivity in the United Kingdom. It confirms that

"workers in the US are still just under 30 per cent more productive than UK workers."

It goes on to point out that, although there was a little growth in productivity in this country between 1997 and 2001, we are still struggling. That is despite the fact that the Chancellor has made a huge virtue out of all the micro-measures—fiddling in the general activity of the economy—that he has taken to deal with productivity. I believe that there is severe doubt about whether the current Budget proposals will have any measurable effect on the serious problem of productivity and performance in this country.

Mr. Plaskitt: The right hon. Gentleman cites box 3.1 in the Red Book, so why does he not quote what is stated above the table—that the new data show "that since 1997, UK productivity has grown faster than its main competitors."?

Mr. Jack: That intervention shows that it may have grown faster, but my God it is still lagging behind and still has a lot of running to do to catch up. It is the trick of statistics. A really good position on percentage increases will depend on how low the base that a country starts from is. I am surprised that the hon. Gentleman quotes that figure, when the long-term data show that, since the Government came into office, despite all their protestations, they have done little properly to deal with the problem of productivity.

I shall now move on to environmental taxes. I must say how disappointed I am that in this Budget the Chancellor has sustained the duty reduction on biodiesel at 20p per litre. I suggested after last year's Budget—and, indeed, in debates over the Finance Bill and during the course of the Environment, Food and Rural Affairs Committee inquiry into biofuels—a wholly cost-free method whereby the Treasury could have its cake and eat it. Users could pay the increased costs of the biofuels and the Treasury would not be troubled to increase the dispensation on duty to the 30p currently required by the industry. If we simply applied the principles of the renewables obligation from the field of electricity to biofuels, we could have our incorporation at between 2 and 5 per cent. and meet the European target with no cost to the Treasury—yet the way of achieving that has not even been acknowledged. If we are serious about CO_2 reductions, that matter must be attended to.

The Chancellor made great play in the Budget speech of his efforts to reduce the size of the civil service. In due course, I hope that more details will be published, particularly regarding parts of the world outside London, where there is also a high dependency on civil service work. In that context, I think particularly of my part of the north-west of England. We are now well into the second term of a Labour Government, who have to employ outside people to identify the waste that sheer profligacy and expenditure on public services actually causes. That shows the lack of careful monitoring of how public moneys have been used. The public will view what the Chancellor said with a degree of scepticism. They know that, since the Government came to power, the average household has had to pay an additional £5,000 in tax burden. Some of that money has simply been squandered in additional waste by Departments, which now have to be cleaned up by the so-called Gershon inquiry.

I want to conclude my remarks with two points: one about expenditure, the other about savings. On expenditure, I was pleased to hear the Chancellor say that the defence budget would not be the subject of cuts. If he really wants to contribute to manufacturing industry in the north-west of England, will he ensure that his defence colleagues come to a conclusion quickly on the second tranche of the Eurofighter Typhoon? About 40,000 aerospace jobs depend on that order being concluded. The Government say that they want the aircraft and that they remain committed to the 232 Eurofighter Typhoons, so will they kindly make their minds up, sign up and get on with buying them?

[Mr. Jack]

I conclude with some observations on savings. The Chancellor did not touch on that area of economic policy. As has been mentioned, the savings ratio has effectively halved, having from fallen from 10 to roughly 5 per cent. under this Government. Personal savings have been bashed as a result of the failure of endowment policies, the ending of tax credits and personal equity plans and the cuts in benefits from individual savings accounts that will soon come in. What on earth is the Government's savings policy?

The new children's tax fund announced by the Chancellor may be a gain, but it does not address the need to help and encourage people to save in the way that the Government believe to be necessary. For example, endowment policies have failed to deliver the funds needed to pay off mortgages. So far, in the wake of the Penrose report, the Government have turned their face against compensation. Surely, the Government should have used the tax system to encourage people to save for all the contingencies that they face? Instead, they have done nothing. That is a dereliction of duty by the Chancellor, who has missed a Budget opportunity.

Opposition Members have pointed out the good bits and the bad bits in the Budget. The Chancellor has much to do to make credible the numbers that he has put forward today. One certainty is that new and increased tax revenues will have to be found somewhere if the Chancellor is to meet his spending obligations.

Mr. Barry Gardiner (Brent, North) (Lab): I want to share two secrets with the House. The first is what my hon. Friend the Member for Nuneaton (Mr. Olner) told me earlier. Since he gave up smoking, he said, Budget debates have not been as exciting as they used to be. I suspect that even he, though, did not anticipate the effect of the response to the Budget by the Leader of the Opposition, because my second secret is that the Home Secretary's dog aroused severe mirth among the occupants of the Treasury Bench. Opposition Members did not understand why there was so much laughter, but what happened was that, while the right hon. and learned Member for Folkestone and Hythe (Mr. Howard) was speaking, the dog groaned, rolled over on her back and put her rigid legs straight up in the air. Although I do not think that the right hon. and learned Gentleman's remarks had killed the dog, they may have killed off enthusiasm among Opposition Back Benchers.

It is never easy to respond to the Chancellor of the Exchequer, but the job cannot have been made any easier for the Leader of the Opposition by the Office for National Statistics press release of 25 February. It showed that economic growth in 2003 had been revised upwards, from 2.1 per cent. to 2.3 per cent. That was exactly in line with the Chancellor's Budget prediction last year, and contrary to every prediction made by the Opposition.

It is worth surveying the economic landscape if we want to understand the challenges that my right hon. Friend the Chancellor has faced. At an international level, there has been continuing economic depression and currency instability, yet the Chancellor has managed to keep the British economy on a steady course while at the same time delivering historically high levels of investment to our public services.

My right hon. Friend the Chancellor's stewardship has ensured that business has faith in the long-term governance of the economy. The upturn in the world economy will allow British business, and our economy, to grow further. Lately, chief executives have exhibited increased optimism, while company balances look healthier and mergers and acquisitions are increasing. That, of course, is just the view of the Confederation of British Industry.

I remind Opposition Members that they presided over not one but two recessions while they were supposed to be in control of the economy, and that support for the Chancellor has not come from Labour Members alone. Praise has come from some unlikely quarters. After the pre-Budget statement, the director general of the CBI, Digby Jones, said:

"The Chancellor is right to raise borrowing rather than go for spending cuts or tax increases at this stage."

Despite external economic factors, the UK economy continues to be insulated from what appears to be happening across the rest of Europe.

The speeches by the right hon. Members for Hitchin and Harpenden (Mr. Lilley) and for Charnwood (Mr. Dorrell) were interesting. The right hon. Member for Charnwood is unfortunately no longer in his place, but he made some particularly interesting remarks about Government debt. If one compares the £37.5 billion cash figure for debt this year with the situation a decade ago at the end of the last world recession, when the deficit in this country was equivalent to £90 billion, or around two-and-a-half times higher than it is today, one understands Conservative Members' crocodile tears and mock outrage about current Government borrowing. Net borrowing adjusted for the economic cycle is just 2.4 per cent. this year and will decrease over the next five years to 1.6 per cent. of GDP.

Sir Stuart Bell: Since my hon. Friend has referred to the speech by the right hon. Member for Charnwood (Mr. Dorrell), will he comment on the section about the housing market that seemed to pour cold water on the Chancellor's proposal to have regional house building programmes? Does he agree that the Chancellor's course of action in seeking to liberate more housing on the market to attack price inflation is better than interfering with the mortgage market?

Mr. Gardiner: My hon. Friend makes an important point about the need to spread productivity throughout the regions in a sensitive way, which is exactly what the Chancellor is doing. The Barker report, which is welcome, will be critical to the measures that the Government take in order to get the housing market right.

Returning to my theme, there will be a close call on the golden rule, but all economic commentators now agree that the Chancellor will hit the target. The Treasury says that the margin will be £11 billion, and even the Institute for Fiscal Studies predicts that it will be spot on. When Conservative Members seek to decry the fact that the golden rule will just be met, that view must be contrasted with their claims of a year or more ago when they discussed a possible excess of £100 billion. The argument was that that money would have been taken but not utilised—in other words, the Government would have set up a slush fund rather than use the money productively in the economy. It is important to compare Conservative Members' remarks on Budget day with the comments they made six months before at the time of the pre-Budget statement and a year before when last year's Budget was announced, because their remarks are invariably inconsistent.

Mr. Jack: The hon. Gentleman has just used the word "inconsistent". Will he accept that we have a right to question today's numbers in the Red Book given that only two years ago we were told that borrowing would be £11 billion, whereas today's figure is £37 billion? We have every right to question the validity of those numbers given the Chancellor's benchmarking about prudence.

Mr. Gardiner: I have no cause to say that the right hon. Gentleman should not examine the figures—indeed, it is incumbent on all hon. Members to examine them carefully. When he examines the figures, he will find that the cash figures are £37.5 billion this year, £33 billion next year, £31 billion the year after, £27 billion the year after that and £23 billion the year after that. He should compare those figures with his record in government, but I warn him that that comparison will not be favourable.

The end of year report by the International Monetary Fund on the UK economy states:

"The macroeconomic policy and financial supervision frameworks remain at the forefront internationally and are consistent with Fund recommendations."

It continues:

"Directors commended the continued strong performance of the United Kingdom's economy."

As some Opposition Members acknowledged, the Budget will lock in stability to the economy for the long term, and that is exactly what is required.

However, my constituents like my right hon. Friend the Chancellor not because of his ability to deliver macroeconomic targets or because he looks set to fulfil his promise to maintain the golden rule but because he is good at delivering on the bread-and-butter issues. It is thanks to my right hon. Friend that 1,565 fewer people in my constituency are unemployed and can share in the prosperity of this country. That is a 42 per cent. reduction in unemployment claimants since 1997 in my constituency, and it mirrors figures across the country that are a testament to Britain's lowest unemployment level for three decades. Many of my constituents also take comfort from this week's announcement on the uprating of the minimum wage. Those constituents will be among the 100,000 people in London who will see an increase in their pay packets when the minimum wage rises to £4.85 in October.

When the minimum wage was first put forward, the Opposition said that it would cost 2 million jobs, but we are now living with the highest level of employment that this country has ever seen. When Opposition Members claimed that the Government had not been instrumental in managing the economy to achieve its present stability and that one needed to look back before 1997—God help us!—to see the policies responsible for that stability, they should remember that they opposed every successful intervention in the economy by this Government. That included independence for the Bank of England and the dramatic introduction of the minimum wage. The Opposition opposed those policies tooth and nail. They voted against them, saying that they would have disastrous consequences for our economy. None of their predictions of doom has come true. The Government gave us the first minimum wage in the UK and continue to deliver on their commitment to social justice by ensuring that new entrants to the work force will be paid fairly. My younger constituents—aged 16 and 17—will also benefit from the new minimum wage.

Another bread-and-butter issue is school investment. In my constituency, we can see the results of the money that my right hon. Friend the Chancellor has consistently put into education. For example, £3 million has been invested in Wembley high technology college, and a further £3 million has been spent on new buildings at Kingsbury Green primary school. The same has been spent on Roe Green junior school. People in my constituency can see the tangible effect of Government policy in their environment and their children's schools. They can walk into new school buildings.

The same investment is apparent in Northwick Park hospital. The accident and emergency ward has been completely refurbished, with double the capacity. Consequently, waiting times have fallen. Before 1997—and after—they were among the worst in the country, but they have now fallen so much that they are compliant with the standard of within four hours, in all but 2 or 3 per cent. of cases. That is how my constituents see the real benefits of the Chancellor's fiscal and economic prudence.

The Chancellor who brought such stability to the UK economy has also been taking great care to address the structural economic problems that have dogged our economy for decades, such as the housing market—to which my hon. Friend the Member for Middlesbrough (Sir Stuart Bell) alluded in his intervention—and productivity, but, above all, investment in human capital and research and development. The assessment and work being conducted by the Treasury in all those sectors is to be welcomed if our current short-term economic successes are to be developed into a long-term model. The Chancellor's commitment to improving the UK's human capital through increased funding for education, and improvements in research and development, will create a step change in our economy.

In his statement, the Chancellor made a commitment to 4.4 per cent. year-on-year real-terms growth in education and skills, and an £8.5 billion commitment to education and skills in 2007. That is exactly the commitment we need to address some of the points made earlier by my right hon. Friend the Member for Llanelli (Denzil Davies). He talked about outsourcing and about the way in which call centres and other jobs in this country were moving not only to eastern Europe but also to India and elsewhere in the far east.

Two nights ago, I chaired a meeting in the Attlee suite of Labour Friends of India where there were more than 200 business leaders involved in foreign direct investment, both from the UK to India and vice versa. We discussed outsourcing and, of course, call centres. We faced up to the real challenge of an Indian economy that is growing at between 6 and 8 per cent. a year, with a huge population—1 billion people—and a huge pool of skilled and highly educated young people who are prepared, willing and able to offer services that reflect those skills.

One of the most interesting speeches made at the seminar was from Dinesh Dhamija, the chief executive of ebookers, the famous online travel company. He made the point that in the after-shock of 11 September—when sales of tickets for air travel dried up—his business in this country was faced with an almighty crisis. The only way in which he could appropriately respond was to cut his costs, to use offshoring and to outsource his call centres to India. By doing so, he saved 546 UK jobs and the entire business, thereby saving the contribution that the business makes to the UK economy.

It is nonsense to think that this country or any other country can insulate itself against globalisation. Globalisation is to be neither welcomed nor denigrated; it has to be accepted as a fact and we need businesses that can respond to that global challenge. The only way for them to do so is by upskilling—by ensuring that we have skills in this country. However, that means that we increasingly move up the value curve as jobs in this country reflect our standard of living, so we cannot compete simply on labour costs; that is impossible in a global economy.

Sir Stuart Bell: My hon. Friend refers to globalisation, which was the theme of my right hon. Friend the Member for Llanelli (Denzil Davies). My right hon. Friend made a great deal of outsourcing and of the movement of jobs from his constituency. I am glad to see the hon. Member for Strangford (Mrs. Robinson) in her place because she may have a similar problem in her constituency, to which no doubt she would allude if she were to catch Mr. Deputy Speaker's eye. Is it not a fact of life—we all have to live with it in the north-east—that global outsourcing takes place? We have lost Samsung, and areas in Northern Ireland have lost jobs? Is it not up to the Government, with the sort of Budget that was announced today, to seek to confront these problems and remedy them?

Mr. Gardiner: My hon. Friend is absolutely right. Putting a 4.4 per cent. real-terms increase into education committing £8.5 billion in 2007 to education is intended precisely to increase the skills level, which means that our work force move up the value curve, which means in turn that they are capable of sustaining challenges. We cannot simply bemoan the loss of jobs at the lower end of the market. We must create an economy in which we are competitive internationally and are able to survive and thrive within that international market by having the skills base to do so. It is precisely in that area that there will be investment.

The IMF has welcomed the Government's commitment to addressing the long-term issue—

Mrs. Iris Robinson (Strangford) (DUP): I take up the issue that was raised by the hon. Member for Middlesbrough (Sir Stuart Bell) a few moments ago. We are talking of about 5,000 job losses in my constituency over 18 months. These are skilled jobs. The only prospects that those who are involved in the process have at present are taxiing or call centres. What do we do with their skills?

Mr. Gardiner: I do not know precisely to which jobs the hon. Lady is referring within her constituency. Similarly, I do not know the structure of the labour market there.

Mrs. Robinson: I am referring to jobs in the textile industry and also jobs in TKECC, a company that makes belts for cars.

Mr. Gardiner: The loss of any jobs is a great problem and a source of sorrow for all those concerned, particularly for the Member of Parliament who is responsible for delivering the best for his or her constituents.

I am sure that the hon. Lady would agree with me that for a Government to stand back and say, "There is nothing that we can do about this" if jobs are lost is to send out exactly the wrong message. Today, the Government have said, "We must respond to the challenges that the global market brings. We must respond to that competition." That is not done by subsidising labour in some way to try to keep jobs in one place or another. We must respond by enabling workers who lose their jobs to acquire the skills that will enable us to compete in other areas at a higher value level. I am sure that that is what the hon. Lady wants for her constituents, which is what my right hon. Friend the Chancellor suggested this afternoon for the whole economy.

The Pensions Bill has been designed to address some of the problems that lie with the provision of pensions. There are still concerns that Britain is not setting aside nearly as much as it should in retirement. That has been alluded to this afternoon. Some sections of society come out worse than others. Typically, older women find themselves in the worst situation. For that reason, I support the calls that are being made by the TUC for the Government to encourage women over the age of 60 to continue to make national insurance payments so that they continue adding to their own pension provision. The cost to the Exchequer of doing that would be minimal, but the economic benefits to the women concerned could be quite considerable. It would mean increased general economic activity and reduced pensioner poverty, as well as an attack on age discrimination in the workplace. I urge the Treasury seriously to consider that issue. I welcome the announcement this afternoon of an extra £100 for pensioners for the winter payment. I echo the remarks of my hon. Friend the Member for Dumbarton (Mr. McFall), the Chairman of the Treasury Committee, about information sharing in the credit card industry to combat the unsustainable credit levels that are being run up. I commend the admirable work that he and the Treasury Committee have done on that problem.

Our discussions today are obviously only half the picture. Many hon. Members are preparing for the spending review in July, and I should like to make a special plea for extra investment in London's transport infrastructure. Funding for Transport for London is to set to fall by £200 million in 2005–06 after record increases, I acknowledge, in recent years. The impact on my constituents and London's ability to sell itself as a world-class city will be considerable, and the effects will be felt beyond London, because if it does not receive inward investment Britain as a whole will not do so either. London's population is set to increase by 800,000—equivalent to a city the size of Sheffield—by 2016, so there will be significant extra demands on an already stretched transport system. No Government would consider building a new town with a population of 800,000 and not equipping it with a proper transport infrastructure. We should not allow London's population to grow to that extent without equipping it to cope with the increase.

The case for extra investment is clear. Better transport links would help to reduce inequality in inner-city London, an area that has the highest deprivation indices in the country. Investment would also bring new money into London and the British economy as a whole. As London is the dynamo of the British economy it is essential that investment in its infrastructure continue at the recent increased rates after decades of neglect. London's productivity levels are 25 per cent. higher than the national figure, and it makes a net contribution to the Exchequer of £10 billion to £20 billion a year. However, it cannot go on supporting the British economy without proper investment. We must reduce the £230 million annual losses caused by failures and delays on London's transport system, and must reap the benefits of proper investment. The plain fact is that this is not a national competition—it is an international one. The case for London is the case for Britain, and unless the transport infrastructure receives extra funding we will begin to lose our competitive edge against cities such as New York and Paris. I therefore urge the Treasury team to consider the impact on the economy as a whole if London's infrastructure problems become a disincentive to invest in the UK.

Next year, we face, as the Chancellor said, stark economic choices. The electorate must choose between a Chancellor who has an impeccable economic record, who promises more and has a record to back it up, and a party with an economic record that left scars on our society with two recessions, 3 million unemployed and huge economic and social inequalities. The Opposition clearly have no shame, because now they are offering the electorate the choice of more cuts—£18 billion-worth in total, which would mean cuts in everyday services, local government, crime prevention and transport. They mocked when the Chancellor spoke about freezing levels of investment and input, but they have proposed £18 billion-worth of cuts in services, and must account for that.

Hon. Members often speak about the Budget speech as though it were simply an economic event. It is, of course, a political event as well, and today's Budget was a deeply political event because the Opposition committed themselves to matching our spending on health at 7.2 per cent. in real terms every year to 2008—a 50 per cent. rise in our total spending on health since 1997. In education there is a 4.4 per cent. annual rise and an extra £8.5 billion in 2007. Now the Opposition have a political choice to make. While matching the spending and the growth levels that are being maintained by the Chancellor in every area of Government, can they commit themselves to matching our increase in health spending and in education and skills spending? If they cannot, they are denying the country the opportunity to grow and develop in the future.

It is precisely such investment in skills and education that represents the choice that every Government and every people must make. They must decide whether to consume for themselves or to invest in their children's future. If those on the Opposition Treasury Bench cannot match our commitment in that area, they will show that they are more interested in individual present consumption for greed than in investment in the country's future and our children.

Mr. Michael Fallon (Sevenoaks) (Con): I begin by declaring the interests recorded in the register.

If the hon. Member for Brent, North (Mr. Gardiner) will forgive me, I shall not follow him, partly because he spoke for so long and partly because he and the hon. Member for Middlesbrough (Sir Stuart Bell), if he will forgive me for saying so, both appear to belong to the creationist school of the Labour party, as I would characterise it, which believes that almost everything in this country started to get better only in 1997. That was not the case in Brent, and it certainly was not the case in Middlesbrough.

I am sure that, on reflection, the hon. Member for Middlesbrough will concede that although it is great to see Middlesbrough doing well now, that recovery did not start in 1997. As my right hon. Friend the Member for Hitchin and Harpenden (Mr. Lilley) reminded us, these things take a long time. It was back in 1987 that Lady Thatcher walked in the wilderness on Teesside and began the process of regeneration. Teesside university, which the hon. Gentleman mentioned, was set up by the last Conservative Government, not by the present Government. I am delighted that things are going well on Teesside, but the hon. Gentleman must not pretend to the House that it all started on 1 May 1997.

Sir Stuart Bell: When the hon. Gentleman was the Member of Parliament for Darlington, we used to go up on the train together and we had many a philosophical and economic discussion. From the Opposition Benches I welcomed the creation of both the urban development corporation and Teesside university. Will the hon. Gentleman accept that I am not part of the creationist school that believes it all began in 1997? The former Conservative Government greatly helped our area. That goes back to Lord Hailsham's visit in 1962.

Mr. Fallon: I am glad the hon. Gentleman has corrected what he implied earlier. Let us end this little exchange, which I fear may be diverted into regional policy going back over a long period, by agreeing that improvements such as those on Teesside, which I welcome, take a long time.

I also welcome the economic growth that the Chancellor announced today. Of course it is good news that he was more correct than some of the forecasters a year ago. However, I have two worries about that economic growth. The first is the concern to which my right hon. Friend the Member for Hitchin and Harpenden alluded: that we have yet to see the increases in productivity that we would expect to see given all the governmental activity over the past seven years. My right hon. Friend pointed out the proportion of that growth that could be attributed simply to the increase in the working population. The United States has had a similar increase in its working population, but its productivity gains have been much greater and sustained over a longer period.

Like my right hon. Friend the Member for Charnwood (Mr. Dorrell), I found little mention of productivity in the Chancellor's speech. Usually in the blizzard of documents that accompany the Budget, there is at least one special document on productivity. This time there is not. On the contrary, there are documents on flexibility and devolved decision-making. Productivity seems to be confined to a table – a box – in the Red Book.

It is worth re-reading to the House the sentence that my right hon. Friend the Member for Fylde (Mr. Jack) quoted from the Red Book:

"workers in the US are still just under 30 per cent more productive than UK workers."

We are still not getting the increase in productivity that we need. I should have liked to have heard far more from the Chancellor about why he thinks that that is not so and what he is really doing to increase the productivity that we would have expected from the new investment in capital and new technology and the various skills and educational changes that he has introduced since 1997.

My second fear is that the growth that we have achieved is remarkably lopsided. It would have been nice to have had some acknowledgement from Labour Members today of just how crucial consumer spending and household debt has been to the growth that has been achieved. That worries me because there will come a time when that begins to end, when private debt begins to be curbed and paid off and when home owners slowly but surely begin to realise that the principal sums that they have invested in their homes will no longer be magicked away by high inflation, but will remain there for ever and have to be paid off. The over-reliance on consumer spending and home owner debt leaves our economy dangerously exposed.

At the same time, we have had a massive increase in public spending and we still seem to have a structural problem with tax revenues that leaves the economy even more vulnerable. Instead of curing or examining the structural issues, the Government are simply borrowing more and taxing more. Borrowing, as my right hon. Friends who have spoken before me have said, has gone up and up. It was supposed to be less than £20 billion; now it is £37 billion. In fact, having squandered all the receipts from the third generation licences, the Chancellor is back borrowing where he started. The figures that he has given the House today of how that borrowing, having reached the dizzy heights of £37 billion, is now planned slowly to reduce during the next three, four or five years, wholly depend on him achieving the efficiency savings that are set out and increasing the tax compliance by the various measures that he has outlined.

I have to take issue with my right hon. Friend the Member for Charnwood on one point. He said that he welcomed the fruits of the efficiency saving. They are, however, only fruits – they may be low-hanging fruits, but they are not yet realised. In welcoming his successor's arrival today at the Office of Government Commerce, Sir Peter Gershon described the 2.5 per cent. efficiency gain that is to be applied right across the public services as challenging but achievable. I think that it is extremely challenging, and the Government are in effect spending money that they have not yet saved. We cannot yet be sure that those efficiency gains will materialise.

Mr. Plaskitt: The hon. Gentleman describes a level of borrowing that equates to 3 per cent. of GDP as "dizzy". What adjective would he use to describe a borrowing level that was 8 per cent. of GDP under his Government?

Mr. Fallon: What is important when we are describing borrowing is to get our forecasts right. I am not the Chancellor. The Chancellor is in charge of the economy and his credibility is undermined if he tells us one year that borrowing will be £10 billion, then suddenly it turns out to be £20 billion, then £30 billion, and by the end of the year in question it reaches £37 billion. That is what makes the rest of us question his economic competence.

When it comes to borrowing, the Chancellor cannot be sure that those efficiency savings will be locked in. To give a specific example, we have been told that 20,000 jobs will be relocated, so there will be savings. Of course there will be savings, but anyone in business knows that those savings are always further down the track than one thinks, and they are never quite as great as one originally planned. The people concerned have to be relocated and there are costs involved in all that. It is far too easy simply to say, "We'll move 20,000 jobs out of London, get rid of 40,000 people and savings will be realised immediately."

When Chancellors, of whatever party, are in difficulties over their fiscal stance, they say that they will crack down on tax avoidance and put more resources into Customs and Excise or the Inland Revenue to increase tax compliance. Again, those are targets, not givens. It is unwise of the Chancellor to assume that efficiency gains and additional revenue will automatically result from the measures that he announced.

Whether or not we like the phrase "freezing rates", it is clear that the overall burden of taxation has been increasing and will continue to hurt. The Chancellor paid little attention to where the burden is beginning to bite. I shall give three examples. First, more and more people, especially public sector workers, are being sucked into the higher band. A generation ago, it would have been inconceivable to consider police inspectors or ward sisters as the rich, having to pay the same tax rate as the richest people in our society. Now, almost 3 million people have to pay the higher rate of tax. That needs to be reconsidered.

Secondly, too many people low down the income scale pay too much tax. As soon as people earn only a few thousand pounds a year, they pay too much tax, and the tax for the relevant band has been increased today by £60. People who earn £10,000, £12,000 or £15,000 a year should not have to hand over a third to the Government. We need to reconsider the tax burden imposed on the lower paid. All the tax credits and the attendant additional complexities do not compensate for the fact that we make people pay more lower down the scale than do many of the more successful economies.

Mr. Jack: Does my hon. Friend know about the Centre for Policy Studies research, which shows that the poorest fifth of the population pays an average of 42 per cent. of their income in tax?

Mr. Fallon: I am aware of it now. That is an important point and I should like to have heard more about that from the Chancellor, who simply brushed aside the 10 per cent. rate.

Thirdly, pensioners pay too much tax. Of course, £100 here or there to redress the enormous increases in council tax imposed mainly by central Government or Labour councils may be welcome, but pensioners' savings are too harshly taxed. People are taxed throughout their lives on their earnings, and they are taxed yet again at the end of their lives on what they have managed to save.

The tax burden should be reformed and reduced because it has become too great and too complex. We need to continue to simplify it. We have had a stop-go system, whereby the Government introduced reliefs and suddenly shut them down.

Previous speakers mentioned the film tax relief, which was introduced in the late 1990s and has suddenly been withdrawn, leaving British film makers in the lurch. Let us consider the incorporation changes that were introduced in finance legislation a couple of years ago. In this year's pre-Budget report, the Chancellor states that might "distort business strategies". In a sense, it is good—but almost ironic—that the Chancellor has finally got the message. We, like the world outside, have complained that the tax reliefs distort business strategy and suddenly the Chancellor complains about his own policy in his pre-Budget report and tinkers in the Budget with a relief that he introduced.

"the Government is concerned that the longstanding differences"

Let us consider spending. The Chancellor has announced again today additional spending all over the place, with no real emphasis on control. It is clear from the various points made by my right hon. Friend the Member for Hitchin and Harpenden that far too little expenditure is getting through to the front end and resulting in real increases in output and performance in the public sector. To see that, we have only to turn to a Wednesday edition of The Guardian, whose "Society" supplement shows how much bureaucracy of para-government—advisers, co-ordinators, liaison workers and taskforces—have been created at the expense of those who work at the sharp end in our hospitals, on division in our police areas and in our classrooms. The record is one of dismal failure. As my right hon. Friend the Member for Charnwood said, we have had seven years of talk about public service reform, but little real reform.

Instead of action, we have had a book. I hope that you, too, Mr. Deputy Speaker, received last week a copy of the Treasury's new 438-page book entitled "Microeconomic Reform in Britain"; I believe that it was sent to most colleagues. Like everything else that the Government produce, it has no price on it, but it contains a lengthy foreword from the Chancellor and is vanity publishing at its best. Almost at the end of the 438 pages, we are finally told the answer to micro-economic reform, after passing references to last year's fad: progressive universalism. Under that wondrous new system, the Government have spent £18 billion on child trust funds, half of which goes to those who do not need it so that those who do need it get a little extra. Progressive universalism is a way of chickening out of some of the more important political choices by continuing to pay a benefit to everyone, then simply deciding to pay more of it to those who need it most. That was last year's fad.

This year's fad in micro-economic reform is—I quote from the conclusion of this masterwork—the constrained discretion model. It is the new answer to public service reform and means, apparently, the Government setting out the objective and then—wait for it—the "devolution of operational responsibility to front-line agents".

After seven years, we now have the answer. However, I think that it will raise a pretty hollow laugh in staffrooms, for example of schools that enjoyed grant-maintained status but then had the operational responsibility of front-line agents removed from them by the Government. It will raise a pretty hollow laugh among those who have to manage hospital trusts and those who have to drive forward policing, who are still hamstrung by national regulation, centralised pay-and-condition bargaining and by dictatorial political guidance from the centre.

If the Government are serious about devolving decision making, and about taking their constrained discretion model and making a reality of it, they must tackle the regulatory burden that they themselves have imposed on our economy and public services. When we talk to business and public service managers—Ministers do not do that often enough—we hear that their principal complaint is now the burden of regulation imposed on them. I find very little indication in the Red Book that the Government are serious about reducing that burden.

I do not pretend that reducing the regulatory burden is easy. Our deregulation taskforce, of which I was a member, attempted that; the Government now have their Better Regulation Task Force. I am intrigued to see that the chapter on regulation in the Red Book is—finally—entitled "Reforming and reducing regulation". However, when we look at paragraphs 3.59 and 3.60 of that chapter to see what is actually going to be reduced, we see just three specific proposals.

First, after the hundreds of thousands of pages that the Government have imposed on businesses and the public services over the last seven years, they now tell us that they will consult the construction, chemical and retail sectors on an "early warning" system, whereby those industries could discuss "emerging policy and regulatory proposals".

[Mr. Fallon]

That does not seem to be reducing regulation. Secondly, the Government will discuss some of the payment delays in the construction industry relating to housing grants and construction schemes. That does not seem to be cutting regulation either.

Perhaps we shall get there, however, because after a two-year review, the third proposal is that the Government will make it easier for citizens advice bureaux to advise their clients without being subject to Financial Services Authority regulation. So, that is good news. After seven years, we finally have a specific proposal for deregulation. The Government must start to get serious about this matter.

The Treasury Committee is conducting an inquiry into the compliance costs of tax and regulation, and I should like to share with the House the fruits of part of that inquiry. We went to Holland, which has a programme of reducing regulation and legislation. In the Dutch Finance Ministry, we met the "director of legislative burden", who had a staff of 17 people and a mandate from his Government to reduce the burden by 25 per cent. over four years. That is a Government who would appear to be serious about reducing the regulatory burden. As I have emphasised, that burden applies as much to the public sector as to the business sector.

We have had seven years of regulating, spending, borrowing and taxing, and the Chancellor has come almost to a full stop. He has spent more without getting real reform, he has borrowed more without securing real improvements in our infrastructure, and he has taxed more without making our public services more efficient. This is a dead-end Budget from a dead-end Chancellor.

4.57 pm

Mr. James Plaskitt (Warwick and Leamington) (Lab): The real and important background to the Budget is that we start from the position of being better placed than any other economy in the G7. The International Monetary Fund delivered that verdict in its article 4 report, which states that the United Kingdom has "weathered the global slowdown well".

There are two fundamental reasons why we start in that favourable position, one of which is the growth in our economy. The Chancellor's forecasts, given at the time of the last Budget and much derided by the then Leader of the Opposition, turned out to be exactly correct. Not only are we enjoying growth of more than 2 per cent. this year, but the Chancellor is adhering to his forecast of growth of between 3 and 3.5 per cent. in each of the next two years. We are therefore in a stronger position than any other G7 country in respect of the rate of growth.

The second factor that contributes to our strong starting position is the degree of stability in the economy. Between 1997 and 2004, the growth range has been between 1.7 and 3.7 per cent.—in other words, a range of no more than two percentage points. That contrasts sharply with the years between 1989 and 1997, under the previous Administration, when the growth rate fluctuated from -1.4 to 5 per cent.—a six percentage point growth range. We are now seeing more balanced growth in the economy, which is a key contributor to our current stability. One of the fruits of that is the recovery in manufacturing output. We also have a strong construction sector, and service sector growth is steadier. In fact, the overall profile of growth looks much more stable than it has for some years.

Such stability is also evident in employment. Again, our situation contrasts very favourably with that in other G7 countries. We have the lowest unemployment for 30 years and 1.8 million new jobs have been created—1.3 million in the private sector. We have a healthy level of new business creation as well as sharp growth in self-employment.

We also see stability reflected in inflation. Since 1997, inflation has not moved outside its target, set by the Chancellor way back then, of one percentage point variation either way. It has never got to the limits of that target. Contrast that with the variation in inflation rates over the previous eight years under the previous Government, when the range was seven percentage points. There was no sign of stability in the economy then. Moreover, we now enjoy interest rate stability, with a range since 1997 of four percentage points. Contrast that with a range of six and a half percentage points under the previous Administration: not only is the range smaller, but the trend is steadily downwards.

What matters now—this is how we have to assess the Budget—is the extent to which that stability is confirmed and secured going forward. Since 1997, we have moved from having the highest unemployment in Europe, under the previous Administration, to having the lowest, and we have the longest period of continuous economic growth in over two centuries. The prize is to lock that in to banish the boom-and-bust failure of the past, but are there any risks to the growth and the stability that have been secured?

The Opposition think, apparently, that there are some risks. The first that they emphasised—certainly, the Leader of the Opposition did so in his reply to my right hon. Friend the Chancellor—is the public finances. I am interested to see the Opposition much excited about whether the Chancellor will meet the golden rule. That is an interesting preoccupation for the party that doubled the national debt while in office and that in one year alone clocked up a deficit equivalent to 8 per cent. of GDP.

Of course, the Conservatives never had a golden rule. That is just as well, because they would have come nowhere near meeting it. They remind me of drivers who have been caught doing 100 mph. They have had their licence taken away and been banned, which is why they are sitting on the other side of the Chamber, but now they are greatly excited because we have been caught doing 31 mph in a 30 mph limit.

The first part of the golden rule requires that net debt be held under 40 per cent. of GDP. I should remind the Opposition that we inherited net debt of 43.7 per cent. It is down to 33 per cent., thanks to our disciplined approach to handling the Government's finances. It is forecast to grow from that, rising to 36.4 per cent. in 2009, but that is still substantially below what we inherited. As the Institute for Fiscal Studies said in its green budget:

"The government's debt remains modest by international and historic standards."

That provides the context for the second aspect of the golden rule—balancing the figures across the cycle. As has been said many times during the debate, borrowing is higher than originally predicted. As a percentage of GDP, it has gone just beyond the 3 per cent. margin, but I think that every Member would acknowledge that forecasting those figures is tricky as it involves the difference between two very large numbers.

A small variation in performance can have a big impact on the bottom line and just a 1 per cent. change either way in the spending or income figures has a £12 billion consequence. It has always been difficult to forecast those figures with complete accuracy; it was difficult under the previous Administration, whose borrowing and spending forecasts also often ended up way off their original mark.

The right hon. Member for Charnwood (Mr. Dorrell) reminded us that we can look back over Red Books and see a forecast total surplus over the cycle of £100 billion, which of course is now down to the much lower figure of £14 billion. That, too, has caused a fair degree of excitement among Opposition Members. Again, they need to bear in mind what the Institute for Fiscal Studies said:

"Aiming to overachieve the golden rule by a large amount early in the cycle might be regarded as prudent, given the considerable uncertainties in forecasting the path of public finances over a number of years."

It continued:

"It is reasonable that the forecast overachievement should decline as the end of the cycle draws nearer."

Therefore, the fact is that both aspects of the golden rule will be met in the present cycle and in the next. I would therefore dismiss the Conservative party's concern about the "closeness" of meeting the golden rule, because had it been wise enough to impose such a constraint on itself, it would have had no chance whatever of meeting it.

The second issue that has been suggested as posing a possible threat to this hard-won stability is debt. The hon. Member for Sevenoaks (Mr. Fallon) made that a feature of his speech a few moments ago, when he drew our attention to household debt. It is easy enough to find initial information that fuels lurid headlines, such as an annual rise in household debt of 14 per cent. and a ratio of household debt to income of 130 per cent. It is easy to infer from those figures that there might be a real issue. It is important to go further than those headline figures, however. The figures are largely a story of what has been happening to house prices. The fact is that the value of household net wealth has increased by 50 per cent. since 1997. That is the other side of the household debt story about which we keep hearing. In fact, the ratio of household debt to total wealth since 1997 has been absolutely stable. It is true that mortgage equity withdrawal is up—it is now 7 per cent. of post-tax income—but that is exactly the level that it reached in 1989–90, which was the last time house price inflation peaked. Untapped equity in houses is now 75 per cent. of total housing wealth. Low and permanently low interest rates mean that debt servicing costs have fallen, so it is no surprise that the total stock of debt has risen to balance that.

Back in 1990, 27 per cent. of disposable income was going to finance mortgages. The figure now is 16 per cent. Similarly, back in 1990, the proportion of disposable income going on debt servicing was 15 per cent., whereas now it is 7 per cent. Furthermore, most consumer borrowing is secured, which is where growth has risen to 14 per cent. The rate of growth of unsecured debt over the same period, however, has slowed from 16 per cent. to 13 per cent., and unsecured debt is only 18 per cent. of the total.

I do not therefore think that there is a consumer debt crisis. Most homeowners are actually acting quite rationally and prudently. The risk of instability, about which the hon. Member for Sevenoaks was concerned, would be present were there a risk of a sharp downward correction in house prices. I suggest to him and other Members, however, that a soft landing is far more likely, precisely because of the stability in the monetary climate and lower interest rates.

Nor do I accept the argument put by the Leader of the Opposition when he replied to my right hon. Friend the Chancellor that there is a savings crisis. Many Conservative Members who have spoken this afternoon have made great play of the fact that the savings ratio stands at 5 or 6 per cent. That, too, needs to be set against the net household wealth picture, which, as I just indicated, is very healthy. The savings ratio also moves in relation to inflation, and it has been at exactly this same level during previous periods of sustained low inflation. It responds to house prices, and in that regard is doing exactly the same as it did in the 1980s. When house price inflation last reached 20 per cent., the savings ratio declined to 6 per cent. While there are undoubtedly some individual horror stories about debt—including some particularly tragic ones recently—it would be an exaggeration to infer from them that there is an overall debt crisis in the economy.

The Conservatives have also suggested that a threat may be posed to our hard-won stability by the tax burden. Many of them have made much of the fact that the Chancellor's revenue stream has increased by 50 per cent. since 1997. They should bear it in mind that during their 18 years in government their revenue stream increased by 300 per cent.

There is another way of measuring the tax burden. It currently stands at 35.9 per cent. of GDP, which is lower than the level achieved during most of the 1980s. I remind Conservative Members that it averaged 36 per cent. throughout their 18 years of office. In one year, 1984–85, it was as high as 39 per cent. It is projected—in the Red Book—to rise, but only to 38 per cent. It is also worth bearing it in mind that the level is four percentage points lower here than the average across the Organisation for Economic Co-operation and Development.

There is a further way of measuring the burden. The Office for National Statistics assesses it as a percentage of gross income. Back in 1996–97, direct taxes were equivalent to 20 per cent. of household gross income. Today's figure is the same. In 1996–97, the indirect tax burden was 16 per cent. of household gross income; it is now 15 per cent.

There is yet another way of looking at the burden. I refer Members to the excellent tables produced by our Library relating to hypothetical households. Back in 1996–97, a household on 75 per cent. of median earnings with two children paid 10 per cent. of its earnings in direct tax. Today the figure is minus 6 per cent.

Mr. Laws: I can confirm those figures in the round, but the same tables—showing how the total tax burden has changed since 1996–97—reveal that the two groups who have lost out particularly, in terms of paying more tax, are the poorest two deciles. That is because the Government have tended to raise indirect taxes, which are more aggressive than direct taxes.

Mr. Plaskitt: The hon. Gentleman should also look at the tables that show the impact of direct tax changes, and the introduction of tax credit in particular. He will then see that the distribution of benefit resulting from my right hon. Friend's eight Budgets has been more advantageous to the lower deciles than to any other group.

Back in 1996–97, a family on exactly median earnings with two children paid 17.8 per cent. of their income in direct tax. That has fallen to 12.9 per cent. Even for those on double average earnings, the figure was 24.6 per cent. That figure remains the same.

Despite all those different ways of assessing the tax burden, it is very difficult to produce evidence that it has increased as much as the Conservatives suggest.

Public services benefit most from the economic stability that the Government have secured. Here we see the stability dividend—the chance, at last, to invest properly in our public services and to sustain that investment.

The national indicators on the NHS show what we are getting for the 7 per cent. a year real terms growth in investment: a record hospital-building programme; NHS Direct; improved heart and cancer care; an increase of 20 per cent. in admissions; 50 per cent. more heart operations; 200,000 people off the hospital waiting lists; and those waiting more than a year down from 30,000 to just 36.

That is also borne out locally in my constituency. Maximum waiting times in my local district hospital in Warwick have come down from 18 months to nine, and are on course to be six months next year. Average waiting times are already down to three months, and outpatient average waiting times down from 39 to 17 weeks. That has all been achieved by the additional investment that has given us 169 more nurses and 47 more doctors and consultants, and a 39 per cent. increase in activity levels.

The same is true in education. Again, the national picture is confirmed locally. We now have 3,000 more nursery places in Warwickshire than back in 1997, with improved results at every key stage throughout the county. Five good GCSEs were achieved by 45 per cent. in Warwickshire in 1997. The figure is now 54 per cent. In my constituency alone, £10 million has been invested in our local schools over the past seven years. Spending per pupil in Warwickshire has risen from £1,770 to £2,840.

That is all evidence of the stability dividend. We now have one of the best economies in the world, steadily rising living standards and the means to invest in improving public services. All of that can happen only because we have a platform of economic stability, sound finances, low inflation and sensible fiscal and monetary rules. The Chancellor has strengthened that platform today, and I commend the Budget to the House.

5.17 pm

Mr. Andrew Mitchell (Sutton Coldfield) (Con): It is a pleasure to follow the hon. Member for Warwick and Leamington (Mr. Plaskitt), whose constituency is at least in the same region as mine. It is also a pleasure to catch your eye, Mr. Deputy Speaker, on the first day of the Budget debate. I was fortunate enough to do so last year, and I see waiting to catch your eye two other habitual contributors on the first day, the hon. Members for Wolverhampton, South-West (Rob Marris) and for Nottingham, South (Alan Simpson). I am sure that they will make original contributions, which will be a refreshing change from the hon. Member for Brent, North (Mr. Gardiner), who did his traditional imitation of a Government Whips Office glove puppet.

On this first day, we have the opportunity to consider the Budget before we have studied the small print. With this Chancellor, it is always advisable to examine that in great detail, because it normally changes the way in which the Budget is perceived within 24 hours.

In the interests of unity, let me list the points on which I agree with the Budget, which is a good one in a number of limited respects, but before I do so, I draw attention to my entry in the Register of Members' Interests.

What the Chancellor continues to do in respect of third-world poverty and debt relief is advantageous and important. He is always good enough to make it clear that he is continuing a tradition started by one of his predecessors, John Major. The Government have done laudable work in that respect.

It may not come as a surprise to the hon. Member for Wolverhampton, South-West that I praise the fact of the limit of £1.5 million for the lifetime amount going into a pension and the increase to £1.8 million. That is a good thing. In most areas, I have nothing but horror to register at the Government's pensions policy, but on this specific matter, they have found an elegant way of cutting through the appalling complexity governing pension arrangements for people who increasingly change jobs during their lifetime of work. In that regard, the Government's decision was a very good one indeed. The making of direct payments to schools is also an extremely good idea. Such an approach should be more beneficial to schools than the previous arrangements.

Some of my hon. Friends may be surprised to discover that I want to register my support for what the Chancellor said about tax avoidance. He is absolutely right on this issue, and I want to explain why. It is clearly the right of all citizens to organise their affairs in a tax-efficient way, and I hope that none of us would quibble with that. But in recent years, certain obscene schemes that should not be allowed have been peddled, by Ernst and Young, for example. Indeed, I tabled some questions to the Prime Minister on this issue last year. I hope that today's announcement by the Chancellor will presage an end to such schemes.

One such scheme, which was peddled around a number of banks in the City, was designed to avoid paying any employer's national insurance, and to enable employees to reduce their level of taxation from 40 to 25 per cent. It is disgraceful that anyone should try to perpetrate such a scheme. These people should pay the right amount of employer's national insurance. Individuals from other parts of the world who earn their living in London and who may need to use our emergency services—if they are unfortunate enough to have a heart attack, for example—should pay national insurance and tax at the same rate as others. The peddling of such schemes is morally corrosive, and one effect is that if one or two institutions accept them, great pressure is put on other, competitor institutions to go down the same route. We all have hard-working doctors and lawyers, for example, in our constituencies who pay their 40 per cent. tax on the nail. It is wrong that others should get away with not doing so.

Other developments are also welcome, as some hon. Members have pointed out. I listened with great care and interest to what was said about Kate Barker's report on the housing market, and I was pleased to learn that the Deputy Prime Minister will consult on the issue. However, I was alarmed to discover that each region will have a body responsible for planning, and I hope that we can tease out the details during the consultation. This is an extremely important issue to my constituents, because a place such as Sutton Coldfield depends greatly on the quality of its local environment and its attractive features. People aspire to live there, and once they have arrived they want to stay.

There has, however, been a distressing trend in recent years. When widows or widowers, for example, move from large houses with mature gardens, developers buy such properties and blocks of flats are put up in their place. Technically, such developments take place on brownfield land. None of us would regard a delightful house with a mature garden as a property on brownfield land, but such houses do fall within that definition. Indeed, blocks of 32 or more flats are being built where only one house stood before. Such developments might not have a significant impact individually, but Members will realise their effect when taken together: one wakes up one morning to discover that the whole area has changed. The impact on the footfall to doctors' surgeries and schools, and on parking and the number of cars, can change such an area out of all recognition.

The Government's view that we should increase the number of houses being built each year from the current figure of 175,000 is admirable, but I hope that we will proceed with the greatest possible care. Areas such as mine are peculiarly vulnerable to a development and planning system that does not recognise the need for much more significant input from local residents in order to stop vexatious developments.

Mr. David Drew (Stroud) (Lab/Co-op): I concur with the hon. Gentleman that the Government must be very careful about how they define brownfield land, but does he agree that part of the problem is that we are now getting unbalanced development? The market towns in semi-rural areas such as mine are the areas where the real pressure is coming from. We need much more balanced development across the country, and we must make the developers more accountable to the local population. That is where the biggest problems lie.

Mr. Mitchell: I agree with the hon. Gentleman that we must make the planning system more accountable to local people living in an area who are most affected by planning decisions. I hope that we can make some progress on that. He is also right that we need a more careful series of developments across the country, and I hope that the consultation process will allow for that. I have asked the Minister for Housing and Planning to come with me on a journey from Sutton Coldfield to the middle of Birmingham. If he does, he will see what we regard as brownfield sites, which should not be confused with the areas that I described earlier.

I want to make some specific points about the Budget. I thought that one of the most revealing statements made by the Chancellor today was when he said that the success of some of his policies had been the result of "difficult decisions" that were taken in 1997. That is indeed a revealing statement, because one of those difficult decisions was to stand by the spending plans of the previous Chancellor, my right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Rushcliffe (Mr. Clarke).

Many Conservative Members would say that if the present Chancellor had stuck to those spending plans and other measures put in place by my right hon. and learned Friend, we would not need to divide up his chancellorship—as so many of us do—between the first two or three years and the rest. In the earlier period, his very sensible achievements included granting independence to the Bank of England Monetary Policy Committee to fix interest rates, controlling public expenditure and the degree of prudence—a word of which the Chancellor remains fond—that he displayed. Sadly, in the following three or four years, the position has been very different.

I judge today's Budget against the background of a business survey that I carried out in my constituency—as other hon. Members do—to find out what local business people think. My extensive survey was widely responded to and the most important finding was the strong and rising resentment of tax increases in Sutton Coldfield. It is also strongly felt that the money raised is not being well spent. That shows the generous spirit of my constituents who do not necessarily mind the increases so long as the money is well spent, but they do not believe that it is. There is an increasing feeling that they are overtaxed and they worry about the growth of regulation. That is what emerged from my survey and I agree with those responses. Having listened to the Budget speech today, it seems to me that they remain the most important areas of concern.

I am pleased at the growing trend towards companies publishing in their report and accounts the full extent of the tax that they pay. When the Royal Bank of Scotland announced its very significant profits, it made clear the extent to which they have been earned overseas. It published exactly how much tax it had paid—through its employees' PAYE and as a company—and it was possible to see the contribution that that enormous amount of tax had made towards the building of hospitals and the funding of education. It is right that people can see the massive contribution that such companies make.

As some of my hon. Friends have already observed, the extent of the tax rises is truly extraordinary. The figures speak for themselves. In 2002, tax receipts at £350 billion were up £90 billion from 1997 levels, and represented a rate of £1,500 for every man, woman and child in the country. More and more people are being drawn into tax, as has been noted already. There has been an increase in national insurance contributions, and a massive rise of about 60 per cent. for band D council tax payers.

[Mr. Mitchell]

The hon. Member for Twickenham (Dr. Cable) was quick to criticise the council tax system, yet the problem is not the structure of local tax but the increasing burdens that central Government impose on local government. Those burdens are not covered by central Government subvention. No local government tax will ever be popular or easy, and the present structure is probably as good as we are going to get. However, it clearly creaks at the seams when the amount that people have to pay rises as much as has been the case under this Government.

The Government have reached the point where everything that can be taxed is taxed. They do not focus on how little they can take away from hard-working families, but on how much they can get away with as they fund inflexible and ever rising expenditure totals. I understand that tax freedom day will fall on 7 June this year: next year, it will fall on 9 June.

The counterpart to high taxation is the level of borrowing, which has been much discussed this afternoon. As my right hon. and learned Friend the Leader of the Opposition said, we started off with a target of £30 billion. That has risen to £72 billion, and then to £140 billion—five times as much as the Chancellor originally forecast. The figures underline our lack of confidence in his forecasts.

Mr. Fallon: The Chancellor keeps getting them wrong.

Mr. Mitchell: As my hon. Friend says, the Chancellor keeps getting them wrong.

Given the ferocious increase in the amount of tax taken, what do we get for the subsequent expenditure? In Sutton Coldfield, only 4 per cent. of those who responded to my business survey considered that their taxes were being spent well. That figure was substantially lower than was the case last year, when the figures also showed a decrease on the year before.

We have heard today that an expenditure increase of around 40 per cent. in the NHS has been matched by an increase in patient episodes of only 5 per cent. The Government often talk the right language about reforming the NHS, but what happened with the Bill to introduce foundation hospitals is typical. To win the support of Back-Bench Labour Members, it had to be watered down so much that many of the potential gains that it promised have not been realised. The same thing has happened with other legislative proposals and, as a result, the original purpose has not been achieved.

I do not oppose the principle of tax credits. I think that John Nott was going to introduce them during the 1970 to 1974 Conservative Government, but I warn the Government that the pension credit, with its massive increase in means-testing, will come back to haunt them. Soon, nearly 80 per cent. of pensioners will be means-tested, yet recent figures from the Department for Work and Pensions show that the pension credit is not getting through to anything like enough of the poorest pensioners—that is, those who account for the bottom 20 per cent. in income terms. The pension credit is proving to be a very inefficient way of dealing with poverty.

I turn now to savings. I had hoped that the Budget would make a real contribution in that regard, but I was staggered when the hon. Member for Warwick and Leamington (Mr. Plaskitt) said that there was no savings crisis in this country. The newspapers every day show just how big that crisis is. The savings ratio has halved since 1997, but private saving levels and the privately funded pensions sector have also both declined.

Although raids on the sector of £5 billion per annum have not helped, the situation has been made worse by the fact that the Government have not made it a priority to ensure the stability that allows independent financial advisers to give good advice. I cannot imagine how an independent financial adviser can advise someone on average wages on how they should save for their old age. I was amazed that there was nothing in the Budget about ISAs or stakeholder pensions to give further encouragement to an area to which, sadly, the Government pay lip service but on which they do not deliver. It would have been easy to reverse the reduction to £5,000 per annum for ISAs that will take effect from April next year, but the Government did not even announce that, let alone an improvement to stakeholder pensions.

I want to say a word or two about red tape and regulations. Small businesses are the engine of our economy and do not have the capacity to handle extra red tape and regulation. Nothing could more clearly demonstrate the lip service that the Government pay to enterprise than the Chancellor of the Exchequer's belief that if one sets up a conference on enterprise one is somehow doing something to help. An enterprise conference with loads of waffle from well-meaning people about the importance of fostering enterprise is not the way to foster enterprise. Enterprise is fostered by low tax and minimal regulation.

I was interested to see that The Sunday Times business section asked a cross-section of business men how they thought that the Government were doing on regulation and, more generally, in supporting business. One of the respondents stated:

"Far from making life easier for entrepreneurs, Brown has been strangling enterprise."

Revealingly, another businessman said:

"My company employs 120 people and we have had to add the equivalent of one full-time person to deal with the plethora of demands for reports, returns, health and safety issues and so on."

These measures were identified as being among the worst that the Government have introduced: the working time regulations, which cost business £1.1 billion between 1999 and 2004; the data protection rules, which cost business £4.6 billion over the same period; IR35, which is blamed for many IT specialists either heading off overseas or having their services hired from overseas; the cost to business of administering the provisions of the Tax Credits Act 1999; the cost of setting up stakeholder pensions, which most employees have not taken up; and the flexible working regulations. All those individual regulations may of themselves have something to commend them, but when the Government bring them to bear on business, the effect is to smother business and enterprise and to make life enormously difficult for our small business sector.

The result is that we are now prejudicing many of the supply side reforms and gains of the Thatcher years. In 2003 alone, there were 4,000 new regulations. During the six years of this Labour Government, there have been nearly 23,500 new regulations at a cost of around £30 billion. The British Chambers of Commerce summed up the situation very well, saying:

"The bottom line is that the sheer quantity of red tape on business is damaging our economy and stifling enterprise, job creation and economic growth."

The Budget will increase tax burdens, and there will be further rapid growth in public spending and a developing black hole in public finances that must be paid for. I fear that it presages the continuation of the inefficient use of resources and means that public services continue to deliver below their potential. Alas, we have heard nothing to suggest that our constituents can expect any real change before the next election.

5.38 pm

Rob Marris (Wolverhampton, South-West) (Lab): I shall begin by counterpoising the phrases used by my right hon. Friend the Chancellor and the Leader of the Opposition—they both used their catch phrases twice. The Chancellor of the Exchequer referred to "a Budget for excellence in education, science and enterprise". The Leader of the Opposition characterised the Budget in what he obviously thought would be a suitable soundbite—I have not seen the media, so perhaps he succeeded—as "a borrow now, tax later Budget from a borrow now, tax later Chancellor". What a negative way to look at things. One can counterpoise the positive approach of the Chancellor and the negative approach of the Leader of the Opposition. Since the Molineux stadium in Wolverhampton became all-seater, I have attended football matches there on a season ticket. Before that I just used to go along with my mates. A gang of us all sit together, but some of them are like Opposition Members. On those rare occasions when Wolves go ahead in a Premiership match—

Alan Simpson: Very rare.

Rob Marris: Well, it's not so bad at home. On those rare occasions, I think, "Oh great, we are 1-0 up, we can win this." Some of the other supporters are in fits of gloom. They think, "Oh dear, now we have something to lose." When we go two ahead, it is even worse for them. It is extraordinary to me, but many football fans are like that, and that is the attitude of several Conservative Members who have spoken today. They characterise the economic performance of my right hon. Friend the Chancellor and the Government as football fans would. They say, "Things can't be so good. We must look for the holes in the Budget.". I appreciate that the role of the Opposition is to look for the negative as well as the positive, and indeed some of the remarks from the hon. Member for Sutton Coldfield (Mr. Mitchell) were positive. He balanced his speech by mentioning some of the positive aspects before he went on to the negative aspects. That is a mature way in which to conduct a public debate about our economy. It is also how he and I used to conduct debate when we were on the Work and Pensions Committee together, and we had an enjoyable time before he was elevated and had to leave the Committee.

Attitudes to any Chancellor or Government should be like attitudes to the stock market—informed by warnings that past performance does not guarantee future results. Although there is no crystal ball, past performance does provide some indication. I shall try not to fill my speech with statistics because I am not an economist. I picked up an economics A-level many years ago, although I did not do very well—and those who know me well will understand why. Statistics can be very dry. They are important for our country, but for politicians like me economics and the Budget are about people. Some of the borrowing statistics none the less repay examination.

The Leader of the Opposition talked about a borrow now, tax later Budget. But what was the performance of the Conservative Government in their 18 years in office? They doubled the national debt. It went up to 44 per cent. of GDP, and that was a poor performance. They now criticise my right hon. Friend the Chancellor for the national debt rising somewhat over a few years. However, the economic cycle is balanced and even. On my right hon. Friend's figures, the national debt will not be more than 36 per cent. of GDP. Borrowing by this Government will, for one year, go above 3.4 per cent. on the forecast between now and 2008–09. By then it will be 1.6 per cent. It is not only the Chancellor who says so. Barclays' economic briefing gives a handy little graph, in which all the big bits above the line were under the Tories and the bits under the line—showing the public finances in surplus—were under a Labour Government. The briefing states:

"However, public borrowing was much higher in the last cycle . . . we are not facing a crisis."

Its predictions up to 2008–09 for the deficit as a percentage of GDP are below my right hon. Friend's. Commentators outside the House do not, therefore, uniformly take issue with my right hon. Friend on where the economy is going.

I do not wish to get bogged down in statistics because for me the Budget is about people, and one of its themes was education. The amount spent per pupil in schools in England—the figures for Scotland, Wales and Northern Ireland are issued separately—for the 11-year period between 1997 and 2008 will go up from £2,500 per annum to £5,500. Some of that increase needs to be adjusted for inflation, but that is a massive increase. It is also a massive increase in the quality of people's lives, not only while they are still at school but in their whole life experience, because they have had a better start in life. For me, that is what economics and figures are about.

The Chancellor announced support for a new deal for skills. It is vital that we continue to upskill, not only for economic performance, important as it is—no one in this country should be starving and people should have a good standard of living—but also for quality of life. Whether people exercise their skills to make a living or as a hobby, having skills will enhance the quality of life for many of them. Investing in skills is certainly vital for the economy, but it is also vital for the quality of life in our society; it is a people thing.

The arguments are similar on science. The amount for NHS-associated research and development will be £1.2 billion. That is important not only in economic terms, but because the NHS has an effect on the quality of life; for some people, NHS research and development or the new medical research funding announced in the Budget will affect whether they live or die. That is not just dry economics.

[Rob Marris]

I referred earlier to what commentators are saying about the state of the economy and its relationship to past performance, and I want to quote from some of those outside observers to discuss where the initiatives on enterprise announced by the Chancellor are likely to take us. In February, NTC Research, an economics research outfit based in Henley, stated that its leading indicator, which provides a pointer to growth over the next nine months, rose in January 2004 to its highest level since March 1997. That is pretty positive. That indicator had enjoyed its fourth successive monthly improvement.

Kate Barker has understandably been cited today in relation to the housing report. She has also been a member of the Bank of England Monetary Policy Committee for the past three years. When the housing report was announced, she said that the last time there had been as much optimism on economic outlook was in 1995.

In January, the CBI's quarterly distributive trades survey of retailers reported that business was above average for that time of year. The CBI's chief economic adviser said that consumer spending remained resilient. That is not just dry economic statistics; people with the traditional pound in their pocket are spending it on goods that they can use, and although that will not necessarily increase the quality of their lives, it is likely to do so.

Earlier this month, the Chartered Institute of Purchasing and Supply said that its activity index was a substantial 59.5 in February, marginally lower than the 59.8 of a month earlier. Any reading over 50 indicates growth. Those figures are well above 50, so that indicates optimism about growth in the economy. Thirty per cent. of the institute's survey panel had experienced an increase in business activity: "Panel firms . . . remain optimistic".

The economy is buoyant in many sectors, but, as was said earlier, there are difficulties for productivity—again, it is a people thing. I think the right hon. Member for Fylde (Mr. Jack) quoted from box 3.1 on page 49 of the Red Book; uncharacteristically, from my experience of the right hon. Gentleman in the last two Finance Bill Committees, he was quoting somewhat selectively from that section of the Red Book—a point on which my hon. Friend the Member for Warwick and Leamington (Mr. Plaskitt) picked him up.

You will tell me if I go too far, Mr. Deputy Speaker, but with your indulgence I shall quote some of the points about productivity from the Red Book, because of the people angle. It notes that

"UK workers on average produce as much as German workers, and the productivity gap with France has fallen by seven percentage points".

Some of the figures are good and some are bad; it all depends on the country with which we are comparing the United Kingdom. The box on page 49 also includes a chart showing the output per person of working age. That is vital, because economics should not be merely about growth figures and who is making a profit, but about the quality of people's lives. As for the output per person of working age, the UK is ahead of France and Germany and behind the US. Box 3.1 states:

"This measure indicates how effectively an economy includes all of its potential workers in productive employment. It shows that UK performance is significantly better than Germany, at a similar level to France, and around 25 per cent behind the US."

That is important, but not only in terms of the dry statistics and the dry economics. It is to do with people's lives. It relates to 1.8 million more people having a job than had a job when the Government took office in 1997. From memory, I believe that 1.3 million of those jobs are in the private sector. There has not simply been huge growth in the public sector.

These statistics are important because of the quality of people's lives. In my experience, most people—I would not say everybody; indeed I could not say that—are happier when they have a job. I accept that that is not always the position. For example, some people may have a job that they do not like. However, employment is to do with dignity, self-respect and looking after one's family. Most people tend to be happier in those circumstances. It is a significant achievement that the Government, led in this area by my right hon. Friend the Chancellor and the Treasury team, have enabled so many more people to be in work.

We forget at our peril that there were 3 million, 4 million and, on some measures, 5 million people unemployed under the previous Conservative Government. We should not forget the human misery that that led to for those involved—regardless of whether it was the fault of the Conservative Government or the result of a macro-economic global cycle. Personally, I think the Conservative Government had much to answer for, but I leave those politics aside. There was a great deal of misery, and there is less misery now. That is a significant advance for our society. My right hon. Friend the Chancellor deserves quite a bit of credit for that. It was not just a happenstance. It was not serendipitous. It happened because of tough economic decisions, taken by the Chancellor, that led to 1.8 million more people being in employment. We are talking of record numbers of people in employment.

I think the hon. Member for Sevenoaks (Mr. Fallon) talked about the report on NHS productivity. Again, this is a people thing. By getting bogged down in dry statistics, there is a tendency to overlook the quality-of-life argument—the people argument. If, for example, a GP decides that he or she will spend eight minutes with each patient instead of six minutes, on the face of it productivity will decrease by 25 per cent. However, many Members, particularly Labour Members, would see it as it a good thing if a doctor could do that.

If hard-pressed workers in the NHS did not have to rush as much and nurses and auxiliary nurses, for example—they do a wonderful job—could spend a bit more time with patients to reassure them, and so on, it could be said that on a scale productivity would be shown to have decreased. The nurses would not be looking after so many patients. However, the quality of life of those patients—the public service offered—might well have increased. There may be dry economic-type figures about what has happened to productivity in the NHS, and we should not overlook them. We need to be aware of the figures and they must be monitored, but they do not tell the whole story about the bang for the buck that the taxpayer is getting in terms of the money that is going into the NHS. We must have regard to the experience of the individual who needs NHS treatment and help. Those factors must come into the equation.

Like the hon. Member for Sutton Coldfield (Mr. Mitchell), I am a west midlands Member. Manufacturing is the lifeblood of the west midlands. Indeed, it represents 30 per cent. of the economy in the region, as against 18 or 19 per cent. in the rest of the United Kingdom.

We have a real difficulty with manufacturing. If we were all to be honest on both sides of the House, I think that we would find that no one knows what to do about manufacturing. I certainly do not. We should pay more attention to manufacturing, and it is to the Government's credit that in the past two or three years they have started to do so. That was a bit of a long time coming. Manufacturing is a huge problem in the western world, but the problem is greater in the United Kingdom because of what has happened in terms of our export markets, for example. For all the criticisms about regulations and the European Union, for example, and for all the alleged rigidities and inflexibilities of manufacturing in Germany, Italy or France, the manufacturing sectors of those economies trade at a surplus whereas ours do not.

I am a member of the Transport and General Workers Union, which is affiliated to the TUC. I am grateful for the pre-Budget briefing provided by the TUC, in which it points out that in "the past year . . . investment across engineering fell by 36 per cent. in real terms."

If we interpret the 1999 figure for manufacturing investment as 100 on an index of 100, in the third quarter of 2003 that index stood at 67.4, which is a huge drop. The net return on capital in the same period dropped from 9.4 per cent. to 7.4 per cent. I do not want to get sucked into the statistics, but there is a significant problem in manufacturing in the United Kingdom. I am not sure, however, that people know what to do about it.

One difficulty is persuading people with capital to invest in manufacturing on the basis that they will get an adequate return. Historically, that is a long-term problem in the United Kingdom, and has not just developed under this Government or the previous one. A number of world-beating inventions have originated in the United Kingdom, but we have not been able to develop innovations such as fibre optics or magnetic resonance imaging scanners, which were invented in Leicester. We cannot market them profitably, so people in other countries start to do so and make money from them. We have a great background of science and invention. The hon. Member for Sutton Coldfield will be interested to learn that, a few years ago, I read that the majority of patents in the United Kingdom are taken out by people with an address within a 35-mile radius of Birmingham city centre, which covers both our constituencies.

The west midlands is arguably the centre of innovation in the United Kingdom, but we are not as good at getting the stuff to market. I am not sure that, despite all the help that the Chancellor has offered in this Budget and previous Budgets with research and development tax credits—initially incentives such as the 125 per cent. write-off applied to small businesses but were extended to larger businesses last year—we have done as much as we can to bolster manufacturing and encourage investment. The Department of Trade and Industry has just produced a report on innovation, and I went to a talk on the subject yesterday, but it did not address the problem of how to move from innovation to the marketplace. I am not suggesting that we always fail to tackle the issue. The bloke who invented Dyson vacuum cleaners, for example, also invented the little wheelbarrow with the ball on the front instead of a wheel—the Financial Secretary is too young to remember that, but perhaps you do, Mr. Deputy Speaker. Dyson made a fortune out of that invention when he was based in Corsham near Bath. There are people who have brought their inventions to market in the United Kingdom and made money out of them, but in general the Government need to do more to encourage investment in manufacturing.

Positive steps have been taken in the past two years, both by the DTI and the Chancellor, but no one is sure what else to do about manufacturing, which leaves me wringing my hands in frustration. As a Member of Parliament I might be described as self-opinionated—if I was not, I would not stand for election—but I often have bright ideas that may be completely wrong. I do not have many bright ideas about manufacturing, and do not encounter many people who do or who say, "If only we did this there would be a revival in British manufacturing and we could stop the haemorrhaging of jobs, restore investment and get innovations to market. We would all be making more money and we would all be happier." Above all, we should be careful in economics not to overlook people and their happiness.

5.59 pm

Mr. Nick Gibb (Bognor Regis and Littlehampton) (Con): It is a pleasure to follow the hon. Member for Wolverhampton, South-West (Rob Marris), who seems to have the right approach to the conduct of political debate. However, he overestimates the problem with manufacturing.

Britain is a huge overseas investor. British entrepreneurs have billions of pounds of manufacturing assets around the world. The hon. Gentleman mentioned one of those entrepreneurs, Mr. Dyson, who has moved his factory to the far east. That is not necessarily a devastating decision, because the profits from those factories will come to the UK, the entrepreneurial activity will take place in the UK, and the design of new products will take place in the UK, so many metal-bashing jobs will be replaced by warm, comfortable, higher paid jobs in offices and design studios. The figures from the TUC that the hon. Gentleman quotes will not include the masses of manufacturing that takes place under the aegis of British entrepreneurs all around the world.

The hon. Gentleman underestimates the problem with Government borrowing. The debt figures, to which many of my hon. Friends have referred, have been revised a number of times. In last year's Red Book, for example, the net borrowing for 2004–05 was set at £24 billion. In the pre-Budget report, the figure was revised upwards to £31 billion, and today the Chancellor revised the figure yet again to £33 billion. He did not mention in his speech the inexorable upward shift of private finance initiative commitments, which now stand at about £6.5 billion every year. Those are like credit card payments, which we must pay, and £6.5 billion a year is the minimum payment. It is the Government's hidden debt. It would represent a huge quantum of debt if one could turn it into the actual capital figure that was spent.

[Mr. Nick Gibb]

I shall concentrate my remarks on tax avoidance. I am one of the few Members on the Conservative Benches who is not a former Financial Secretary, but I spent 13 years of my career, prior to entering the House, as a tax adviser in one of the big four accounting firms, so I have a real concern about corporate tax avoidance. I have a particular concern—I share the view of my hon. Friend the Member for Sutton Coldfield (Mr. Mitchell) on this—about aggressive corporate tax avoidance schemes, but I am still against a general anti-avoidance rule. I welcome the fact that the Chancellor has, for the moment, ruled out the introduction of such a rule.

I welcome the public and open move by Gus O'Donnell to call in the heads of tax of the big four accounting firms to tell them to stop marketing aggressive tax avoidance schemes. Those outrageous schemes are designed to use loopholes in the tax code to reduce a company's or a wealthy individual's tax bill—loopholes that were not designed to give that tax relief—for example, paying a City trader his bonus by lending him a substantial sum in the currency of an inflation-wracked country. The trader takes the currency and converts it immediately to sterling. A year later, once the foreign currency has substantially declined in value against sterling, he converts back into the foreign currency enough sterling to repay the debt. Of course, it requires significantly less sterling to repay the debt, and that gain, which is a foreign currency gain, is essentially tax-free. That loophole has been closed, but the question I ask—which my hon. Friend also asked, in a sense—is why the banks that used the scheme thought it was right for a City trader to receive his bonus in that tax-efficient way.

For most people, every penny they earn is taxed. In my judgment, it is taxed too highly. Even £10 of interest on a non-ISA building society account is taxed. Why does it become acceptable for some people with very large incomes not to pay tax on every penny of their income? What I find particularly galling about large companies that buy and demand aggressive tax avoidance schemes from their accountants—incidentally, it is only the large corporations that can afford to buy and implement those schemes, because they are very expensive—is that while they exploit those tax schemes, they continually lobby and complain about the increasing complexity of tax legislation that has become complex simply because the Inland Revenue is trying to close the loopholes that those companies have prised open.

Mr. Laws: I have a great deal of sympathy with the points the hon. Gentleman is making. Does he agree that many tax loopholes—for example, the film industry tax relief and the 0 per cent. corporation tax rate that caused so many businesses to incorporate—have been opened by the Government, not simply exploited by business?

Mr. Gibb: I do not regard those as loopholes. They are specific tax incentives introduced by the Government in order to encourage certain investment or activity. I find nothing wrong with companies or businesses deliberately deciding to take advantage of such concessions and therefore investing in films or incorporating small businesses into corporations to take advantage of the 0 per cent. rate. However, I do find it irritating that companies will try to exploit tax loopholes that do not have such objectives.

The large corporations that take advantage of those loopholes trumpet their involvement in corporate responsibility activities. They put people on the Cadbury and Greenbury committees looking into corporate governance, while complaining at board meetings about the high tax charge in the accounts and asking why the finance director has not done more to reduce it. They send employees off to inner cities to engage in worthy pro bono activities, while avoiding millions of pounds in tax that they should be paying, the shortfall from which has to be made up by ordinary taxpayers or from public spending in those very inner cities.

That all gives the impression that corporate responsibility is just a veneer. If a company genuinely believes in corporate responsibility, it should pay the tax that Parliament has decided it should pay. It should honour the spirit of the law, not just the wording, particularly if the legislation has been poorly drafted, which increasingly it tends to be.

Mr. Andrew Mitchell: Does my hon. Friend agree that companies should be encouraged to make it much clearer in their annual report and accounts how much tax they, and in particular their employees through PAYE, pay? First, it would demonstrate the important contribution that business and companies make to building hospitals, funding schools, and so on, and, secondly, where they do not make payments because they indulge in these schemes, it would be clear to all of us.

Mr. Gibb: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for making that point. It is a point that he made in his speech with regard to the Royal Bank of Scotland trumpeting the fact that it had paid huge sums of tax that was being used to fund hospitals and schools. He is right in the comment that he makes. We are talking about a minority of plcs that are engaged in such activities, so it would be useful for shareholders and others to try to expose companies that are not being corporately responsible and fulfilling their obligations to society.

Let us not forget that the companies that use such schemes are not fledgling, struggling businesses, with the owners' homes on the line because of the money that they owe the banks; nor are we in an era of 98 per cent. tax rates, as we were in the 1970s when tax avoidance was almost inevitable, and almost understandable because of the very high corporate and income tax rates. We are talking about plcs, well-known household names, some of which are headed by multi-millionaires.

I raise this because it is part of a wider issue. It is about people in positions of responsibility asking "Is this right?" Corporate responsibility is not just about asking "Is this legal?" or "Is this within the wording of the legislation?"; it is about asking "Is this right?" That question should dominate board meetings. Large businesses cannot have it both ways. They cannot complain about increasing amounts of legislation if all they do when assessing a proposition is to ask "Is this legal?" If morality extends only up to ensuring that an activity is within the law, it becomes the responsibility of the legislators to ask "Is this right?", to fill the moral vacuum and to create new laws to cover every eventuality and new development.

If the view of some of those who run the major corporate enterprises of this country is that any activity is justified provided that it is within the law and that they have no responsibility beyond that, and no responsibility to ask whether something is right even though it is legal, they cannot complain when the laws are continually extended. Make Warburton, of the accounting firm Grant Thornton, summed up that corporate view when he said:

"Tax advisers have a duty to minimise their clients' tax. Indeed they can be sued for not doing so."

Of course accountants should advise their clients on all the legitimate tax concessions that Parliament has introduced, but that does not extend to schemes designed to exploit the tax code in ways that were not intended.

As a Conservative, I abhor increasing amounts of regulation and laws. They are costly to enforce, read and understand and they distort and hamper free enterprise. However, if we want, as I do, to live in a low regulated society, it is imperative that its leading members take upon themselves a sense of responsibility so that they behave responsibly without the need for such rules and regulations. In essence, they must ask the question, "Is this right?" If the answer is no, they should not proceed.

Was it right for Merrill Lynch to advise unsuspecting savers to invest in companies that it knew to be junk? Did someone on the board in New York ask, "Is this right?" Was it right in the 1980s for companies to borrow off balance sheet to deceive bondholders or circumvent their rights? Was it right for Rank Xerox to boost its profit figures in its accounts by recognising now profits to be earned in future years? Did the advisers to Enron ask whether it was right to deceive investors and creditors by pushing swathes of debt off balance sheet in special purpose vehicles?

The problem with the position that we have reached is that it has been spawned partly by excessive regulations. The more burdensome and extensive the regulation, the more people feel that complying with it somehow fulfils their moral obligations. That is similar to high taxes. The higher the tax, the more people feel that their responsibility to others is fulfilled when they sign the cheque to the Inland Revenue.

Rob Marris: The hon. Gentleman is making an extremely thoughtful speech. He posed what was almost a chicken-and-egg question about whether regulation led to a decline in moral standards, to use my words, or vice versa. It strikes me that a series of outrageous manoeuvres—he has referred to some of them; another is Chester Street Holdings, formerly Iron Trades Holdings, which was an insurance scam that was legal under employers' liability legislation—led to regulation rather than regulation spawning the manoeuvres. Of course, a vicious circle ensues.

Mr. Gibb: The hon. Gentleman is partly right, but there are other incentives and motivations for Governments to introduce regulation. Political ideology, sometimes inegalitarian ideology, often determines such matters. The working time directive is an example of that. It adds to regulation. In opposing legislation on corporate responsibility, the Cadbury report stated:

"Statutory measures would impose a minimum standard and there would be a greater risk of boards complying with the letter, rather than the spirit of their requirements."

That is the essence of the issue. The more rules that exist, the more people believe that any amount of underhand behaviour is permissible provided that there is no rule against it.

How do we break out of that vicious cycle? The onus must be on those in senior positions in society to accept a wider responsibility. The Government, too, can play a role in ending the vicious cycle by engaging seriously in simplifying the tax systems. My right hon. Friend the Member for Fylde (Mr. Jack) also called for that. Complexity provides scope for the sort of schemes that we are considering. Complexity and consequent lack of transparency appear to lend acceptability to measures that are designed to avoid the scope of the tax system. A simpler, more transparent tax system would reinforce responsibility and enable people to have faith in its integrity.

Some critics will say that that is all naïve nonsense, but I do not believe that it is. In this information age, people want—and will ultimately get—authenticity and truth. Reputation for honesty and integrity in business is becoming the most valuable of a company's intangible assets. A company that neglects such an asset is destined to go the way of Arthur Andersen, whoever that was.

As Onora O'Neill said in her Reith lecture on trust in 2002:

"Citizens, it is said, no longer trust governments, or politicians, or Ministers, or the police, or the courts, or the prison service. Consumers, it is said, no longer trust business, especially big business, or their products. None of us, it is said, trusts banks, or insurers, or pension providers. Patients no longer trust doctors and in particular no longer trust hospitals or hospital consultants."

It is therefore in the self-interest of business, politicians and political parties to protect and nurture their reputations for scrupulous adherence to truth and authenticity. Consumers do not want to be ripped off by business, and the public do not want to be conned by politicians. That is not a naïve view, but a statement of the obvious.

I am against a general anti-avoidance rule, and I am grateful that the Chancellor has ruled it out for the moment. It would be a cumbersome and costly mechanism, and it would create uncertainty. We already have extensive anti-avoidance case law, but to introduce a general legislative anti-avoidance provision would hand to the Inland Revenue too much discretionary power to tax in a way that would be capricious and non-rules based. However, it is up to those in senior positions in business to convince the public by their behaviour that no such rule will ultimately become necessary.

6.15 pm

Alan Simpson (Nottingham, South) (Lab): I am very pleased to be called to speak on the first day of the Budget debate, and I begin by paying a couple of tributes, the first of which is to the hon. Member for Bognor Regis and Littlehampton (Mr. Gibb) for an extremely principled analysis and denunciation of tax avoidance, and where it takes us as a society. I urge Members not currently in the Chamber to read his remarks carefully and reflect on them.

I also pay tribute to the hon. Member for Sutton Coldfield (Mr. Mitchell), who made extremely thoughtful and honest comments on the pensions dilemma, and on some of the ways in which we shall have to address problems of housing provision in the years ahead. He pointed out the real difficulties of removing regulation to the point at which developers not only are allowed to determine housing density on land on which they have freedom and permission to develop, but leave behind social consequences in the communities that contain the developments, once they have left with the moneys that they have made out of them. Again, it would be helpful for us all to reflect on his comments.

I welcome the generous comments that the hon. Member for Sutton Coldfield made on the Budget's good points, and I wish only that the Leader of the Opposition had not been so disparaging in his comments. It was extremely disappointing that he was unable to recognise and comment positively on the stability and economic growth that this Chancellor has delivered, and which was always out of the reach of the Conservatives when they were in government. It is unhelpful to retreat into a knocking copy analysis that is waylaid by arguments that any taxation is bad taxation, and that less taxation must be good. That in no way engages with the nature and challenges of the society in which we live.

The same may be said of commitments to knock the Chancellor's decisions on when in the economic cycle to borrow, and for what purposes. Anyone who runs on claims that their only commitments are to reduce taxation and borrowing is left with fairly spurious spending promises that are impossible to deliver. A further issue is the duplicity of the positions taken on debt. I have not heard Members in the House denounce households' decisions to take on mortgages. Those decisions to take on family debt are seen as responsible, because the family make them in the knowledge that they will get a solid, secure asset that will have lasting and, they hope, increasing value. However, when some Members discuss Government decisions to borrow for infrastructure investment, although that also involves assets that will accrue in value, they suddenly call those decisions morally reprehensible, and denounce the Government for making them. That duplicity and inconsistency does no credit to the debates that must be held in the House.

I want to focus on three issues. They are observations on, rather than criticisms of, how the Chancellor has brought us to this point, but they involve challenges that we have yet properly to address. My plea to the House is for a grown-up discussion of the difficult issues that lie ahead of us, and I want to focus on three of them. They are: first, what we should do about pensions; secondly, how we should deal with infrastructure investment; and, thirdly, the question of the environment.

Whatever party is in power, we must recognise that it is a biological rather than a political reality that, as we live longer and expect to spend less of our lives in work and more in retirement, we shall have to ask ourselves how we are to pay for that change in the balance of our lives. The only way to pay for it properly is to recognise that we shall have to pay more in our working years for the length and quality of our retirement years. That is not a politically contentious thing to say; it is simply a biological fact of life. The real debate that needs to take place is on how we can best do that, rather than on whether we do it at all.

We are told that we are not saving enough. This weekend, Sandy Crombie, the chief executive of Standard Life, wrote a useful summary in The Observer. In the opening paragraph of his article, he said:

> "This country is facing an enormous challenge. People are living longer and the trend has been for them to spend less of their lifetime working. They need to save more, but they are not. The Government estimates that 3 million workers are not saving for retirement at all, and another 5 million to 10 million are not saving enough. According to some estimates, half of all UK workers are saving less than they should."

What can we do about this? If we try to take this message out to young people, we learn the salutary lesson that we have virtually lost the argument before we start. Many young people say, "Save for retirement? You're mad! You must be absolutely stark staring bonkers! Look at the people we are working alongside. Many of them have saved throughout their entire working lives in works pension schemes, yet they are being told that all the savings that have gone into those schemes are now worthless. The company schemes have gone bust, the money has disappeared, and what people thought of as their savings for retirement have been frittered away somewhere. The system is not going to safeguard the money that I put into it; it's going to run off with it. The money will disappear. Do you think that's what I want to do? Absolutely not!" This crisis of confidence for those people who would not even dream of putting money into a pension scheme has to be addressed.

I would like the Government to recognise that we have to come up with measures to address the restoration of pension entitlements to those who have saved throughout their working lives and who believe that their pensions have been stolen from them. I would have liked to see such measures in today's Budget, but they will be welcome whenever they are introduced. No amount of new pensions provision will be credible if it does not address the theft of the pension entitlements of those who have been told that their pensions have now gone.

In other debates in the House, Members have drawn attention to the amounts that are currently sitting in various pots in what are called orphan funds, held by banks, solicitors and different sections of the financial services industry. Estimates of the amount in those funds are as much as £50 billion. The highest estimate of what it would cost to meet the needs of the 60,000 pensioners who have been told that they have lost the value of their pension savings ranges up to a maximum figure of £450 million a year. If the Government were to require the industry to put that £50 billion aside, we could comfortably pay that £450 million a year simply out of the interest that would be earned on it. The important thing, however, is that we honour a debt—a contract entered into honestly by workers who, through their lives, contributed to their works pension schemes.

In part, the credibility of the schemes and exhortations that come from the Government must be considered in the sense in which we honour the commitments made by those generations. It does not have to be the Chancellor who puts his hand in his pocket, or other people's pockets, but he does have to say to the financial services industry, "Those orphaned funds are not your money anyway. This is still other people's money that you're sitting on, and every now and again you have a little scoop out of that pot." That is to meet the company's needs, not the needs of those whose pension entitlements have been taken from them.

If we were to go down that path we would go a long way towards restoring the credibility of exhortations to save for the pension years, but it would not be enough. We also must reflect on the obsession, which the Labour Government inherited, with the desire to go in for means-testing. I will not go through this in detail, but I urge Members of the House to read the document recently produced by the Pensions Policy Institute entitled "Citizen's Pension: Lessons from New Zealand".

The institute's approach turns its back on the obsession with means-testing. It goes in for a much simpler system, which is to deliver a flat-rate universal pension payable to all people over the age of 65. It is popularly referred to as the "65 at 65" pension, because the pensioner couple will receive between them 65 per cent. of the average wage at the point at which they retire. This is a generous pension that provides a platform beyond which people can have their works or second pension and their other income streams, all of which should be subject to normal rules of taxation. However, it removes the sense of contradiction in an increasingly complex means-tested system.

The reality, as everyone who has looked at pensions will say, is that it is always the contradictions at the margin that are greatest and most unfair. The clawback on those at the margins of eligibility is where the greatest sense of unfairness appears to lie. This approach is a helpful way out on an important issue that this and subsequent Parliaments will have to face.

The Pensions Policy Institute paper is modest, as it makes proposals that would deliver a citizen's pension in the UK of about 22 to 25 per cent. of national average earnings. It states:

"This level of benefits is not generous, but it would mean that hardly any pensioners need to be means-tested for their basic income."

We must be willing to go down that path if we are to try to make all other pension savings exhortations credible, because many of those in work are saying to us on the doorstep, "We must have been daft to have been putting money aside." Those who have put savings aside through their working lives find themselves in a means-tested system and being penalised in terms of their eligibilities while those who have put nothing aside get the full benefit of provision. We have to look at ways of removing those disincentives within the system.

In relation to second pensions, however, I would make a further point. If we had doubled the savings rate rather than halved it, and if that money had gone substantially as an increase in pension funds, whether works or occupational, would that have made today's position any easier? The answer is no, because the crash was driven by an excess of capital in pursuit of shares whose value was being driven speculatively through the roof. All that we would have done is to have thrown twice the amount of money at the same number of shares, share values would have rocketed, and the crash would have been even more dramatic.

A year ago, I did some work with two other people that attempted to examine a different approach to pensions, which I make no apologies for commending to the House. Richard Murphy, Colin Hines and I wrote a document entitled "People's Pensions", which looked at the fact that the £250 billion that had been wiped off the value of UK pension fund holdings in the previous year largely reflected the change in balance of where pension fund contributions were going. Forty years ago, more than half of pension fund savings were going into Government bonds, which were by and large focused on infrastructure investments and assets that were not going to disappear. In the last year for which we could get figures, however, 71 per cent. of pension fund contributions went into shares, and only 17 per cent. into Government bonds. That was backed up by public sector investment that was increasingly driven by dependence on private finance initiative schemes and the approach to off-balance-sheet accounting that seems to be in vogue at the moment.

When we considered a different approach to pension funds and pension schemes, one of the most obvious issues was that hospitals, schools and local authorities involved in PFI schemes were being charged an interest rate of 16.6 per cent. Local hospital trusts are already hitting budgeting crises as the annual repayment costs of PFI schemes start to cut into the costs of other direct patient services. We pointed out that if no more than half the £50 billion a year that workers currently put into their pension schemes were channelled through the people's pensions vehicles that we proposed into direct public infrastructure investments, even at a rate of 5 per cent. to 6 per cent., that would be a quarter of the rate being charged by PFI providers. It would also deliver tangible assets that provided real improvements in quality of life and the access to services on which people relied—we would get an improvement in service, a tangible asset and something that would not disappear in the bursting of a dotcom bubble.

The challenge facing us is how to break from a fascination with an approach to financing the future that is driven by the short-term demands and requirements of the financial services industry. We must set down different ethical or legal requirements for the way in which that sector of the economy works in relation to the needs of the whole economy.

The House needs to reflect on where our current infrastructure dependence on PFI schemes is taking us. If we consider tables C16, C17, C18 and C19 in the Red Book, we see that if we put together the signed bid and preferred bidder stages of PFI schemes, we are currently looking at getting about £7.3 billion a year as income. We are having to support PFI contracts with payments averaging £6 billion a year, for the next 12 to 15 years. Even if that is matched by the direct Government investment to which the Chancellor referred, great chunks of the investment will have to be underpinned by the asset sales he mentioned—also running at £6 billion a year—if fresh investment is to be made.

All that leaves us with real problems to do with the assets that we no longer own and the liabilities that we shall still have to honour. I can think of so many better ways in which we as a society, and we as a Labour Government, could try to safeguard the contributions that people are currently making to their pension schemes, and direct them more effectively into the public infrastructure investments that society needs so badly. We must go further, however. We have got into the habit of making freedom to invest publicly conditional on a willingness to dispose of public assets. If we want a level playing field, we should argue for open and accountable democracy. If local government wants to invest in the improvement of its housing stock, let it borrow in the way that we say we are making it free to borrow, but not on the basis that it can sell out one set of council tenants to meet the housing needs of another set. Trading in people—trading in people's lives—is not an activity for which a Labour Government will be thanked.

I welcome the Chancellor's specific references to the environment, but I feel that an opportunity has been missed. He came up with some useful proposals for incentives to make people shift towards less polluting fuels, but the right hon. Member for Fylde (Mr. Jack) was right about biofuels. The Environment, Food and Rural Affairs Committee received numerous representations from the energy industry, describing the various levels of financial incentive that would enable the industry to act ethically and produce non-polluting fuels. Increasingly, members of the Committee responded by asking, "Why don't we just give you an obligation to do that?" If the cost were spread across all fuel types and fuel sales, the consumer would experience minimal change.

Why should the Government try to find cash incentives to pay the industry to act in a less polluting way? Surely it is much more sensible to tell the industry that that is its duty. If the costs are absorbed within the industry as a whole, as long as we specify the rate at which we want polluting fuels to be replaced by less polluting fuels, let the industry get on with it.

Another opportunity was sadly missed when no duty was imposed on aviation fuel. Like every other Member, no doubt, I take advantage of the low-cost flights that are currently available. Can I justify that on environmental grounds? Absolutely not.

If we are considering the real challenges and choices, we should not say that we must support a proposal because we are locked irrevocably into a globalised economy. The real challenge is, in fact, the other way round. Like Joseph Stiglitz, a former member of the World Bank board, I am a disbeliever in globlisation: I think it is rapidly reaching its sell-by date. The one thing that is here to stay for the rest of our lives is the reality of climate change, which will turn everything upside down. We will have to revise the whole way in which we think about sustainable international economics if we are to survive the century in a civilised fashion.

I want the Chancellor—I know that he can do it—to come up with a new raft of policies that promote a sustainable environment rather than an exploited one, promoting sustainable trade rather than a global free-for-all, and favouring the reduction of product miles rather than the explosion of pollution costs that comes from goods in global transit. Other countries in Europe have policies that tax-favour the restoration of localised and regionalised economic systems. That is low-impact economics that will be in the interests of all and provide employment and sustainable lifestyles for all. That is the challenge that every Government in this country will face for the entirety of my lifetime.

We have to meet our Kyoto targets. One way of doing that relates to an issue that I have droned on about in the House more than I should have: ending fuel poverty. The Chancellor mentioned the commitment to new social house building. That is important, but we must recognise that the majority of families will live in the housing stock that is available today. The reality for those who are fuel-poor today is that they will live in the housing that is fuel-poor tomorrow. We must focus our attention on that housing stock.

Through the Fuel Poverty Advisory Committee, the Government were given a stark warning about a fortnight ago that we simply will not meet our legal undertakings to end fuel poverty unless there is a 50 per cent. increase in the Budget commitment to eradicate fuel poverty in social housing alone. That does not even take us into the challenges of how we do so in private rented houses, and especially houses in multiple occupation. We have to create a shift in the resources. I look forward to the day when the Chancellor introduces a framework of environmental commitments that will bring to an end the human and environmental misery of fuel poverty.

This was a good Budget. It was not an election Budget. It was a Budget for education and science. It was a Budget to reassure, but not yet to inspire. I was disappointed that the Leader of the Opposition struggled to address the issues even of the last century. I hope that it will be within the grasp of a Labour Government—only a Labour Government will do this—to set out our stall to address the issues of the century that we have entered, rather than following the Opposition into the century that we have left.

Mr. John Baron (Billericay) (Con): I congratulate the hon. Member for Nottingham, South (Alan Simpson) on a thoughtful contribution in relation to pensions, and my hon. Friend the Member for Bognor Regis and Littlehampton (Mr. Gibb) on his thoughts on tax avoidance.

No Budget is all good or all bad. There are aspects of this Budget that I warmly welcome, including the increased spending on our armed forces and the tax incentives for investment in very small start-up businesses. However, it was said earlier that Budgets are essentially about people, and I want to concentrate on two key failings in the Budget that will directly affect my constituents. The first will impact on the small business community in my constituency. The Government will not be surprised to learn that a recent business survey clearly showed that small businesses in my constituency were fed up to the back teeth with the amount of regulation and extra red tape that the Government have introduced in recent years.

Independent analysis has shown that, on average, just under 4,000 new regulations have been introduced each year since 1997. No one is arguing that regulations are new under this Government and that they did not occur before, but there has been an increase of more than 50 per cent. compared with the level under the previous Conservative Administration. Frankly, businesses are getting tired of this. It is no wonder that The Economist stated:

"Labour is losing the battle for the hearts and minds of British business."

Responses to my constituency survey revealed that businesses are spending a lot more time on red tape and regulation, and that these extra regulations serve only to slow growth or to make it harder to run businesses in general.

We could talk in some detail about the increase in national insurance contributions. Understandably, many businesses consider it a tax on employment. It has led directly to redundancies, a slow-down in recruitment and a reduction in profits. To an extent, it has affected staff morale and made it more difficult to run businesses in general.

Various independent statistics seem to confirm these findings. I shall not give a long list of figures, but I shall mention those provided by two independent bodies. The Institute of Chartered Accountants and the Institute of Directors both claim that the cost to UK businesses of implementing new legislation is running at an extra £6 billion a year. Those might be abstract figures but they illustrate a growing problem: we are suffering from decreasing competitiveness. This Government tend to forget that the burden of red tape always falls disproportionately on small firms, which is particularly worrying as they are often the lifeblood of our local economies. Small companies simply do not have the personnel to deal with an ever-increasing number of regulations. Figures from the Institute of Chartered Accountants confirm that the cost to small businesses of new legislation has more than doubled in recent years.

It is often the entrepreneur who ends up dealing with this increase in paperwork, when he or she would be better employed running their business and creating wealth. For me, this is the central point. Budgets should be about trying to maximise the country's economic potential; that way, we are in a far better position to help those who need it. But that can be better brought about if we foster personal freedoms within the rule of law, encourage enterprise and allow businesses—particularly small businesses—to breathe and thrive. Such an approach, all things being equal, would lead to a more prosperous economy, from which the Government could take their rightful share in order to help the truly disadvantaged in society, and fund essential public services. That will not happen if they continue to pile regulation and red tape on to businesses. In the longer term, that will hinder enterprise and, in turn, our ability to help those most in need. Yet since 1997, this Government have continued to make life difficult for entrepreneurs. This Budget does little to put that right.

It is not just small businesses in my constituency that will be disappointed with this Budget; so will the many taxpayers who have seen tax increases under this Government, but very little in return. We all know that when in opposition in 1995, the current Prime Minister said:

"We've no plans to increase tax at all".

Most independent forecasters accept—and the general public certainly seem to—that we have had a welter of tax increases since 1997; indeed, some put the figure as high as 60. Some suggest that a typical couple on average full-time earnings is now paying an extra £500 a year or more in tax under this Government. It is no surprise that the Government's tax revenue has risen by some 50 per cent. since 1997.

My constituents are asking these simple questions. Given that they have paid all these taxes, why is violent crime rising so fast, why are detection rates so low and why are there so few police on our streets? Patients in the constituency are asking why accident and emergency waiting times are so bad, why we are so short of GPs and why average waiting times have either not improved or are getting worse. Parents are rightly asking why teacher vacancies have increased so significantly under the Government and why it is so difficult to get their children into local schools. Commuters are asking why there has been so little investment in our roads, and residents are asking why the Government have done so little to combat the illegal development of our green belt and why so little progress has been made on waste recycling in comparison with our European neighbours.

In short, my constituents are rightly concerned about why such a large increase in taxation has produced so few results. The conclusion can only be that a large element of Government spending has been wasted. What is doubly concerning about this Budget is that, with projected borrowing forecast to rise to about £140 billion over the next five years, further tax increases are inevitable, should Labour win a third term of office.

In conclusion, Budgets should be about maximising the economic potential of the country to raise living standards for all, but this Budget does not achieve that goal. We have seen an increasing tendency for the Government to tax and spend—to tax the wealth creators in our society and then spend the proceeds in a way that, to this point at least, has had little effect. If anything, the Budget reinforces the view that "government knows best".

There is no doubt that the vast majority of hon. Members, regardless of party, are here because they want to improve society. We differ on the method of achieving that goal. Conservative Members have greater faith in the individual than the state, believing that politicians can sometimes be the problem, not the solution. That is so whether we are talking about freeing entrepreneurs from stifling regulation or costs, allowing local communities to take their own decisions about green belt development, giving local police forces more say in how they police their local communities, or allowing our local doctors and nurses and our governors and teachers more say in the running of their hospitals and schools. We must guard against an over-powerful Government who encroach on the personal rights and freedoms of individuals, and instead encourage individual initiative and enterprise, which will benefit society as a whole. We must also guard against Budgets that reinforce the centralist tendency. That is why I cannot support the Budget today.

Debate adjourned.—[Joan Ryan.]

Debate to be resumed tomorrow.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Ordered,

That, at the sitting on Wednesday 24th March,—

(1) notwithstanding paragraph (2)(c)(i) of Standing Order No. 14 (Arrangement of public business), proceedings on opposition business shall lapse at Four o'clock or three hours after their commencement, whichever is the later, and

(2) the Motion for the adjournment of the House relating to Equitable Life may be proceeded with, though opposed, until Seven o'clock or for three hours, whichever is the later, and shall then lapse.—[Joan Ryan.]

PETITIONS

Sub-Regional Strategy (South Bedfordshire)

6.53 pm

Andrew Selous (South-West Bedfordshire) (Con): I present a petition signed by 17,000 of my constituents in south Bedfordshire about the scale, nature and location of the Government's development plans for that region. It is a matter of enormous concern to my constituents.

The petition states:

To the House of Commons

The petition of the residents of South Bedfordshire concerning the Milton Keynes and South Midlands Sub-Regional Strategy whereby the residents of South Bedfordshire ask the House of Commons to ask the Deputy Prime Minister to amend fundamentally the Milton Keynes and South Midlands sub-regional strategy so that the Government ensures local housing is built for local people (including affordable housing) and does not use South Bedfordshire to house large numbers of people from outside the district; ensures that the concerns of local people and their local representatives are fully recognised; ensures that future housing development does not make worse the congestion on our roads or the overcrowding of our trains and notes in particular that the agreed extension of the A505 to the M1 is to alleviate present congestion and that housebuilding on the proposed scale will make matters worse; ensures that any houses built are built close to and in proportion to any new jobs that are created; ensures that building on the South Bedfordshire green belt is kept to an absolute minimum; ensures that health, education, transport, police, shopping and other community facilities are built at the same time as any new homes.

And the petitioners remain, etc.

To lie upon the Table.

Parental Contact

6.55 pm

Mr. Ian Liddell-Grainger (Bridgwater) (Con): I wish to present a petition signed by 100 residents of the Bridgwater constituency. It declares:

That parents, after they separate, should enjoy a legal presumption of frequent and continuing contact with their children, unless a child's safety would be put at risk.

The petitioners therefore request that the House of Commons amend the Children Act 1989 to replace the term "contact order" with "parenting time order", to provide for the making and enforcement of parenting time orders, and to ensure that parents and, where appropriate, grandparents enjoy a presumption of contact with their children and grandchildren.

And the Petitioners remain, etc.

To lie upon the Table.

Paediatric Doctors

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Joan Ryan.]

6.56 pm

Tony Baldry (Banbury) (Con): Paediatrics is often in the media. No doubt the Minister's officials expected me to want to talk about the cases of Sally Clark, Trupti Patel and Angela Cannings, but I do not. To avoid confusion about the matters that I want to raise in the debate, I have given the Minister notice of what I intend to say. I want to raise the less familiar cases of three-year old Ian Luckett, a Bloxham boy who tragically died at Oxford's Radcliffe infirmary, and of the late Dr. Ian Watkins.

I shall begin with the tragic case of Ian Luckett. He is the reason why, a number of years ago, the Horton general hospital recruited paediatricians of the calibre of Dr. Bob Bell, who retired recently after many years of outstanding service to the community.

Ian Luckett died in 1974, after accidentally receiving a drug overdose. His father, Donald Luckett, told of how his son said, "Daddy, I want to sleep. My eyes won't stay open." That was just before he was discharged from the Houghton general hospital. The next day, Ian's father was unable to wake him: sadly, he never regained consciousness, and he died three days later at the Radcliffe infirmary.

There followed three inquiries into the tragic death of Ian Luckett. Two were private, internal inquires held by the then Oxford area health authority and the then district hospital management committee. After considerable lobbying by the boy's family and my predecessor as Member of Parliament for Banbury, Sir Neil Marten, a full public inquiry was held. It is that public inquiry, held some 30 years ago, that is relevant to the pressures facing paediatric services at the Horton hospital today.

The public inquiry was ordered by the then Secretary of State for Health and Social Security, Barbara Castle. Opening the inquiry, the chairman said:

"The reason there has been this third enquiry is because it is recognised by the Department . . . that there should be the fullest enquiry to ensure such a thing does not happen again."

I repeat that the aim was to ensure that "such a thing" did not happen again.

The evidence that the Luckett inquiry heard reinforced the need for an enhanced paediatric department, and for more trained paediatric staff at the Horton general hospital. Dr. Douglas Pickering, the consultant paediatrician at the Radcliffe infirmary, was reported by the Banbury Guardian of 6 June 1974 to have explained to the inquiry that he "would like to see doctors at the Horton rotate at the Radcliffe for paediatric experience".

Local people want that rotation to be available today.

When I read the evidence to the Luckett inquiry, some 30 years after it was held, I was struck by how strong was the message that the Horton general hospital needed experienced paediatricians and comprehensive paediatric care, not least because of the distance to other hospitals in Oxford.

What did the inquiry find? The Luckett report began by observing that "nursing and medical staff are devoted, but severely stretched", and I suggest that the same is true today, particularly among paediatricians. It recommended that

"junior medical staff might be rotated", and that recommendation is equally relevant today. It stressed that "only severely ill children, fit to travel, should be admitted directly to Oxford hospitals."

In other words, as many children as possible should be treated in Banbury.

It being Seven o'clock, the motion for the Adjournment lapsed, without Question put.

Motion made and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn—[Mr. Jim Murphy.]

Tony Baldry: My predecessor, Sir Neil Marten, rightly concluded that the Luckett inquiry

"highlights a number of matters that must be put right immediately. Nothing like this must be ever allowed to happen again".

There is now a danger that it may happen again.

Shortly afterwards, a number of paediatric consultants, including Dr. Bob Bell, were appointed at Horton general hospital, and no sick children had to travel to Oxford hospitals. In future, sick children will almost certainly have to travel to Oxford hospitals by night, when, by definition, it will be an emergency, if 24 hours a day, seven days a week paediatric care is withdrawn from the Horton.

The situation for paediatrics is grim even at the John Radcliffe hospital. My recent correspondence with the chairman and chief executive of the Oxford Radcliffe hospitals and the president of the Royal College of Paediatrics and Child Health has produced the same point time and again: there is a national shortage of paediatricians—simple as that. A parliamentary answer to my question about the matter states that just 15 new paediatricians are being trained over the coming year in England and Wales, although it goes on to say—using words very carefully—that "an extra 155 National Training Numbers have been proposed for paediatrics through other initiatives."—[Official Report, 4 March 2004; Vol. 418, c. 1117W.]

It is part of the impenetrable jargon of the NHS that training is referred to as national training numbers.

Why are so few paediatricians—just 15—being trained? The Minister should not underestimate the impact that downgrading local paediatric services will have on the people of north Oxfordshire and south Northamptonshire. The public inquiry of 1974 resulted in 24 hours a day, seven days a week paediatric services for north Oxfordshire and south Northamptonshire, which has been the situation for 30 years. Local people have become used to the high calibre of consultants such as Dr. Bob Bell and Dr. Harvey Marcovitch, who is now at the Royal College of Paediatrics and Child Health.

When Dr. Bob Bell retired in July last year, he expressed in public his concerns over the future of the children's ward at the Horton general hospital. There is now just one of the necessary five middle grade doctors in paediatric posts at Horton general hospital. Why have five advertisements led to no appointment? It seems that the number of trained doctors in the country is simply insufficient, and not enough of them are being trained.

Only Ministers can give us the complete answer, but surely part of the explanation is illustrated by the tragic death of Dr. Sid Watkins. The 44-year-old Dr. Watkins committed suicide last year and was a consultant paediatrician who had worked more than 100 hours in that week. The British Medical Association does not believe that his working week was unusual and calculates that almost 80 per cent. of consultants work more than 50 hours every week. The Independent, the only broadsheet to cover Dr. Watkins's death, quoted Harvey Marcovitch, by now working at the Royal College of Paediatrics and Child Health, who commented:

"there isn't anyone around anymore among the juniors who really knows what's going on with individual children day by day. They each see snippets and the consultants are left as the people responsible for keeping an eye on the whole of the child's hospital admission."

The answer must surely be to recruit more paediatricians, but NHS trusts cannot do so. The Independent did not mention the national shortage of paediatricians—it knew there was a shortage, but it did not know the numbers.

I know that the Royal College of Paediatrics and Child Health has conducted a survey and given the results to Ministers. I asked a parliamentary question about those results and—again, rather selectively—the answer was that Ministers were "considering" them. It would be interesting to know exactly what the Royal College of Paediatrics and Child Health said.

The parliamentary answer that I received on 4 March states:

"In 2004–05, a further 15 locally funded NTNs will be allocated." —[Official Report, 4 March 2004; Vol. 418, c. 1117W.]

It seems bizarre: fifteen for the whole of England and Wales; fifteen, when the president of the Royal College of Paediatrics and Child Health is telling Ministers that there is a serious shortage of trained paediatricians because of the European working time directive; fifteen, when two weeks ago I met the chairman and chief executive of the Oxford Radcliffe hospitals to be told that they are unable to recruit paediatricians; and fifteen next year actually means that 85 fewer paediatricians are being trained than last year when there is a severe shortage up and down the country.

Not only is there clearly a shortage of paediatricians but the working time directive is exacerbating existing difficulties. The Royal College of Paediatrics and Child Health, the British Medical Association, and the NHS Confederation in evidence to the Select Committee on Health have all made clear their concerns over the time left to implement the working time directive, which has hit paediatrics particularly hard. It has hit smaller general hospitals hardest, and I understand that Ministers have made funds available for rural areas such as Cornwall and Lincolnshire. I am under the impression that almost £46 million has been made available to implement the working time directive over the next three years. The Minister will be aware that I have asked his Department whether any additional funding might be made available to help the Horton general hospital. The Minister of State responded on 6 January:

"Turning specifically to the Horton, the recently announced strategic review explicitly sees a continuing and important role for the Horton in providing a range of hospital services. A paediatric task force is meeting to develop proposals for quality sustainable paediatric services at the Horton in response to difficulties in recruiting junior doctors."

Recruiting junior doctors is still difficult, and that must be related to the working time directive. Indeed, almost everywhere else in England and Wales is experiencing problems with it, especially in relation to paediatrics, because it involves 24-hour service. I reiterate that I hope that Ministers will consider the Radcliffe hospitals NHS trust as part of his Department's £46 million budget to recruit junior doctors and registrars who will have to meet the working time directive, whether existing or new.

There is a further problem. The Oxford Radcliffe trust is under the misapprehension that the Horton general hospital is no longer accredited to train registrar paediatricians. That is a serious concern. It is also seriously surprising because the president of the Royal College of Paediatricians tells me that the Horton is accredited; that there is no problem; and that, moreover, he would welcome more paediatricians working at the Horton general hospital.

Why does the trust say that it cannot train paediatricians at the Horton? There can be no doubt that that assumption was formed on the basis of poor advice given to the trust by others in the NHS. By way of example, a regional adviser in the NHS wrote on 9 January 2004:

"with . . . junior doctors hours being reduced progressively, it has been felt that the middle-grade posts currently available at the Horton Hospital are not of sufficiently high intensity for Specialist Registrar Training. My apologies to the Horton Hospital but, at present, we do not feel it is appropriate to allocate Specialist Registrar training there."

Such advice leaves the Horton general hospital in an invidious position. Without registrars, it is impossible to continue to have a 24-hour, seven-day paediatric department at the Horton general hospital with a children's ward with in-patient beds. The best that will be offered in future is a 9 to 6 service, five days a week, with any children requiring admission or more complex treatment being directed to Oxford.

On 1 March the chief executive of the Oxford Radcliffe hospitals NHS trust wrote to me. He said that "the workload is not considered to be enough to provide appropriate experience to meet training requirement".

That is what the trust believes. However, the Minister should know that the advice being given by NHS officials to the trust is completely the opposite of the paediatric service seen as suitable by the Royal College to operate at the Horton.

As Dr. Harvey Marcovitch explained by letter to me on 19 January:

"the Royal College has not made any recent pronouncement re: Banbury . . . they will not be raised again formally until the next inspection, whenever that will be."

The President of the Royal College, Professor Alan Craft, told me in a letter on 21 January that there is simply no reason why paediatric registrars cannot continue to work at the Horton general hospital if the trust so chooses, although staff shortages

"are enormous pressures on all hospitals at the moment because of the forthcoming Working Time Directive".

Furthermore, as the chief executive of the Royal College said in an email to me yesterday,

"the decision on the level of services is one that must be taken by the Trust in the light of demand and resources available."

He echoed the finding of the Luckett inquiry that services should be provided as closely as possible to children in Banbury. It is as simple as that.

I understand that the Horton general hospital had its status accredited at the last inspection. That status has not changed and will not change until another inspection, whenever that may be. I had that point confirmed by the chief executive of the Royal College of Paediatricians yesterday. He said:

"Training approval for paediatric Registrar posts at Horton General Hospital has never been sought by the relevant trust. There is, in principle, no reason why the Oxford Radcliffe Trust should not submit a training programme to the College that includes some time at the Horton. We must stress however that the current plan to reduce the level of paediatric services in Banbury is not a direct or indirect result of any ruling on the part of the College."

That utterly contradicts the advice that officials at the Department gave to the trust. Why have NHS officials given such inaccurate advice to the trust?

The chief executive of the Oxford Radcliffe hospitals NHS trust raises further concerns over the Horton general hospital not being accredited by the Royal College to take registrars. But the Oxford Radcliffe hospitals NHS trust has never asked the Royal College for such accreditation. It has not been told that it cannot train registrars, because no one has ever asked the question. There is no reason why registrars employed by the Oxford Radcliffe hospitals NHS trust should not undertake work in rotation in Oxford and Banbury at the Horton general hospital. Yet the trust tells me that it cannot even recruit paediatric doctors for the John Radcliffe, let alone for a smaller general hospital. Why? I hope that the Minister can give us an answer.

In a letter of 29 January, the president of the Royal College told me:

"I am not too sure what the problem is at the Radcliffe hospital in terms of attracting registrars. Paediatrics is still very popular, and for regular registrars . . . there is no shortage."

The Horton needs trained paediatricians. How many are needed? Five. How many are being trained this year? Only 15. Fifteen have been allocated for England and Wales, although we are told that some more have been proposed through other initiatives. Demand in larger cities and towns means that it would be difficult for one small general hospital in Oxfordshire to take a third of all the new paediatricians for the whole of England and Wales.

However, NHS advisers are not even giving the trust the opportunity to take on paediatricians and accrediting them to the trust but rotating them to its hospitals, including Horton—something recommended by a public inquiry set up by the then Secretary of State about 30 years ago. That opportunity has unfairly been removed from the table for no good reason. The Minister must look into what his officials are saying to one another as there is evidently a serious communication problem. If he does not do so and his officials continue to base their work on somewhat false foundations, it will seriously impede the inquiry of the taskforce into which model of paediatric services would work best for Horton hospital. It is unacceptable for NHS officials to tell NHS trusts that they are not allowed paediatricians because they do not have the relevant status when in fact they do.

Not only is that manifestly unfair, but it will also put Horton general hospital at a severe disadvantage in respect of the findings of the paediatric taskforce, which will report shortly. The Minister will be aware that the taskforce is considering two ways forward for the Horton and paediatric services across Oxfordshire. The first is known as an ambulatory service, whereby I understand that Horton general hospital would provide a paediatric service from 9 am until 6 pm for five days a week. There would no longer be any paediatric beds at the Horton; patients would be seen, assessed and either treated there or sent to the John Radcliffe for more specialist treatment. In effect, there would no longer be 24-hour paediatric cover—no cover at nights and no cover at weekends.

There would inevitably be a detrimental impact on obstetrics at the Horton general hospital. At present, there is a special care baby unit and it is not clear whether it would be able to continue. There would most certainly be knock-on consequences for the accident and emergency department. It is unclear whether the A and E department would be happy to continue to give general 24-hour, seven-day-a-week cover if there were no longer any paediatric services at the Horton in the evenings, at night and at weekends. It is thus clear that the John Radcliffe would have to take on further cases from Banbury at a time when there is an acknowledged problem across Oxfordshire in recruiting trained paediatricians.

There is an alternative: more registrars. Paediatric registrars undertake a five-year training; the last three years are fairly specialist but the first two years are reasonably general. When the Horton general hospital merged with the John Radcliffe to form the Oxford Radcliffe hospitals NHS trust my understanding was that appointment would always be made to the trust, not to an individual hospital, so I see no reason why registrars based at the John Radcliffe should not also give cover and work at Horton general hospital.

However, the chief executive of the NHS trust has been advised to say that that is not possible because "registrars are appointed to training posts that have been allocated to a trust by the Regional Training Advisory committee"— and it—

"cannot include any Horton based activity because the paediatric work available at the Horton is not considered by the committee to provide adequate training".

That was in a letter to me as recently as 3 March. Again, I can say only that such activity could be included. The Royal College says that it could, so why does the regional training advisory committee believe that the Horton cannot take registrars? One can assume that it is only because NHS officials from the Minister's Department say that it cannot. Instead, Horton general hospital is left trying to fill vacancies for trained paediatrics when there are simply not enough trained paediatricians available.

The taskforce's terms of reference are ill balanced before it has even reported. It is receiving bad advice from the Minster's Department and has started off on false foundations. Clearly, the Minister needs to sort out the communication problems over the employment of registrars. There are two immediate problems that he must address. The first is that his Department's officials are telling the NHS trust that its registrars cannot work at Horton general hospital. But they could; the royal college says that the hospital is accredited. The Luckett report made that recommendation more than 30 years ago.

The second problem is that the Government have invested in too few new paediatricians for the whole of England and Wales. Neither Horton general hospital nor the John Radcliffe can fill their paediatric vacancies, so if paediatric services are not being provided at the Horton and they cannot be found at the John Radcliffe, where on earth in Oxfordshire will they be provided?

The answer lies in increasing the number of registrars accredited to the Oxford Radcliffe hospitals NHS trust; furthermore, the Minister's Department must stop telling the NHS trust that registrars cannot rotate between the Horton and the John Radcliffe; and, in any event, more funding must be found so that more paediatricians can be trained than the absurdly low number that the Department is funding.

The chairman and chief executive of the NHS trust and my hon. Friend the Member for Daventry (Mr. Boswell) and I will shortly meet the president of the Royal College, so I should welcome a response from the Minister on those two crucial issues. The crisis in paediatric services at Horton general hospital needs to be set against the background of other services at the hospital. If the taskforce makes a recommendation on paediatric services that is based both on inaccurate information from the Minister's Department and on inadequate funding for paediatric numbers, the loss of 24-hour, seven-day-a-week paediatric services could undermine the A and E department at the Horton.I am not confident that sufficient time has been taken to assess the likely domino effect caused by the downgrading of paediatric services. It remains, however, a real possibility, to which every GP who responded to my letter on the future of services at Horton general hospital referred. It leaves the real possibility of Ministers overseeing a situation whereby 30 years later the lessons of the Luckett tragedy are ignored.

Ministers must surely understand that local people hear that billions of pounds are being pumped into the NHS, and are somewhat confused by that when they realise that their local general hospital's children's ward is under threat. People in north Oxfordshire and south Northamptonshire want the comprehensive paediatric services that they have enjoyed for the past 30 years to continue. That is a 24-hour, seven-day a week paediatric service at Horton general hospital.

Mr. Tim Boswell (Daventry) (Con): I am grateful both to the Minister and to my hon. Friend the Member for Banbury (Tony Baldry), my constituency neighbour, for allowing me a few minutes of their time. I congratulate my hon. Friend on securing this important debate.

Although the debate is badged as being about paediatric services, and he has spoken on that matter with considerable expertise and great effect, there are major implications for the viability of Horton general hospital in Banbury. This is a significant interest for about 25,000 of my constituents in south-west Northamptonshire, including the town of Brackley. In turn, that amounts to about 20 per cent. of the total caseload at the Horton hospital. Incidentally, Miss Horton was from my constituency.

I have lived just inside my constituency boundary for more than 35 years, and during the whole of that time Horton hospital has been, for all practical purposes, my hospital. All three of my children were born there, and on one occasion I had every reason to be extremely grateful for the hospital's paediatric services in coping with an emergency, the response to which was led by Dr. Bob Bell, that involved a member of my family.

I recognise the real dilemma for health Ministers in balancing the changing requirements of modern practice standards against the need to offer convenient local services, including a rapid response to emergency situations, and doing so with limited trained manpower and other resources. However, I emphasise the difficulty that is posed by any withdrawal, in whole or in part, of paediatric services at the Horton, not only for the town of Banbury and its population, but for the scattered rural settlements around it in a number of counties and constituencies.

Some villages in my constituency are about 10 miles from Banbury and 25 miles from both Oxford and any other alternative service in Northampton, for example. I know also of the intensity of local feeling at the perceived danger of progressively withdrawing services that lead on from paediatrics to other services, with the ultimate fear that the entire hospital might become unviable. I associate myself with the concerns expressed by my hon. Friend and endorse his call for some constructive thinking in order to find a practical solution to this problem.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Health (Dr. Stephen Ladyman): I am grateful to the hon. Member for Banbury (Tony Baldry) for raising a subject on which he has been campaigning for some time, and I congratulate him on securing this debate. I am grateful that he gave me some notice of the issues that he was to raise. I also congratulate the hon. Member for Daventry (Mr. Boswell) on putting the case on behalf of his constituents.

The hon. Member for Banbury began his speech with the sad story of Ian Luckett. It was a tragedy that resulted from people being insufficiently experienced and working under pressure. The hon. Gentleman used the story to demonstrate why decisions were taken to establish children's health services in his local area and to support his view of how services should be shaped in the future. Let me put that awful story back to him. Surely what it shows also is that clinical safety has to be a prime consideration when we design hospital services. Surely it shows also that when we configure services, we must take a strategic view that takes account of changing clinical practice, changing populations and changing circumstances.

The hon. Member for Daventry acknowledged that issue. The tragedy relayed by the hon. Member for Banbury happened in 1974, but the world has changed in the 30 years since. Technology, for example, has changed dramatically. When the tragedy happened, the personal computer had not even been invented, and many clinical tests and drugs that we employ today had not been dreamed of. Those changes alone required us to look critically at local service design. In 1974, junior doctors worked long and unsafe hours to accumulate the experience that they needed. Now we are driving down the hours that they work that so they can work more safely, but we still have to maintain the level of training that they receive. That means that we must change the way we work and look critically at the way in which hospital services are delivered. As for the working time directive, which imposes a tight time scale on those changes, we were not even in the European Union when that case was heard, never mind signed up to the type of change that we must plan for today.

I acknowledge the serious concerns expressed by the hon. Member for Banbury, and he is right to expect a certain level of service on behalf of his constituents. However, all I ask is that he keeps in mind the way the world changes, does not expect Banbury and Oxfordshire to be immune to those changes, and that he remains open minded about the way in which paediatric and other health services can best be delivered in his constituency, should change be proposed in the future. The Horton hospital, however, provides a substantial part of hospital care for patients in Oxfordshire. It copes with approximately 30,000 accident and emergency attendances a year out of the county total of 100,000. On average, 7,000 of those attendances are paediatric, and it delivers approximately 1,600 babies a year. Given that level of activity, the hospital's importance to the county is self-evident. I note, too, the comments of the hon. Member for Daventry about its importance to his constituents.

There has also been significant investment in Horton hospital over the past few years. The number of beds has risen from 200 in 1998 to 250 today, including 14 paediatric beds. The position of the primary care trusts—their view is shared by the Oxford Radcliffe hospitals NHS trust—is that the Horton is, and will remain, vital to the delivery of emergency and elective care in the county. The PCTs want locally based hospital care to continue and expand where appropriate, provided that the quality and safety of care are guaranteed. The NHS will continue to work to ensure that that happens and that necessary investment is made in the Horton. The chief executive of the Oxford Radcliffe hospitals NHS trust, in the letter of 3 March cited by the hon. Member for Banbury, explicitly states that "paediatricians wish to see as much provided in Banbury as possible".

He also believes that the development of the children's hospital in Oxford is not a major influence.

The hon. Member for Banbury was right to express concern about the impact of the working time directive, although I detected slight signs of his trying to have it both ways. He cited the tragic case of Dr. Watkins, who died after a 100-hour week, implying that that was why the recruitment of paediatricians was proving difficult. In another part of his speech, he held up the working time directive as a barrier to the implementation of safe paediatric services. The aim of the working time directive and Government policies is to hammer down doctors' working hours to ensure that in future doctors do not work 100 hours a week and that recruitment is made easier. We do not underestimate the impact of the working time directive, but it presents the NHS with a marvellous opportunity to change outdated working practices that do doctors and patients no favours. By introducing innovative ways of working that take away routine tasks from doctors in training and, at the same time, reduce the hours that they work, we shall enhance doctors' working lives and improve the quality of service to patients.

We must have effective systems in place to share emerging good practice and learn from others. A number of national pilot sites are currently testing new ways of providing services so that we can learn lessons from their experience. Every NHS trust has been asked to prepare an action plan detailing how they will ensure that junior doctors comply with the law on working time, and every strategic health authority has been asked to work with trusts to agree their action plans and ensure that they are realistic and deliverable. The North Oxford Paediatric Task Force is assessing the best way forward for the local health community, with special emphasis on paediatrics. Oxford Radcliffe hospitals NHS trust is also conducting a broader strategic review, and the two PCTs—North East Oxfordshire and Cherwell Vale—are looking at the future shape of hospital, intermediate and mental health services in north Oxfordshire.

Implementing the working time directive locally is the responsibility of trusts, but there are things the Department of Health, the medical profession and others can do to support them, which is why we have set up a national working time directive expert group with the Academy of Medical Royal Colleges, the joint consultants committee of the British Medical Association, the Royal College of Nursing and other key stakeholders.

We have also set up a national delivery board of NHS managers to ensure that strategic health authorities and trusts deliver working time directive compliance on the ground. They will spearhead trust efforts and ensure that help is directed to trusts that need it most. Currently the Oxford Radcliffe hospitals trust is 70 per cent. compliant with the WTD and there is a trust-wide assessment going on to get compliance to 100 per cent.

The hon. Gentleman is, however, right to highlight the particular problems of paediatrics and obstetrics with respect to the working time directive. Those are two acute specialties that do not easily lend themselves to cross-cover, owing to the particular skills and competencies attached to them. We recognise that they require particular and different solutions to those required for general acute services, and that is why we are working closely with the Royal College of Paediatrics and Child Health and the Royal College of Obstetrics and Gynaecology to deliver those solutions.

[Dr. Stephen Ladyman]

The RCPCH has already produced some models in its document "Old Problems, New Solutions". They examine the provision of emergency assessment services without the use of in-patient beds, and increased care in the community with particular emphasis on community paediatric teams that prevent admission and enable earlier discharge. The RCPCH also considered staff being used in new and different ways—for example, the growing and effective use of nurse practitioners in paediatrics and neonatal care. Redesign is another of the key tools to help achieve a reduction in the hours worked by doctors in training, and has the potential to provide new ways of delivering services that avoid the need for reconfiguration.

At various points in his speech the hon. Gentleman referred to staff numbers with respect to children's health services. More staff, working differently summarises the Government's approach to growing the NHS work force. That means making the most of the whole team, not just doctors. There has been a 17 per cent. increase in paediatric nurses between 1997 and 2002, and a 19 per cent. jump in the number of allied health professionals, most of whom work with children. We have also increased training places. In the same five-year period, training places for children's nursing have increased by 55 per cent. and for allied health professionals by 73 per cent.

In paediatrics, that means nearly 600 more consultants are working in the NHS today than were working there in 1997, and there are 253 more specialist registrars, the consultants of the future. NHS trusts are willing to fund extra specialist registrar training places in paediatrics, and between 2003–04 and 2004–05 trusts have the opportunity to fund up to 115 additional posts. Implementation of this initiative is progressing steadily. Central funding has been provided for 10 additional specialist registrar posts in paediatric cardiology. We have also announced that additional national training numbers will be made available, subject to obtaining the appropriate educational approval, where trust action planning has calculated that they are needed for WTD compliance. To date, we have received some 200 bids for paediatric posts from trusts. The Oxford Radcliffe hospitals trust has bid for five of those places.

On communications, I hear what the hon. Gentleman said about mixed messages. The decision about where training can take place is not a local NHS decision. Only the Royal College of Paediatrics and Child Health and the post-graduate deanery operating through regional specialist training committees can decide where such training can take place. I will, however, make sure that officials study his comments carefully and that they are passed to the local strategic health authority so that if any mixed messages have been given, they can be sorted out and appropriate advice taken before any decisions about service changes are made.

The developments that I have described are not just a numbers exercise. We are increasing staff. More importantly, outcomes are improving. The increased investment made by the Government has meant better care for patients, and that is as true in Banbury and Oxfordshire as everywhere else. The working time directive and paediatric recruitment are a serious challenge, but it is one that we do not underestimate and it is being met. I hope the hon. Gentleman will be at least partly reassured by what I have said, and by my undertaking to ensure that we reflect on his comments and that local service designers do likewise. If the hon. Gentlemen should wish to have further discussions with me at a later date as these matters progress, I should be happy to meet them.

Question put and agreed to.

Oral Answers to Questions

EDUCATION AND SKILLS

The Secretary of State was asked—

Adult Learning Grant

1. Laura Moffatt (Crawley) (Lab): How his Department is encouraging take-up of the adult learning grant. [162115]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Education and Skills (Mr. Ivan Lewis): The Learning and Skills Council is working with further education colleges and other partners to promote the adult learning grant through college prospectuses, local advertising and mailshots. We plan to double the size of the current pilot from September by making the adult learning grant available across the south-east and north-east regions. It is currently available in 10 local learning and skills council areas.

Laura Moffatt: I am delighted to hear that the south-east is to be included in the programme of rolling out the adult learning grant. May I say that is excellent and welcome news in Crawley in particular, because those of my constituents who are in low-skilled jobs are keen to update their skills through our further education college? I thank the Minister for that initiative, which will provide them a good incentive, and I hope that it can be introduced as soon as possible.

Mr. Lewis: It is indeed good news that my hon. Friend's constituents will benefit from the adult learning grant, which is about ensuring that people with few or no skills have access to education throughout their lives. It is making a reality of lifelong learning and providing a small amount of financial support to enable such learning. It is essential for the economic future of such areas as my hon. Friend's, but it is also right in terms of creating a more socially just and inclusive community. Getting more adults with low skills back into learning will directly benefit our aspirations for young people and will raise school standards.

Access to Higher Education

2. Sandra Gidley (Romsey) (LD): If he will make a statement on access to higher education for the over-55s. [162116]

The Minister for Lifelong Learning, Further and Higher Education (Alan Johnson): The Government are firmly committed to increasing the opportunity for people of all ages to gain access to higher education. In the past eight years, the number of postgraduate students aged over 55 has increased by more than 130 per cent.—from nearly 4,000 to more than 9,000—and the number of undergraduates aged over 55 has increased by 154 per cent., from 22,000 to more than 57,000.

We provide a range of financial support, including some elements that students aged 55 and over can access if they are eligible. For students with dependants, those grants include the adult dependants' grant, which is worth up to £2,280, the parents' learning allowance, which is worth up to £1,300, and the childcare grant, which is worth up to £8,840. As the grants are targeted at students with dependants, the main beneficiaries are older students.

We have no plans to change our policy on the eligibility for grants of students aged over 55. Therefore, subject to parliamentary approval of the Higher Education Bill, older students will be eligible for the new combined grant of £2,700 from 2006–07.

Sandra Gidley: I thank the Minister for his comprehensive reply, but he will be aware that when the Government signed the European directive on equal treatment in October 2000, they committed themselves to implementing age discrimination legislation by 2006, which will cover higher education, further education and vocational training. He has admitted that students aged over 55 are currently unable to access student loans, and the Bill before Parliament seems to include no plan to change that. In the light of the ageing work force and the need for people to work longer to have a substantial pension fund, does he not agree that such age discrimination needs rapid review?

Alan Johnson: No, I do not accept that. We support the article 13 changes in respect of age discrimination, but we believe that the decision not to give loans to students aged 55 and over was objectively justified. Indeed, a recent request for judicial review was turned down at the appeal court stage, because the court agreed with us that insisting that students aged 55 and over be unable to access loans constitutes a sensible and proper use of taxpayers' money, given that we wipe out any debt at the age of 65. I should add that under previous Governments the age limit was 50, so we have increased it.

We are committed to making it easier for mature students to get to university, but we do not believe that we need to go further in respect of loans to do so. Of course, mature students aged 55 and over are eligible for grants, and there will be specific help for them, in that the current loan for part-time students will be replaced by a grant.

Mr. Barry Sheerman (Huddersfield) (Lab/Co-op): Does my right hon. Friend share my concern that, whether we are talking about students aged over 55 or under 55, the real task is to encourage people from poorer backgrounds—those in social classes 4 and 5? According to some reports, as a result of the expansion that will include another 10 countries in the European Union—countries whose students will be able to access British universities on the same basis as our own students—middle-class, quite wealthy students from such countries will affect the opportunity to open up access that I know the Government intend to provide. Is he worried about such reports?

Alan Johnson: I do not agree with my hon. Friend on his last point, but I entirely agree with his first point about widening participation, for which we are increasing funding. As to the accession countries, our estimate and that of the Higher Education Funding Council is that there will be an 8 per cent. increase in students from those countries, but that is a tiny proportion of the overall student population. Given that those students cannot access maintenance loans or grants, we believe it unlikely that those estimates will be exceeded. There are huge benefits from getting students from other countries to study in this country, and there is no basis for any fear that those students will interfere with our clear objective to widen participation in higher education.

School Admissions

3. Mr. David Chaytor (Bury, North) (Lab): If he will make a statement on the implementation of the pan-London co-ordinated system of admissions to secondary schools. [162117]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Education and Skills (Mr. Stephen Twigg): That local education authority-led initiative will simplify the process for many London parents who apply for schools across London and, when implemented, it will rid us of the position whereby some parents receive multiple offers of school places while others receive none at all. All 33 London boroughs and their eight neighbouring authorities have signed up to the basic principles of the pan-London scheme, and I welcome that as a good example of local authority collaboration to make the admissions process easier for parents and children.

Mr. Chaytor: I thank my hon. Friend for that reply, and I commend the Government for their efforts to encourage greater co-ordination between local authorities over admission arrangements, not only in London, but across the country. However, will my hon. Friend explain how the concept of parental choice is compatible with a system under which 1,000 schools remain their own admission authorities and effectively choose which children to admit?

Mr. Twigg: I certainly believe that the system in London will improve the position and that we will be able to learn from what happens and apply it to other authorities around the country. It is essential that the system is fair and understandable to parents and pupils, and we must have effective collaboration between institutions. That is what we are seeking to achieve, and I believe that it will widen choice and ensure that more opportunities are available for children and parents to enter the schools of their choice.

Mr. Tim Yeo (South Suffolk) (Con): Is the Minister aware that the pupil passport, which the Conservative Government will introduce after the next general election, will give every parent greater control over which school their child attends than anything that the pan-London co-ordinated admissions system can achieve? By abolishing the surplus places rule, we will put an end to the system that allows the education authority to order parents to send their children to failing schools against the parents' wishes. The passport cannot be used as part-payment of fees at an independent school, so we will ensure that the all the extra money that the next Conservative Government spend on education will benefit schools that are accessible to every family.

Mr. Twigg: I am interested to hear the latest version of the pupil passport, as the detail seems to change week in, week out. That may be part of the reason why the hon. Gentleman is unable to attract as many Conservative Back Benchers here today as there are colleagues on his Front Bench. I believe that we have made significant progress in giving support to schools, and I do not believe that the pupil passport will add anything positive to that. We want the highest possible standards in all our schools in all our communities throughout the country.

Mr. Phil Willis (Harrogate and Knaresborough) (LD): We are very supportive of the pan-London policy, which is much more realistic than what would be likely to happen if the Conservatives got into power. In yesterday's Budget statement, the Chancellor announced a major extension of the academy programme. Each academy is an independent school within the state sector with its own admission arrangements. Will the Minister distance himself immediately from the suggestions of Lord Levy and Andrew Adonis that the academies should be exempt from normal local education authority admissions policies, particularly with regard to special educational needs students? Will the Minister also confirm that the idea of having for-profit commercial schools by allowing Sunny Varkey into the system would be ruinous for the pan-London admissions policy?

Mr. Twigg: There is absolutely no question of academies falling outside the admissions code of practice. They have to fulfil the requirements of the code, as part of their funding agreement with the Department. The academies are of critical importance to our policy of seeking to ensure that we have the highest quality of education in some of London's poorest neighbourhoods. They are part of the pan-London admissions process, and I believe that they are something for us to celebrate.

Mathematics

4. Mr. Kelvin Hopkins (Luton, North) (Lab): What steps his Department is taking to help improve the teaching of mathematics in schools following the publication of the report by Professor Adrian Smith. [162118]

The Secretary of State for Education and Skills (Mr. Charles Clarke): I very much welcome Professor Smith's far-reaching report, "Making Mathematics Count". It is vital that we get mathematics right. I am therefore considering the report's recommendations carefully.

Meanwhile, in schools, the primary and key stage 3 strategies continue to raise standards in maths through supporting continual improvement in teaching and learning practice. Similarly, post-16, we are developing a strategy for supporting mathematics teaching in further education and sixth form colleges. Since teacher training bursaries and golden hellos were introduced in September 2000, recruitment to courses of initial teacher training for teachers of maths in England has risen by 50 per cent.

Mr. Hopkins: I congratulate my right hon. Friend on his work in promoting mathematics, and on the Government's general record in that regard. This is the first Government to take seriously the problems that Britain has with mathematics. The Moser report, which concluded that 50 per cent. of the population do not know what 50 per cent. means, was a wake-up call. My right hon. Friend rightly recommends the Smith report, which deals with post-14 education, but the real problems start in primary, and especially infant, education. Will he look much more closely at teaching methods, and make prescriptive decisions about what methods should be used in primary education to ensure that young children learn mathematics properly, long before they get to 14?

Mr. Clarke: On the point about primaries, I very much agree with my hon. Friend. There has been a general welcome in primary schools for the numeracy strategy and the support that it gives. People have been very positive about it and, indeed, the welcome has been greater than was the case with the literacy strategy. I very much agree with what my hon. Friend says, and a careful reading of Professor Smith's report shows that it is quite a serious critique of the whole process of how mathematics is dealt with in our country. That requires radical solutions, and we will look at matters such as teaching methods, in the way that my hon. Friend suggests.

Mr. Archie Norman (Tunbridge Wells) (Con): Does the Secretary of State accept that the decline in participation in mathematics at A-level in our secondary schools, especially among female students, has serious implications for the future of our engineering, science and technology industries? Does he accept that there is an acute need to look again at the A-level mathematics syllabus, to make it more accessible and appealing to students and thus ensure that participation increases? That is absolutely vital for the future of British industry.

Mr. Clarke: I completely agree with every word of that question. I commend Professor Smith's report to the hon. Gentleman, as it goes into detail on exactly those issues and on the way in which the AS and A2 qualifications have worked. The report makes serious recommendations about the curriculum, and we have begun discussing them already with the Qualifications and Curriculum Authority, to establish how we can take them forward. However, the hon. Gentleman is quite right: significant changes are needed in the post-14 curriculum, and we also need the support in primaries and key stage 3 to which my hon. Friend the Member for Luton, North (Mr. Hopkins) referred.

Dr. Ashok Kumar (Middlesbrough, South and Cleveland, East) (Lab): I, too, congratulate the Government on their promotion of mathematics teaching. However, if we are to be successful, should we not encourage the learned societies—such as the Institute of Mathematics, the Royal Academy of Engineering and the Royal Society—to get involved and promote maths teaching much more vigorously than they have done so far?

Mr. Clarke: My hon. Friend is completely right. We have discussed with the societies that he mentions how they can engage themselves more. One recommendation in Professor Smith's report is that we should create a structure that will allow us to engage all those organisations much more directly and explicitly in the teaching of mathematics in our education system. In that regard, there have been some competing interests, if I may put it like that, between different organisations. I am therefore glad to say that everyone is prepared to come together in the interests of achieving a co-ordinated and effective approach. That will make a difference, as my hon. Friend suggests.

Sue Doughty (Guildford) (LD): The Secretary of State will be aware of some of the funding problems faced by Guildford schools over the past couple of years. Head teachers whom I met last night were very pleased to hear that they were going to get additional funding to help with recruitment and retention of mathematics teachers. Will the right hon. Gentleman confirm that the increase in funding per pupil will be for each and every pupil, and not averaged out and given to areas of particular need? That will help our head teachers and governors to continue their very good work.

Mr. Clarke: I appreciate the hon. Lady's support for my right hon. Friend's Budget yesterday and the important announcements that we will debate later today. I confirm that the increases will go right across the country, although the distribution system reflects need in all ways, as indeed it should.

Mrs. Anne Campbell (Cambridge) (Lab): Does my right hon. Friend agree that it is important to get quality teaching into schools and that we need some means of giving incentives to mathematics graduates who have taken highly paid jobs in industry or the City to go into teaching, even for a relatively short period?

Mr. Clarke: I very much agree. That point was made to me forcefully in my hon. Friend's constituency a couple of months ago at the Isaac Newton centre, an outstanding centre of mathematics education and research, which has developed good support for maths teaching in schools. We do need incentives of that type. That is one of the points that Professor Smith makes, and we are considering it. We also need systems, which we have in fact established, of recruiting people from industry directly into teaching. There have been some positive schemes already which have exactly the effect that my hon. Friend described.

Mr. Mark Hoban (Fareham) (Con): Professor Smith said in his report that the current maths curriculum did not stretch the top 10 per cent. of pupils while the bottom 30 per cent. were predestined to fail. He also referred to "considerable concerns regarding mathematics provision and the delivery of mathematics teaching within and relating to the Government's Key Skills agenda."

When will we have a curriculum and teaching that meet the needs of all our young people?

Mr. Clarke: That is precisely the process that we are going towards. As I said in answer to my hon. Friend the Member for Luton, North, I commend Professor Smith's report because it is a serious critique of what is happening, not least on the point that the hon. Gentleman has just made about not meeting the needs of pupils at the top and the bottom. That is why we have set up a process of curriculum change, including the Tomlinson proposals for the whole 14 to 19 curriculum, which will address precisely the point that the hon. Gentleman raises. He might be courteous enough to acknowledge that the Government are taking the issue far more seriously than our predecessors did and really trying to get it right.

Funding

6. Mr. Eric Illsley (Barnsley, Central) (Lab): What proposals he has to improve the means of allocation of funding to metropolitan local education authorities. [162120]

The Minister for School Standards (Mr. David Miliband): Local government funding was last reviewed in 2003–04 to deliver a fairer funding system. We will consider what changes might need to be made to the system for 2006–07.

Mr. Illsley: As my hon. Friend is aware, there are some historic discrepancies between the funding of metropolitan authorities and other authorities. For example, there is a difference of something like £100 per pupil between metropolitan authorities and London, given equivalent or even greater need. Given that the Department now controls about 55 per cent. of a local authority's formula standard share, will he look again at the position of metropolitan authorities to achieve a fairer distribution of resources based on need?

Mr. Miliband: My hon. Friend has done a tremendous job in campaigning for extra resources for constituencies such as his. I know that he welcomes the fact that an extra £940 per pupil per year is being spent on students in Barnsley—a higher rise than the national average. We believe that we have a fair system. We do not propose to make changes this year or next because we need the new system to bed down. We will look at it again in 2006–07.

Mr. Graham Brady (Altrincham and Sale, West) (Con): In response to last year's funding crisis in schools, the Minister urged schools to spend their capital funding and their reserves. Schools across my constituency, especially primary schools, now face making redundancies in September. Woodheys primary school has said that it will have to make all its classroom support staff redundant in September. What does the Minister intend to do this year to prevent those redundancies from being necessary?

Mr. Miliband: I am surprised that the hon. Gentleman has not mentioned the £820 per pupil per year increase in funding for education in his constituency. I will certainly look at the individual case of Woodheys—whether it has the same number or fewer pupils than last year—but the hon. Gentleman should know that the increase of at least 5 per cent. in every LEA's budget and of at least 4 per cent. per pupil in every school's budget gives a guarantee that has never existed before for every school in the country.

Angela Watkinson (Upminster) (Con): The Minister will share my concern about the number of schools that have been forced to cut classroom teaching assistants this year because of budgetary pressures. That is of particular concern in special schools such as Dycorts in my constituency, where maintaining the adult-pupil ratio is essential to enable special needs pupils to flourish. How will he ensure that the additional funding promised yesterday will reach classrooms?

Mr. Miliband: The hon. Lady raises an important point about special schools. She will know that the special needs plan set out recently by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State speaks directly to some of the teaching needs in special schools. In relation to funding itself, the funding guarantee per pupil for next year and the year after gives a guarantee that has never existed before in this country. The contribution of special schools to education in the nation is vital; we see them as resources for the whole school system, not as separate from it, and the funding guarantee applies as much to them as to any other school.

Mr. Bob Blizzard (Waveney) (Lab): Is not the allocation of capital funding also important? May I take this opportunity to welcome the £5 million that my hon. Friend has just awarded to three schools in my constituency—Kirkley middle school, Meadow primary and Fen Park primary? That will make an enormous difference to those schools, which are in a deprived area of Lowestoft, and it compares well with what happened during the 19 years that I spent in the classroom under the previous Government, when I saw children educated in ill-equipped, rotting portakabins because there was not the political will to do something about it.

Mr. Miliband: It is always a pleasure to give out capital money when one receives such thanks as that. It is striking that in 1996–97, in the nation as a whole, capital spending on schools was £700 million, less than £30,000 for each school. That figure is now more than £4 billion and will rise to £5 billion in 2005–06. Many more schools can look forward to that sort of investment, as long as this Government continue to put it in.

Grammar Schools

7. Sir Teddy Taylor (Rochford and Southend, East) (Con): What percentage of secondary school children in England attend grammar schools; and what the percentage was (a) 10 and (b) 20 years ago. [162121]

The Secretary of State for Education and Skills (Mr. Charles Clarke): Currently, 4.6 per cent.—150,750—of secondary school children in England attend grammar schools. In 1993, the figure was 3.8 per cent.—111,846; and in 1983, it was 3.1 per cent.—117,147. However, before the School Standards and Framework Act 1998, there was no legal definition of a grammar school. Section 104 of the Act defines a grammar school as one that selects all, or substantially all, of its pupils by reference to academic ability.

Sir Teddy Taylor: Is the Secretary of State aware that the very positive and helpful attitude to grammar schools now being taken by the Government is greatly appreciated, especially in Southend-on-Sea where we have four such schools? Following that positive move, will the right hon. Gentleman consider establishing grammar schools in some of our major cities, where despite all the efforts of the Government and local councils there is a system of virtual class segregation and children of ability from poor homes do not have a chance to break through? Will he follow up the good policy by extending it to major cities?

Mr. Clarke: The short answer is no. The city academy programme, which was referred to earlier, is precisely the kind of investment of high-quality schools in the poorest communities in the country that is needed to allow every child to fulfil their own aspirations, and it is not just for some children who have been sieved off in a particular way.

As an aside, I may say that the kind of portakabin passport that the Opposition Front-Bench policy is all about will do nothing to assist standards in areas such as that represented by the hon. Gentleman.

Dr. Phyllis Starkey (Milton Keynes, South-West) (Lab): Grammar schools in Buckinghamshire receive generous funding by contrast with the underfunding of certain other secondary schools in the county, especially those with a high proportion of ethnic minority pupils, which has been highlighted by the "missingbucks" campaign. Will my right hon. Friend ensure that the current Ofsted inspection of the Buckinghamshire local education authority is aware of the information highlighted by the campaign and considers both the poor level of attainment by ethnic minorities in those schools and what the LEA should be doing to improve standards in them?

Mr. Clarke: I agree with my hon. Friend and commend her work on the "missingbucks" campaign. She has previously raised the different types of funding for different schools in Buckinghamshire in the House, and we need to put the matter right in the way that she suggests. The pupil funding guarantees in the settlements for this year and next year to which my hon. Friend the Minister for School Standards referred a moment ago will go some way to protecting every school, but my hon. Friend the Member for Milton Keynes, South-West (Dr. Starkey) is right to focus on getting Buckinghamshire county council to allocate proper resources to schools that face the greatest challenges.

School Meals

8. Helen Jones (Warrington, North) (Lab): What steps he is taking to improve the quality of school meals. [162122]

The Minister for Children (Margaret Hodge): In April 2001, the Government introduced nutritional standards for school lunches, the first for 20 years. The standards are based on the appropriate foods and not on the appropriate nutrients that are necessary to make up a balanced diet. They prescribe the types of food that should be available from the four main food groups and the frequency with which they should be served.

Helen Jones: Is my right hon. Friend aware that the food group approach is leading to food being served in our schools as, for example, meat or fish, when it contains little of those items and is highly processed? Will she revisit the matter and examine the recommendations in the Education and Skills Committee's report on school meals, which strongly recommends the nutrient-based approach rather than the food group approach?

Margaret Hodge: I know that my hon. Friend has a great interest in the issue, which, together with the Department of Health, we keep under constant review, and we are working with the Food Standards Agency and Ofsted to review adherence to standards. In my experience, basing school lunches on foods rather than nutrients gives greater choice to children and young people, which increases take-up of school meals and results in less food being wasted and thrown away.

Apprenticeships

9. Bob Spink (Castle Point) (Con): Which employers' organisations he has met with regard to the modern apprenticeship programme. [162123]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Education and Skills (Mr. Ivan Lewis): The employer-led modern apprenticeship taskforce chaired by Sir Roy Gardner is advising Ministers on the development of modern apprenticeships. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State recently met the Engineering Employers Federation, and Ministers regularly meet the CBI, the Small Business Council and representatives from the network of sector skills councils.

Bob Spink: Those hon. Members who, like me, did an apprenticeship will know how valuable apprenticeships are not only to the individual but to society as a whole. However, this country lags behind its competitors: only 28 per cent. of Britons are qualified to apprentice craft or technical levels, whereas in France the figure is 51 per cent. and in Germany 65 per cent. I make no party political point—the matter is too important. What innovative measures can we take to draw the attention of the public and teachers to the need for more people to take up modern apprenticeships and to promote those apprenticeships? These days, it costs more to call out a plumber at the weekend than a brain surgeon.

Mr. Lewis: I will not comment on the respective requirements for brain surgeons on each side of the House. There should be maximum consensus on this policy, and I am delighted to tell the House that a record 255,000 young people are undertaking modern apprenticeships and that 36,000 employers offer apprenticeships. In the next few weeks, we intend to announce a significant marketing and advertising campaign aimed at attracting more employers who are willing to offer apprenticeships. Many young people see apprenticeship as a high-status, high-quality route into the labour market, but as a country, we need far more employers to offer apprenticeships. The hon. Member for Tunbridge Wells (Mr. Norman) will be delighted to hear that Asda has joined the apprenticeship scheme this year and is offering 1,000 apprenticeships. That kind of lead by large, better-known companies is important. I ask all hon. Members to communicate with employers in their respective constituencies and ask them to offer apprenticeships to our young people.

Lawrie Quinn (Scarborough and Whitby) (Lab): My hon. Friend will note the shortage of skills, particularly in the construction industry. Will he take every opportunity to tell the Learning and Skills Council that we need more construction skills courses in our colleges around the country? Local businesses in my area find it difficult to send apprentices long distances in order for them to attend the necessary courses.

Mr. Lewis: I agree entirely with my hon. Friend. If we are to meet the challenging targets that the Government have rightly set for the housebuilding programme, for example, we will need skilled people to deliver high-quality craftsmanship. We want the sector skills councils, the employer-led organisations, to determine the nature of the apprenticeship need and the colleges and learning and skills councils to ensure that courses are available. We want an education and training system that is far more responsive to the needs of the economy than it has been in the past. The work that is being done in construction is an innovative example of how we can make such progress.

Sir Nicholas Winterton (Macclesfield) (Con): I am very pleased to see such strong cross-party support for apprenticeships. I hope that the figures that the Minister has announced today will be dramatically increased, because they are still inadequate. Does he agree that the manufacturing and construction industries desperately need apprentices—people with qualifications—and will he seek to attract more people into apprenticeships? Will he also have a word with the Chancellor of the Exchequer about encouraging industry further to employ apprentices and to ensure that when they are qualified they have proper status? In many other countries, engineers are highly respected. Can we achieve the same respect for engineers in this country?

Mr. Lewis: I agree entirely with the hon. Gentleman. One of the challenges identified by the Tomlinson review is to ensure that we have a high-quality, high- status vocational route available to young people and that once they have received that qualification it is valued every bit as much as a degree. Many advanced modern apprentices should be able to go on to do a foundation degree, because that will meet the needs of their sectors. The policies of the Conservatives on higher education would deny those young people in apprenticeships the opportunity to move on to higher education. It is when the route does not lead to higher education that it is perceived as being of lower status.

Non-English Speaking Schoolchildren

10. Dr. Brian Iddon (Bolton, South-East) (Lab): If he will make a statement on the funding available for the education of non-English speaking children in state schools. [162124]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Education and Skills (Mr. Stephen Twigg): The formula for allocating funding for schools to local authorities will distribute £435 million in 2004–05, according to the numbers of pupils who have English as an additional language and minority ethnic pupils in state schools. Additional ring-fenced support is available via the ethnic minority achievement grant, which will increase from £155 million in the present year to £162 million in 2004–05.

Dr. Iddon: I am grateful for that answer. Mainly as a result of the National Asylum Support Service dispersal scheme, there are 226 children from 54 nations placed in Bolton's schools today. Many of them are concentrated in just a few schools in my constituency. Does my hon. Friend think that the money that he has just announced will allow teachers in those schools to meet the considerable challenges that they face day in, day out? Is it fair that non-English speaking children should be included in the rigours of SATs, with the inevitable result that those schools appear unfairly low in the league tables?

Mr. Twigg: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for raising an important set of issues. We made some changes to the SATs a couple of years ago to take account of children who had arrived in the country recently, which made the accountability framework much fairer. I recognise that for some of the most challenged schools funds will be limited, which is why the Department is also looking at the issue of mobility for the future. Mobility is a complex issue that does not apply only in cases of asylum seeking and ethnic minority children. There are particular problems for schools facing those challenges, and we are addressing the issue for the future.

School Funding (Norfolk)

11. Norman Lamb (North Norfolk) (LD): If he will make a statement on the funding of schools in Norfolk. [162125]

The Minister for Children (Margaret Hodge): Our proposals to restore stability and certainty to school funding include an increase in all authorities' school formula spending share of at least 5 per cent. per pupil next year: that is what Norfolk will receive. Norfolk will also receive £5.3 million of transitional grant, which will be used to help schools in particular financial difficulties balance their budgets by 2006–07.

Norman Lamb: I thank the Minister for that answer, but I draw her attention to the results of a survey of local head teachers that I have just conducted, which shows that as a result of the budget settlements 38 per cent. believe that they will have to cut the number of teachers or teaching hours and 45 per cent. are looking to cut the number of learning support assistants. Given the extra money that is going in, why are those rural schools experiencing such damaging cuts? What message will she send to schools in that very difficult position?

Margaret Hodge: I saw a report of the survey in the hon. Gentleman's local newspaper. I hope that he is as content as I am that the local education authority is working very closely with schools to ensure that budgets for next year and the year after are stabilised and that there is no damage to pupils' educational achievement. The statement made yesterday by the Chancellor gives the best hope possible for Norfolk children, and I hope that the hon. Gentleman will applaud it in the same way as I do.

Mr. Anthony D. Wright (Great Yarmouth) (Lab): May I also enter a word of caution for the Government about Norfolk's funding this year? Some of my schools have said that they may face shortfalls in their budgets. I congratulate the Government on the millions of pounds that they have invested in my local schools in Great Yarmouth, but will the Minister meet the head teachers, who have genuine concerns and want to do their best for pupils in my constituency?

Margaret Hodge: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for the interest that he shows in the schools in his constituency and for his recognition of the real-terms increase in funding for pupils in Norfolk since this party has been in government. That increase has been £780 per pupil, and capital funding this year is more than £100 million, compared with less than £10 million in 1998–99. That is a record of which we are proud. I or one of my colleagues will, of course, be happy to meet head teachers in his constituency if that will be of benefit to him.

Higher Education

12. Ross Cranston (Dudley, North) (Lab): What the change in funding allocated to higher education next year is; and if he will make a statement. [162126]

The Minister for Lifelong Learning, Further and Higher Education (Alan Johnson): As set out in the grant letter to the Higher Education Funding Council for England issued on 8 January 2004, institutional funding will increase by £500 million in England in 2004–05 compared with 2003–04. HEFCE announced on 2 March what this increase will mean for each institution in the 2004–05 academic year. Overall, HEFCE's grants will increase by 9.3 per cent. compared with 2003–04. Within this, there is a 5.6 per cent. increase in funding for teaching, a 3.9 per cent. rise in funding for research and a 60 per cent. rise in capital.

Ross Cranston: I thank my right hon. Friend for that very pleasing answer. He knows that it goes without saying that all Labour Members support efforts to make sure that more people from non-traditional backgrounds get into universities. Will he comment on that aspect of the funding that provides a premium or incentive to universities so that those from non-traditional backgrounds can be encouraged to get into university? What sort of incentive is provided by universities under the funding for next year?

Alan Johnson: I can give my hon. and learned Friend the assurance that he seeks. The widening participation premium will increase by 2.5 per cent. next year, which means that £273 million will be available to universities. Everybody recognises that not only the recruitment but the retention of non-traditional students is important. Although we have one of the lowest university drop-out rates in the world, an examination of social class shows that non-traditional students find it more difficult and are more likely to drop out. The funding premium is available in recognition of the fact that it costs more to teach non-traditional students. We will certainly increase the amount of funding available and move towards our objective of ending the obscene social class gap in higher education.

Chris Grayling (Epsom and Ewell) (Con): The Minister will be aware that his own departmental figures show that, by the end of this Parliament, Government funding per student will still be substantially lower than it was under the last Conservative Government. Yesterday, the Chancellor made comments about student grant funding, but they apply only up to 2008, before top-up fees fully come into effect. Will the Minister therefore give a clear and unequivocal commitment that he will maintain Government grant per student after 2008 as well as before?

Alan Johnson: I find it rather ironic that the hon. Gentleman accuses us of underfunding higher education—

Chris Grayling: Answer the question.

Alan Johnson: I will answer the question in a second. It is a fact that funding per student fell by 37 per cent. in the 10 years up to 1997, and, as the Dearing inquiry showed, that planned funding over the next two years of the previous Government—thankfully that was the first two years of this Government in 1997 and 1998—was due to reduce by a further 6.5 per cent. a year over both years. It is important to understand that the Conservative party is the party of underfunding higher education and that the Labour party is the party of ensuring that our higher education sector is properly funded and able to maintain its world-class status.

Mr. John Grogan (Selby) (Lab): If in due course the House of Commons decides, in its wisdom, that a better way of complementing the welcome increase in Government funding for higher education is to retain fixed fees rather than imposing variable top-up fees, will the Government accept that with good grace?

Alan Johnson: We on these Benches accept everything with good grace. It is extremely unlikely that anyone will accept an argument saying that rather than allowing universities to charge up to £3,000—we say that universities may charge £3,000, but that they are free to charge less—we should absolutely insist that every student on every course at every university must pay £3,000, and that universities must have no flexibility to charge less. I would find it amazing if the House or any other group decided that that was the way forward. I know that my hon. Friend has serious concerns about the matter, which is why we said that, three years after the introduction of variable fees, an independent commission will report directly to the House to show their effects. We believe that my hon. Friend's genuine fears will not materialise, but a report by an independent commission is the best way to examine the issue.

13. Mr. Roger Williams (Brecon and Radnorshire) (LD): If he will make a statement on access to higher education for over-55s. [162127]

The Minister for Lifelong Learning, Further and Higher Education (Alan Johnson): I refer the hon. Gentleman to the answer that I gave to Question 2.

Mr. Williams: The Minister will be pleased to know that Liberal Democrats will support the aspects of the Higher Education Bill that will devolve responsibility for student funding to the National Assembly for Wales. Does he agree that that will give the Assembly an opportunity to devise a scheme for people over 55 who wish to access higher education and attain the skills necessary for the longer working life that the Government keep advocating?

Alan Johnson: I am very happy that the Liberal Democrats support the aspect of the Higher Education Bill that will devolve student support to Wales. I just find it incredible that Plaid Cymru, the party that is all about devolution, opposes that aspect—it is a confusing world we live in.

Mr. Huw Edwards (Monmouth) (Lab): Does my right hon. Friend agree that the one institution that encourages access to higher education perhaps more than any other is the Open university? However, in recent discussions on the Higher Education Bill, the Open university has expressed genuine concerns that such part-time students might be disadvantaged. What reassurance can my right hon. Friend give the House that the Open university will be secure and able to continue its excellent work?

Alan Johnson: I am happy to repeat the assurance that my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State gave on 8 January: we are aware of the problems that part-time students face. The Open university, with 200,000 students, is the biggest university in this country and probably one of the biggest in the world. We have committed ourselves under the package to introduce for the first time grants and fee remission for part-time students, who have always been subject to unlimited variable fees paid up front. We would like to go a stage further, which is why we are including the Open university for the first time in the student income and expenditure survey this year so that we can be more aware of the financial difficulties that its students experience and look to give more support to part-time students. The final point is that the Higher Education Funding Council is working with the Open university, Birkbeck and others to ensure that its funding mechanism actually reflects the difficulties of part-time students, which should lead to an important increase in the funding that they receive from HEFC.

Private Sector (State Education)

14. Mr. Henry Bellingham (North-West Norfolk) (Con): What plans he has for involving the private sector in state education in schools. [162128]

The Minister for School Standards (Mr. David Miliband): We encourage business to establish strong partnerships with schools, whether as sponsors, governors or mentors, or for the purposes of work experience, and that is done on a philanthropic basis.

Mr. Bellingham: I am very pleased to hear that from the Minister, and I am pleased that he had the chance to answer the question, but is it true that the noble Lord Levy was involved in a secret meeting at his Department on 21 January 2004 to discuss private companies taking over secondary schools and running them for profit?

Mr. Miliband: It does not sound like a very secret meeting, but Lord Levy certainly did not attend a meeting at the Department for Education and Skills on 21 January, and there is absolutely no possibility of the Government introducing the principle that schools should be run for profit by private companies. I am happy to make that clear to the House.

SOLICITOR-GENERAL

The Solicitor-General was asked—

Pre-Trial Reviews

18. Miss Anne McIntosh (Vale of York) (Con): What assessment she has made of the effectiveness of pre-trial reviews in magistrates courts. [162135]

The Solicitor-General (Ms Harriet Harman): Pre-trial reviews are routinely used in some magistrates courts to manage the progress of trials and are a key part of the new effective trial management programme, which focuses on improving the management of cases in the criminal courts.

Miss McIntosh: If the Solicitor-General agrees that the pre-trial reviews have a useful role to play, would it not be better if they were less haphazard and the Government encouraged a more uniform approach to all those involved?

The Solicitor-General: Yes. Obviously, we do not want such reviews to be haphazard; we want them to be used where appropriate. In many cases it will be good for the prosecution, the defence and the courts to get together to consider whether the right witnesses have been warned and are available, to see whether disclosure has occurred and, if everything is in order, whether the court has enough time to hear the case. Such reviews will not be necessary in all cases. The point is to ensure that they occur where necessary, but otherwise not.

Mr. Humfrey Malins (Woking) (Con): The Solicitor-General will be aware that every day throughout the country thousands of pounds of taxpayers' money is wasted in magistrates courts because trials that are fixed do not take place and have to be adjourned, quite often because the Crown Prosecution Service failed to warn witnesses, to deal with disclosure or to review its files. Would it not be sensible for the Government to introduce a system of pre-trial reviews across the board in magistrates courts, rather along the lines of the Crown court system, because by doing so the prospect of all these adjourned trials recedes, and that would go some way towards solving an expensive and serious problem?

The Solicitor-General: I agree with the hon. Gentleman's analysis of the problem. It is certainly awful if witnesses or victims turn up expecting a trial and it cannot go ahead. It is not just a question of the waste of public money; it is not the way to run the justice system. The responsibility lies with the CPS, the police and the courts, working together, to ensure that that does not happen. I am confident—this is borne out by the CPS inspectorate reports—that with more money, which has been provided, better leadership and more partnership working, the CPS is improving.

Terrorism

20. Mr. David Heath (Somerton and Frome) (LD): If she will make a statement on the role of the Crown Prosecution Service in cases involving terrorist activity. [162138]

The Solicitor-General: The role of the CPS in terrorist cases is to advise the police on charges, to decide whether to prosecute, to keep the case under review and to prosecute the case when it comes to court.

Mr. Heath: If we are to see novel methods of trial, does the Solicitor-General agree that that involves new risks of miscarriage of justice and new needs for safeguards? If members of the CPS were to be embedded in investigative teams and perhaps have some role in directing investigations, would it not inevitably colour their judgment of the value of the evidence provided, and in such circumstances would evidence always be submitted to the Director of Public Prosecutions before a prosecution was mounted?

The Solicitor-General: The hon. Gentleman raises several important points. I can assure him that two safeguards are in place as regards any change to trial systems. Such proposals would, first, have to come before this House for its approval following debate and discussion; and, secondly, they would have to be compliant with our international obligations under the European convention on human rights as enshrined in the Human Rights Act 1998.

As for whether closer work between the Crown Prosecution Service and the police could contaminate the independence of the CPS, the answer is emphatically no. It is a good idea for the police to have early advice on the nature of the charge and what evidence would be admissible. That does not impede the independence of the Crown Prosecution Service, but it will ensure that the police are able effectively to progress the investigation and that the trial works properly.

Court of Appeal

21. Dr. Brian Iddon (Bolton, South-East) (Lab): What mechanisms are in place to inform interested parties that a case is to be heard in the Court of Appeal. [162139]

The Solicitor-General: Several mechanisms are in place to inform interested parties that a case is to be heard. The Court of Appeal sends a written notification of the hearing date to the applicant, the appellant, the prison governor, the prosecuting authority, counsel, solicitors, any witnesses and the police. The court will inform the police or the prosecuting authority by fax within 24 hours of a date being fixed in all cases involving a death or a sexual offence and in cases in which the police have informed the Criminal Appeal Office that the victim or family wishes to be informed of the hearing date.

Dr. Iddon: In three cases of death by dangerous driving that I have dealt with, relatives of the sons or daughters who died found out from the local newspaper that the sentence of the convicted person had been reduced on appeal without their having been able to make representations to the Court of Appeal. Does the Solicitor-General agree that far too many victims or their relatives do not hear that cases are going to the Court of Appeal in London, and that the present linkages are far too complicated and need reviewing?

The Solicitor-General: On the basis of my hon. Friend's comments, I will of course review them. It is unacceptable for somebody who has lost a relative in the course of a criminal offence to discover what happened on appeal in the newspapers. I will look into the matter and raise it with the victims advisory panel, which is chaired by Baroness Scotland, and through which we liaise directly with victims' groups. I would hope that the Court of Appeal would get the information that it requires about the effect on the victim from the victim impact statement, but that does not detract from the fact that the victim's relatives should be present in court to hear about what has affected them so profoundly.

Antisocial Behaviour

23. Bob Spink (Castle Point) (Con): What is the policy of the Crown Prosecution Service on the prosecution of antisocial behaviour. [162141]

The Solicitor-General: The Crown Prosecution Service is committed to playing its part in reducing antisocial behaviour by taking action in the courts. It works with other agencies to ensure that the law can be used to reduce antisocial behaviour, and recently appointed 12 antisocial behaviour prosecutors in the areas where such behaviour is most prevalent and of major concern to the community.

Bob Spink: I thank the right hon. and learned Lady for that answer. I praise the Crown Prosecution Service for its excellent work, which is often misperceived by the public. Nevertheless, public pressure is building as regards antisocial behaviour. In my constituency, there is a serious threat of vigilante action. Does she agree that we need tough, exemplary prosecutions against antisocial behaviour to enable us to take back control of our streets from these thugs?

The Solicitor-General: It is important that people have confidence that the police will act, that prosecutions will go ahead, and that the courts will act in such a way as to deter antisocial behaviour. The active involvement of the criminal justice system in this area is a relatively new development, and we certainly need to make it clearer to people that progress is being made. Too often, they think that the criminal justice system will not get involved and that they just have to put up with it, but that is no longer the case.

Mrs. Anne Campbell (Cambridge) (Lab): Does my right hon. and learned Friend agree that recent antisocial behaviour measures such as antisocial behaviour orders and demoted tenancies, which act as a threat to the person who has committed the offences, are far more effective than some of the older legislation whereby prosecutions were necessary before any action could be taken?

The Solicitor-General: The legislation that the House has recently passed, which has been put into effect by the police and the Crown Prosecution Service, is important in warning people—mostly young people—and deterring them from some of the activities in which they get involved. However, I am sure that my hon. Friend will agree that we must also focus on the causes of antisocial behaviour, rather than simply seeking to stop it after it has happened. That involves such issues as drunkenness, lack of facilities for young people, street lighting and regenerating estates. I try to avoid sloganising in Solicitor-General's questions, but this issue really is about being tough on crime and tough on the causes of crime.

Business of the House

12.30 pm

Mr. Oliver Heald (North-East Hertfordshire) (Con): Will the Leader of the House please give us the business for next week?

The Leader of the House of Commons (Mr. Peter Hain): The business for next week will be as follows:

MONDAY 22 MARCH—Continuation of the Budget.

TUESDAY 23 MARCH—Conclusion of the Budget.

WEDNESDAY 24 MARCH—Opposition half-day [7th allotted day] (part one). There will be a debate on an Opposition motion, subject to be announced, followed by, if necessary, consideration of Lords amendments.

A debate on the Equitable Life inquiry on a motion for the Adjournment of the House.

THURSDAY 25 MARCH—If necessary, consideration of Lords amendments, followed by programme motion relating to the Employment Relations Bill, followed by a debate on defence policy on a motion for the Adjournment of the House.

FRIDAY 26 MARCH—Private Members Bills.

The provisional business for the following week will be:

MONDAY 29 MARCH—Remaining stages of the Employment Relations Bill, followed by, if necessary, consideration of Lords amendments.

TUESDAY 30 MARCH—Opposition Day [8th allotted day]. There will be a debate on an Opposition motion, subject to be announced, followed by, if necessary, consideration of Lords amendments.

WEDNESDAY 31 MARCH—Remaining stages of the Higher Education Bill.

THURSDAY 1 APRIL—Motion on the Easter recess Adjournment.

I should also like to inform the House that the business in Westminster Hall for April will be:

THURSDAY 1 APRIL—Debate on the report from the Environment, Food and Rural Affairs Committee on by-catch of dolphins and porpoises.

THURSDAY 22 APRIL—Debate on the report from the Treasury Committee on transparency of credit card charges.

THURSDAY 29 APRIL—Debate on the report from the International Development Committee on development assistance and the occupied Palestine Territories.

It might be helpful if I update the House on the incident in Parliament square this morning. Shortly before 9 am, a van carrying chemicals was involved in a traffic accident. The police and the fire brigade were alerted immediately, and the square was cordoned off because the van contained two chemicals that, if mixed, might have produced harmful gas. The fire brigade took action with regard to chemical control and decontamination procedures. The closure resulted in severe traffic disruption, and both Westminster and Lambeth bridges were closed. Black Rod's Garden remained open to Members' vehicles. I should like to thank the emergency services and the Serjeant at Arms for dealing with the situation so quickly.

Mr. Heald: I thank the Leader of the House for the business, and for that short statement on the traffic incident. I think that we are all relieved that there is no gas outside this place, although it is often said that there is quite a lot inside.

May I ask the Leader of the House about his remarks that the Labour party might need to embrace proportional representation to save its marginal seats? [HON. MEMBERS: "Ah!"] Indeed. We know that the right hon. Gentleman used to be a Liberal. What plans are there for the Cabinet Joint Consultative Committee with the Liberal Democrats to meet to discuss his proposal? Many people are saying that he is perhaps returning to his roots.

Has the Leader of the House noticed that we are not having any discussion on housing in the Budget debate? Given that that was prominent in the Chancellor's statement, perhaps the Leader of the House will tell us whether we can expect a statement on the Barker report, or at least whether we can have an opportunity to debate the Chancellor's proposals on that matter.

Has the Leader of the House seen the scathing report of the Select Committee on Foreign Affairs, published today, in which it joins calls that I have made for much greater Government co-operation in providing witnesses and intelligence material to Select Committees? That is referred to in early-day motion 760.

[That this House expresses its concern that select committees are not able to obtain from the Government the documents and witnesses necessary in order to fulfil their role of scrutinizing the Executive; notes the comments of the honourable Member for Thurrock in the debate on the Hutton Report when he said that Lord Hutton had been able to cross-examine John Scarlet in public, but the Foreign Affairs Committee was refused access to him, and that they had been refused the drafts of the September dossier but Lord Hutton published them on the worldwide web; and calls on the Leader of the House to institute a major review into the way in which Government and ministers treat select committees and the provisions of the Osmotherly Rules and the Ministerial Code.]

The Committee describes the current practice as unenforceable, and is calling for enforcement procedures for when a Minister refuses to appear before a Committee or to supply a witness or documents. Does the Leader of the House agree that the Government have treated the Foreign Affairs Committee with lofty disdain, and that their attitude has been a disgrace? Will he announce the urgent review that is needed, in a statement today or next week?

Finally, the Leader of the House will be aware that the Home Secretary has described the returned Guantanamo detainees as posing no threat to the United Kingdom. However, reports released today by the US embassy show that one of them was trained in the use of weapons by al-Qaeda and fought the coalition in Tora Bora, and that two others were trained in the use of weapons in Afghanistan and were in that country armed and under Taliban orders. Apparently, another describes the US and the UK as his enemies and has travelled under al-Qaeda auspices. In those circumstances, are we not entitled to know why the Government say that these trained terrorists are not a threat? The Leader of the House will know that my right hon. Friend the Member for Haltemprice and Howden

[Mr. Heald]

(David Davis) has asked the Home Secretary to come here and make an emergency statement about this vital issue. Where is he?

Mr. Hain: First, may I say that I am disappointed that neither the hon. Gentleman nor the usual channels have been able to give us the topic for the Opposition day motion next week?

Mr. Eric Forth (Bromley and Chislehurst) (Con): Oh dear!

Mr. Hain: Well, the reason is that if the topic is known, it enables Members to plan their week and their work programme. They are able to decide what to intervene on or whether to seek to catch the Speaker's eye the day before. If they do not know what the subject is, they cannot make those choices. I understand that urgent business might sometimes require a change of subject, but I would be grateful if the hon. Member for North-East Hertfordshire (Mr. Heald) could discuss with his colleagues the common courtesy to the House of telling us what the subject will be, at least on a provisional basis.

On the Guantanamo returnees, the Government are absolutely alert to the risk that we face from international terrorism—we saw in Madrid last week the terrible impact that it can have. So, in dealing with those returnees, the police have been very anxious to assess the risk. They have done that, and they are dealing with the matter fully aware of all the dangers that the country faces from international terrorism and in the knowledge that they are able to utilise in full the powers of the anti-terrorism legislation. Those individuals have been dealt with in accordance with those facts.

On the question of proportional representation, I am going to disappoint the hon. Gentleman by saying that I have never been a supporter of it. I have, however, been a long-time supporter of the alternative vote, which is opposed root and branch by the Liberal Democrats and many others. I believe that, whatever reforms we make to the electoral system governing the election to the House of Commons, the single Member seat is the cornerstone of our parliamentary democracy. The issue is whether we should have the system that we have now, which is first past the post, or whether we should have a system in which we vote 1, 2, 3. I have always favoured the latter, but that is my view. We are having a big conversation about this and other issues—[Interruption.] It is important for people to express their views if they have strong feelings about retaining the first-past-the-post system. Others have feelings about opting for a fully proportional representation system. I do not agree with the PR system, because it would break the link between the individual Member elected to the House of Commons and the constituency, which could reject him or her if it did not like what that Member was doing. All PR systems destroy that link.

On housing, and the Barker report, we are very concerned about the difficulties that people—particularly first-time buyers—are having, which is part of the problem that ought to be addressed by the Barker report. That report was published in association with the Budget and can therefore be discussed at any time during the Budget debates. I hope that it will be, and the hon. Gentleman can arrange for his colleagues to put questions to the Deputy Prime Minister and other Ministers on housing matters if he wishes to do so. I would also say to him that we would welcome his tabling a motion on housing, because we would then see the clear dividing line between the Government, who intend to invest more in housing, and the Conservative Opposition, who are going to cut housing provision through cuts in the local government budget amounting to £2.5 billion. That savage cut would also, incidentally, result in council tax rises.

Finally, I do not accept for one moment that we have treated the Foreign Affairs Committee with, in the hon. Gentleman's words, "lofty disdain". On the contrary, the Government have co-operated in detail with the Committee, and we will be considering its report and obviously responding in detail to the representations that it has very properly made.

The Prime Minister also made it clear during his recent evidence session with the Liaison Committee that the Government would review the Osmotherly rules, which are at the heart of the matter. We intend to remain supportive of that commitment.

Mr. Paul Tyler (North Cornwall) (LD): May I refer the Leader of the House to the announcement he has made today that we are to have only one day for all the remaining stages of the Higher Education Bill? It is clear to Members on both sides of the House that this legislation is still extremely controversial, not least, of course, because of the lack of representation in Committee from a number of his colleagues who have concerns about important aspects of the Bill.

Will the Leader of the House look again to see whether he can find extra time for those remaining stages? Can he also give an absolute guarantee that there will be no Government statement on that day, if we have to remain with just one day for consideration? Will he also consider the special case for allowing extra time to replace any time taken for Divisions during the debate, because there may be a number of them, which could take up precious debating time?

Can the Leader of the House confirm the report in today's edition of the Financial Times that the plans for the reform of the House of Lords have become "absolutely shambolic"? No doubt he was involved in the meeting of the Cabinet Sub-Committee that took place this week and where, we understand, the whole issue was shunted up a siding. Can he tell us when and if the Bill will ever appear—he has previously referred to it in the House—and can he, at long last, confirm that, if it does reach the House, consideration in Committee will be taken in full on the Floor of the House, as was the case with the last reform Bill, which took the bulk of the hereditaries out of the House of Lords?

Mr. Hain: The Higher Education Bill was debated on Second Reading in great detail and it had a full airing in Committee, where, I understand, detailed and good-quality debate took place. I will certainly consider the hon. Gentleman's comment about there being no Government statement on the day, which is a fair point, subject, obviously, to the emergencies of the day. I will also look at the point he made about Divisions, but we have set sitting hours and I think it is important to keep to those.

On the Financial Times report, I ask the hon. Gentleman, in the nicest way, to contain himself on this matter. When we are ready to say how we are proceeding on the House of Lords questions, we will do so. An announcement will be made and he will need to wait until then.

Mr. Andrew Miller (Ellesmere Port and Neston) (Lab): Will my right hon. Friend have words with the Treasury to see whether it is possible to organise some training on interpretation of the massive Budget documents that we get every year, aimed at avoiding confusion of the kind that occurred yesterday in relation to green fuels? The Conservative party issued a press release that was so factually inaccurate that it misled the motorist. [Interruption.] This is important, although I am sure that the press release was not intended to mislead. Can we have some training?

Mr. Hain: Training for Opposition Members in all sorts of things would be a great advantage to the House, but I take my hon. Friend's point. For example, we would not have imagined that to get to the same level of duty as applies in Germany, fuel duty incentives for liquefied petroleum gas in the United Kingdom would have to rise by about 200 per cent. As he rightly says, the picture painted by the Opposition is extremely misleading, though no doubt that was inadvertent.

Sir Michael Spicer (West Worcestershire) (Con): Will the Leader of the House make a statement next week on the proposed title for the so-called presiding officer in the House of Lords? Is he aware of early-day motion 444?

[That this House notes the report prepared by the House of Lords' Select Committee on the Speakership of the House of Lords and its recommendation that the senior Lord presiding on the Woolsack should be known as the Lord Speaker; further notes that the Committee recognized the argument that this might lead to confusion with the Speaker of the House of Commons, but dismissed it; respectfully consider that there would be considerable scope for such confusion to occur, particularly in respect of Mr Speaker's role in representing this House at home and overseas; and calls upon the Government to facilitate consultations between both Houses about this important and sensitive issue.]

It has attracted 139 signatures against the title of Lord Speaker,

Mr. Hain: I will certainly bear in mind the hon. Gentleman's request, because I know the strong feelings of the House on this matter. As I have said before, Mr. Speaker, we have one Speaker—that is your good self. We intend to ensure that our Speaker is above all others, not just in this country but in the world.

Mrs. Alice Mahon (Halifax) (Lab): The Leader of the House will have seen that there has been a further outbreak of violence in Kosovo, which has come as no surprise to anyone who has visited it recently, because it is a mono-ethnic state run by the mafia, with ethnic minorities living in guarded enclaves. Those who constantly hail Kosovo as a success are deafeningly silent about the 170,000 refugees living in Serbia and Montenegro. Can we have an urgent debate on the situation in Kosovo, and on the very urgent need to get those permanently ethnically cleansed minorities back to Kosovo?

Mr. Hain: I acknowledge the close interest that my hon. Friend has taken in Kosovo, and I pay tribute to her for continuing to do so. The Defence Secretary will make a written ministerial statement on Monday about the situation, but I can tell the House that we agreed this morning to the deployment to Kosovo of the 1st battalion, the Royal Gloucestershire, Berkshire and Wiltshire Regiment, which is the unit assigned to the role in question after NATO requested the deployment of the operational reserve force. Today, 120 troops have gone out, and up to 600 will be made available if necessary. The situation is very serious, with many deaths and injuries, and we want to help to stabilise it. Kosovo has suffered far too much from ethnic conflicts and genocide, and it needs to be stabilised and have peace established as soon as possible.

Sir Nicholas Winterton (Macclesfield) (Con): May I follow up the point made by my hon. Friend the shadow Leader of the House about a debate on housing? I raise this not as a party political point but as a constituency point. The Office of the Deputy Prime Minister has put a moratorium on any further house building in my borough—the borough of Macclesfield—which, clearly, is having an adverse impact. While there are exceptions in relation to affordable housing, affordable housing is often only part of a larger development in which normal houses partially subsidise it. Could the Leader of the House arrange for a Minister to respond during the Budget debate on matters relating to housing? If not, could he find the opportunity for a debate on this important matter, preferably in this Chamber, or, if not, in Westminster Hall?

Mr. Hain: I will certainly bear in mind the hon. Gentleman's request. I can vouch for the fact that he consistently makes good constituency points, and very rarely are they party points. He is known to have that reputation.

Mr. Henry Bellingham (North-West Norfolk) (Con): He is a great parliamentarian.

Mr. Hain: He is indeed. Clearly, the issue that he raises about his constituency is important, and I know that the Minister responsible will want to take a close interest in it.

Mr. Harry Barnes (North-East Derbyshire) (Lab): I note that the debate on Equitable Life is to be on the Adjournment, but can we not have it on a substantive motion? That would allow some of us to put forward a version of early-day motion 827.

[That this House notes that Lord Penrose's report finds extensive evidence of operational failures by Equitable Life and regulatory failures by previous Conservative governments; yet recognises that Labour governments are often called upon to deal with the failings of financial capitalism and of a Conservative free market inheritance; and calls upon the Government to find ways and means for either the Parliamentary Ombudsman or Lord Penrose himself to examine the situation in order to make recommendations on compensation.]

That motion recognises that the problem arose from within Equitable Life itself and as a result of the lack of regulation under the Conservatives. Nevertheless, we often have to clear up the mess that has been created, and a case exists for compensation on the basis of need. We need an opportunity to debate the matter fully, which a substantive motion would allow.

Mr. Hain: There will, of course, be an opportunity to debate it fully in the time that we have allocated. It is an important issue, and my hon. Friend is absolutely right that we are having to clear up a mess that has badly hit many people as a result of the collapse of their financial provision for the future. We are addressing the matter, and there will be an opportunity to debate it, as he knows, but I am afraid that I cannot satisfy his request for a substantive motion.

Richard Younger-Ross (Teignbridge) (LD): I wonder whether the Foreign Secretary can make a statement on the present situation in Syria, where a number of Kurds have recently been shot and killed, a number injured, and a number arrested. I was told this morning that a number of villages are still cut off from the outside world. Can the Foreign Secretary make a statement on that, and in particular say what representations the Government have made to Syria, and whether the ambassador has been asked to explain the current situation?

Mr. Hain: Those at the Foreign and Commonwealth Office will have noted what the hon. Gentleman has said. He is right to draw the matter to our attention. I hope he will take the opportunity to table questions to the Foreign Secretary by next Wednesday, so that it can be addressed.

Julie Morgan (Cardiff, North) (Lab): Is my right hon. Friend aware of the concern felt by my constituents who work for the Inland Revenue in Llanishen, at Companies House and the Department for Work and Pensions in Gabalfa, and in other civil service outlets about the proposals announced by the Chancellor yesterday for civil service job cuts? Will he convey that concern to his colleagues, and press for early clarification of the position? Will he also ask them to bear in mind the losses that will be experienced in Cardiff, and particularly in my constituency, when deciding where to relocate the civil service jobs that are being moved from London?

Mr. Hain: The Ministers responsible will have noted my hon. Friend's points on behalf of her constituents. I can reassure her that the proposed reorganisation of the Inland Revenue, Customs and Excise and the Department for Work and Pensions results from efficiency savings, principally the introduction of new technology. It will now be possible to divert resources from backroom staff who were needed before the introduction of IT and other efficiency savings to front-line services, so that we can recruit more police officers, nurses, teachers and others—including pensions staff—and those services can be delivered to our constituents.

Mr. Bellingham: Front-line first?

Mr. Hain: As the hon. Gentleman has heckled me on the matter, let us consider the front-line services that would be cut by the shadow Chancellor's Budget. The number of police officers would be cut by at least 3,500. Council tax would go sky-high because of raiding of the local government budget, which would mean cuts of £2.5 billion. Transport budgets would be cut, as would be—astonishingly, given that the shadow Chancellor is a Conservative—the defence budget.

As for the Lyons report—

Mr. Speaker: Order. I do not think that this is about business for the coming week, which is really what we should be discussing.

Mr. Forth: I am sure we all look forward to being nursed by tax inspectors. It is an intriguing thought. But will the Leader of the House please list the occasions on which he has participated in the big conversation?

Mr. Hain: Those are primarily party events, although on behalf of a Labour Government. I have taken part in about half a dozen, including one in Birmingham last week.

Mr. Stephen McCabe (Birmingham, Hall Green) (Lab): May we have an early debate on the modernisation agenda? Will my right hon. Friend look in particular at the issue of parliamentary questions? As well as ministerial Question Times, could we not have an Opposition questions slot? Would that not be good for democracy—and would it not allow me to demand legitimately to be told how much money would be siphoned out of the NHS and state schools if the Tory policies for passports ever came to fruition?

Mr. Hain: I must say that I am very tempted by my hon. Friend's proposition. On a series of issues, the Conservative Opposition say one thing and then contradict it with something else. They say, for instance, that they want to cut crime, yet their proposed cuts in the Home Office budget would cause a reduction of up to 3,500 in the number of police officers. They speak of health investment, and then propose policies that would result in fewer nurses. Their education proposals would lead to a reduction in non-school budgets. The House, therefore, might well be enlightened by the holding of an Opposition Question Time.

Bob Spink (Castle Point) (Con): May we have a debate on hospices? Adult hospices are funded poorly, but children's hospices are in a funding crisis. Little Haven hospice in my constituency receives less than 2 per cent. of its funds from the Government. That is why it has recently had to launch a bond. It is an excellent way of raising funds, and I am delighted that so many local people support it, but we really do need to look again at the funding of the hospice movement.

Mr. Hain: I know that the movement regards the hon. Gentleman as one of its champions, and the House is indebted to him for that. I also know of his concern about the local situation, and the Minister responsible will have noted his comments. I remind him, however, that we have indeed provided more funds for the hospice movement—as he is kind enough to acknowledge with a nod. We will continue to do so, because the movement performs a vital role in our community.

Kevin Brennan (Cardiff, West) (Lab): I understand that in his Budget statement yesterday, the Chancellor encouraged financial institutions to give any orphan funds they might have to charity. Would it not be a good idea for the Government to use any orphan funds they have in the National Savings bank, for example, to compensate Allied Steel and Wire and other workers who have lost their occupational pensions through no fault of their own?

Mr. Hain: It is, in the main, for the Chancellor to respond to that question and establish whether there is scope to explore it further, but I know that my hon. Friend saw the Prime Minister earlier this week to discuss the matter. I also know that every member of the Government, from the Prime Minister down, wants to resolve the situation and is considering all sorts of possible avenues.

The injustice suffered by the ASW workers and others is grievous and terrible: they were robbed of pensions that were deferred wages. The issue has always been how to resolve the situation in a way that allows justice to prevail without a read-across resulting in a potential cost of billions of pounds to the taxpayer from other claims. That is the problem. If a solution can be found, I know that the Secretary of State for Work and Pensions and the Prime Minister will want to find it.

Mr. Tim Boswell (Daventry) (Con): I know that the Leader of the House is concerned about the fate of three Britons, one of them a constituent of mine, who have been imprisoned in Cairo for two years without a verdict. As their next hearing is fast approaching, will he have a word with those at the Foreign and Commonwealth Office and ask them to put all reasonable diplomatic pressure on the Egyptian authorities to ensure that this time the matter can be concluded once and for all with a verdict?

Mr. Hain: I am happy to agree to the hon. Gentleman's request, because I know the matter has been of great concern to him for some time.

Mr. Wayne David (Caerphilly) (Lab): May we have a debate on the new deal as soon as possible? In my constituency, 3,600 young people and some 2,440 lone parents have benefited from it. People are very worried about what would happen to the programme in the event of a public expenditure cut of £18 billion.

Mr. Hain: There is enormous concern about that in my own constituency and nearby. I have visited the Shaw trust, a marvellous project funded partly by the new deal, which gives partially sighted and blind people the opportunity to work. It is incredibly moving to see that going on. If funds for the new deal were cut, as the Conservatives propose—

Mr. Heald: And the Liberal Democrats.

Mr. Hain: Indeed. If that happened, the Shaw trust and other new deal projects up and down the land—including some in my hon. Friend's constituency would be for the chop. That would deal a terrible injustice to the long-term unemployed, those with disabilities, and those who want the opportunity to work that the new deal has provided.

Dr. Andrew Murrison (Westbury) (Con): Only last week I tabled a number of named-day questions to the Under-Secretary of State for Health, the hon. Member for Welwyn Hatfield (Miss Johnson), for answer on Monday. They concerned multi-drug resistant tuberculosis and the TB action plan that was supposed to be launched at the beginning of last year. I was fobbed off with the response that the hon. Lady would reply to me as soon as possible. Does that not constitute an admission that she simply does not have a clue about a very important matter on which she should have data at her fingertips? Will the Leader of the House do what he can to extract a proper answer from his hon. Friend?

Mr. Hain: I really cannot accept that. The Minister will want to give a serious, proper and full reply to the hon. Gentleman's question, and I think he should have the patience to wait for it rather than asking for a pre-emptive answer when the necessary investigation and assessment have not been carried out. He will want an answer that satisfies him, and that is what the Government will want to provide.

Mr. Gordon Prentice (Pendle) (Lab): We welcome my right hon. Friend's promise to bring back the Hunting Bill in this Session. Can he give a date, so that the Parliament Act may be used if necessary?

Mr. Hain: My hon. Friend has long been on my tail and that of the Government in respect of that measure. We remain committed to resolving that issue.

Mr. Paul Goodman (Wycombe) (Con): While I do not agree with the analysis of the hon. Member for North-East Derbyshire (Mr. Barnes) in relation to Equitable Life, is the Leader of the House aware that many Conservative Members agree that there should be a full debate, to provide the opportunity to express the extreme dissatisfaction felt by many constituents at the recent Treasury statement on Equitable Life?

Mr. Hain: The hon. Gentleman will have a chance to express his views when there is a debate in Government time at the Government's initiative. I do not understand the hon. Gentleman's point. My hon. Friend the Member for North-East Derbyshire was making a different point about a substantive motion. If the hon. Gentleman can persuade members of his Front Bench to initiate a debate on a substantive motion, the Government will be happy to debate it—and to oppose the motion, if we cannot agree with it.

Mrs. Anne Campbell (Cambridge) (Lab): When does my right hon. Friend expect the Constitutional Reform Bill to reach the Floor of the House?

Mr. Hain: Today's Order Paper for the House of Lords contains two motions on co-operation and carry-over. We are content with that situation and hope that on Monday, those motions—which have been tabled by agreement through the usual channels will be carried. Then the Bill can be debated in the House of Lords and return to this House. That will deliver the Bill in a sensible fashion rather than the position on 8 March when, in an unprecedented move, peers from all walks of life from all over the country, were bussed in by the Conservatives to defeat the Government and long-grass the Bill. The only precedent for that manoeuvre saw the measure never return to the Floor of the House or the matter resolved.

Rather than employ tactics to wreck the Bill, there is now the opportunity for proper scrutiny that will deliver the Bill because the Opposition, through the usual channels, have committed themselves. That arrangement will allow us to move forward but also raises the question of which is the supreme House of Parliament. That must be the House of Commons. It is good that the lordships involved in the negotiations have now agreed to deliver a Bill after a plea by the Leader of the Opposition, after previously saying—in the words of one Opposition Front Bencher—that they should bin the Bill. They are not going to bin the Bill. They will discuss it in a serious fashion and the will of this House shall prevail.

Mr. Bellingham: Can there be a statement on the extraordinary state of affairs in Zimbabwe involving the arrest of so-called mercenaries—including a British citizen, Simon Mann, who is a former SAS and Scots Guards officer? He may be an adventurer but if he intended to launch a coup against Equatorial New Guinea, he would hardly have started in Zimbabwe. Mr. Mann is currently imprisoned in squalid conditions and possibly faces the death penalty. Has the high commissioner been to see Mr. Mann? Have consular officials offered him any support?

Mr. Hain: I am not aware of the detailed consular arrangements but British citizens are entitled to full consular access and support, whatever their situation and whatever they might have done. I am sure that the Foreign Office will take a close interest in the hon. Gentleman's request. That situation is rather bizarre but almost everything that happens in Zimbabwe is not just bizarre but more serious. The situation to which the hon. Gentleman refers will have to be investigated and I am sure that the Foreign Office will provide the hon. Gentleman with the assurances that he seeks.

Mr. David Chaytor (Bury, North) (Lab): Following the terrorist atrocity in Madrid last Thursday, does my right hon. Friend agree that the role of the police in anti-terrorist work is more important than ever? Greater Manchester police are fortunate to have a record number of officers in post. The House has many opportunities during the year to debate defence policy but there are few debates specifically on policing policy. Does my right hon. Friend agree that if the Opposition are finding it difficult to identify a subject for debate next week, that occasion would provide a perfect opportunity for the House to discuss the funding and role of the police—particularly the impact of any cuts in police spending on anti-terrorist work?

Mr. Hain: Government policy is to increase police numbers, whereas Opposition policy is to cut police numbers as a result of big cuts in the Home Office budget. The Conservatives have done that before. When the Leader of the Opposition was Home Secretary, police numbers were cut by more than 1,000. Conservatives talk about wanting to fight crime but cut police numbers. The people of this country ought to know that there is a clear dividing line between Government and Opposition policing policy.

Mr. Kelvin Hopkins (Luton, North) (Lab): I have urged my right hon. Friend before to make time for a full debate on all aspects of housing beyond the Budget debate. I welcome the excellent report by Kate Barker, which identifies the fact that many more houses are needed. It is clear that the private sector is not prepared to build the number of houses, houses in the right places or types of houses required. There is a strong case for reinventing local authority provision of first-class, quality housing. A debate could encompass, for example, the abandonment of stock transfer schemes, transferring stock back to local authorities, and the re-establishment and expansion of direct labour organisations for house building and housing repairs, which worked so well in the past.

Mr. Hain: I have always been a great admirer of council housing programmes, especially since the war. The role played by Labour Governments over many decades was exemplary. We want to encourage opportunities for more social housing, whether provided by local councils or housing associations. The Barker report points up severe problems—in particular, the lack of affordable housing. We are seized of the need to do something, which is the reason for the Chancellor's positive welcome to the Barker report and to its recommendations for encouraging the relaxation of planning regulations and identifying different locations by changing the regime and encouraging the use of more brownfield sites. At least the public—especially first-time buyers—are confident that under this Government, mortgage rates will remain low because of the economic stability locked in by the Chancellor and endorsed by yesterday's Budget. Under Conservative Governments, mortgages went sky-high and were treble what they are now, creating uncertainty in the housing market and a nightmare for many first-time buyers.

Mr. Tom Watson (West Bromwich, East) (Lab): Can my right hon. Friend confirm that the Government intend to review the local government electoral systems in England and Wales? I respect my right hon. Friend's long-held views on the alternative vote but does he share the view of many right hon. and hon. Members who believe in the first-past-the-post system that electoral reform in favour of proportional representation for local government in Scotland would be a disaster?

Mr. Hain: I acknowledge and respect my hon. Friend's long-standing commitment to first past the post. I have been a long-standing opponent of proportional representation, which destroys the relationship between the Member of Parliament and his or her constituency, which can judge its MP and get rid of him or her if it wants. There are all sorts of anomalies and contradictions in PR systems. We fought the election on a commitment to undertake a review—which will be interesting because it will point up many of the anomalies that apply in existing PR systems. In Wales, for example, somebody can stand in an individual constituency and be defeated but get elected under the list system, then set up as a rival to the member who beat them.

In Clwyd, West in north Wales, three such candidates stood, were defeated, then got elected under the list system and campaigned against the winning Assembly member.

Mr. Greg Knight (East Yorkshire) (Con): It's your system.

Mr. Hain: I plead guilty. I took through the Government of Wales Act 1998 together with the then Secretary of State for Wales. The way the system operates has proved seriously anomalous and unacceptable—one reason for its operation being reviewed by the commission under Lord Richard. I hope that a much more sensible situation will emerge in future. I look forward to discussing those matters with my hon. Friend the Member for West Bromwich, East (Mr. Watson).

David Cairns (Greenock and Inverclyde) (Lab): On 6 April, during the Easter recess, the provisions of the Sunday Working (Scotland) Act 2003 will become law. My right hon. Friend will recall that I was fortunate enough to introduce that legislation as a private Member's Bill. It extends to shop workers in Scotland the right not to work on a Sunday should they choose not to do so—a right already enjoyed by shop workers in England and Wales. Will he take this and every opportunity to promote its provisions, so that shop workers in Scotland who are following the proceedings of this House will know that, from 6 April, people in my constituency will enjoy the right not to work on a Sunday that those in his constituency have enjoyed for many years?

Mr. Hain: My hon. Friend is absolutely right, and I pay tribute to the marvellous way in which, through legislation for which he was responsible, he has championed the cause of those workers. Indeed, the whole House is indebted to him, as are those shop workers who can be required to work on Sundays against their will.

Patrick Mercer (Newark) (Con): I was interested to hear that the Leader of the House believes that the Government are fully aware of the dangers of terrorism, but I am less than reassured to discover that the civil defence grant has been cut in real terms, that no public information campaign is being mounted to alert people to the dangers of terrorism, that there is no particular campaign to ensure that people are trained to know what to expect, and—most intriguingly of all—that the Civil Contingencies Bill seems to have stalled. Will the Leader of the House ask whichever Minister happens to be currently responsible for homeland security to explain the position to the House, and in particular to explain why the Bill is making no progress?

Mr. Hain: The Secretary of State and the Ministers responsible will want to study carefully the points that the hon. Gentleman raises before responding. I remind him, however—I am entitled to do so because he makes an important point—that the policy announced by the shadow Chancellor would lead to a big cut in homeland security budgets, and as a result our security would be infringed and threatened. That is exactly why the Chancellor announced yesterday a continuation of investment in infrastructure—including in homeland security—in our education system and in our other public services, so that this country can provide high quality services, and that the security issues about which the hon. Gentleman is concerned can be properly addressed. Those issues would not be addressed if the Conservatives won the next general election.

Orders of the Day

WAYS AND MEANS

Order read for resuming adjourned debate on Question [17 March].

AMENDMENT OF THE LAW

Motion made, and Question proposed,

(1) That it is expedient to amend the law with respect to the National Debt and the public revenue and to make further provision in connection with finance.

(2) This Resolution does not extend to the making of any amendment with respect to value added tax so as to provide—

(a) for zero-rating or exempting a supply, acquisition or importation;

(b) for refunding an amount of tax;

(c) for any relief, other than a relief that—

(i) so far as it is applicable to goods, applies to goods of every description, and

(ii) so far as it is applicable to services, applies to services of every description—[Mr Gordon Brown.]

Question again proposed.

Budget Resolutions and Economic Situation

1.13 pm

Mr. Tim Collins (Westmorland and Lonsdale) (Con): We welcome the Government's decision to put education at the heart of this year's Budget debate. Education shapes the nature of our society, the future of our children and our nation's potential. It is essential that we as a people, and as a Parliament, get education policy right. All of us in this House will doubtless want to join in paying tribute to the teachers, professors, lecturers, dons, teaching assistants, support staff, governors and heads who work so hard and with such dedication throughout UK education. Generally, they do so for little reward compared with other professions, and often in very difficult circumstances and with far too little public recognition. We will come later to the aspects of education on which the parties differ, but we surely can, and should, put on the record with absolute unanimity our collective congratulations, praise and thanks for what our nation's education professionals achieve, and inspire others to achieve.

We Conservatives are happy to acknowledge that important progress has been made since 1997—just as was made in the preceding years. I shall turn in a moment to several aspects of what the Chancellor had to say in the Budget about education which we are very happy to welcome. But although progress has undoubtedly been made in some elements of education in recent years, sadly, other elements have been going backwards. The National Association of Schoolmasters Union of Women Teachers says that there is an attack on a teacher every seven minutes in our schools. Truancy rose by 22 per cent. in the five years after 1997. Seventy-nine special schools have been closed, yet such schools often offer the very best education for the most disadvantaged children. The Government missed their 2002 targets for English and maths attainment at key stage 2, and they delayed their 2004 targets by two years. Now, they call them simply "aspirations". Teacher vacancies in secondary schools have risen by 282 per cent., while experienced teachers continue to leave the profession because of complaints about work load, targets and poor pupil behaviour.

Regrettably but clearly, things have got worse in all these areas since 1997, but let us consider another critical area: skills, productivity and vocational education, which is essential territory in any consideration of budgetary and educational issues. It is common ground between the parties that the UK lags behind our competitors in vocational training and education, and has done so for many years. This is in no way a new issue, and there are no magic wands or instant solutions. But given the priority that the Prime Minister, the Chancellor and successive Education Secretaries have given to this matter, and the huge sums of public money spent, after seven years things should be moving forward, at least. Sadly, the reverse is true.

The Engineering Employers Federation points out that "only 9 per cent. of young people in the UK are starting Advanced Modern Apprenticeships across all sectors, compared with almost two thirds of young people completing an apprenticeship in Germany in 2001 and a rapidly escalating number in France".

Yet the numbers for modern apprenticeships and work-based learning are actually falling in the UK—in the former case by nearly 20 per cent. The proportion of level 2 and level 3 awards made in vocational qualifications dropped by nearly 10 per cent. in the last year for which records are available. The total number enrolled in adult education has slumped by 73,000 since 1997. And according to the CBI, the number of British firms reporting a skills gap has more than trebled since 2001.

Mr. Henry Bellingham (North-West Norfolk) (Con): Does my hon. Friend agree that there is a cultural problem within schools and further education colleges? One difficulty is that a number of courses teaching specialist construction skills are closing, and until we can encourage more youngsters into vocational training, such problems will remain.

Mr. Collins: My hon. Friend, as ever, makes an excellent point, which is backed by his detailed knowledge of the subject. As he says, this problem has been with us for long time, and sadly, the closure of existing courses indicates that things are getting worse, rather than better.

What has been the effect of these developments on the UK economy as a whole? In his very first Budget, the Chancellor said that his priority was to raise Britain's productivity performance dramatically. There has been a dramatic change all right—for the worse. In the first six and a half years of this Government, productivity growth averaged just 1.6 per cent. per year—barely half the 2.8 per cent. growth that was achieved in the previous six and a half years. "Things can only get better," they said. In the vital area of skills and productivity, things have only got worse.

There was, however, much that the Chancellor announced on education in his Budget that we Conservatives can warmly welcome. Indeed, it would be churlish not to happily offer such an endorsement, given that announcement after announcement constituted Government acceptance of Conservative policy. There are to be more city academies, which, in the form of city technology colleges, were a Conservative idea, so we welcome that announcement. More money is to be paid directly to head teachers. That policy is a direct extension of the Conservative policies of local management of schools and grant-maintained schools. There is a clear movement in the direction of free schools—the Conservative policy of 2001—and of pupil passports, which is Conservative policy for the next election. So we welcome that announcement.

We learn from page 147 of the Red Book that most specific grants to schools

"will be paid as a single schools improvement grant" in order "to streamline funding". That is a direct lift from Conservative pledges made at our recent party conferences to reduce the current absurdity of there being up to three dozen different funding streams for schools. That is Conservative policy, so we welcome that announcement, too.

Mr. Barry Sheerman (Huddersfield) (Lab/Co-op): We have heard many versions of the passport idea, which has led to great confusion both within and outside the House about how exactly the system will work. Can the hon. Gentleman explain it in more detail in his speech, or would he be prepared to attend a sitting of the Education and Skills Committee to provide us with more detail on his plans?

Mr. Collins: The hon. Gentleman is extremely generous. He will be delighted to hear that a substantial section of my speech deals expressly with pupil passports. I hope that he will feel by the end of my speech that I have answered his questions, but if he has further questions, we could talk about how best to answer them as well. If the hon. Gentleman would like to make the offer that he suggested closer to the general election, I would be delighted to accept it.

I was explaining why we were happy to welcome all the wonderful things that the Chancellor announced yesterday—because they were Conservative policy. I have to say that the list has not ended and I will continue with it. For example, there are to be far fewer civil servants working in the Department for Education and Skills, with the money saved to be distributed to the classroom instead. That was Conservative policy at the last general election, has remained Conservative policy throughout this Parliament and will be Conservative policy at the next election. We obviously welcome that announcement, too.

Mr. Hilton Dawson (Lancaster and Wyre) (Lab): While the hon. Gentleman is regaling us with Conservative policy, will he congratulate the Government on the investment that they have made, especially in small rural schools, and pay particular tribute to the work of beacon schools such as Quernmore in my constituency?

Mr. Collins: I gladly welcome the money that has been invested in the state system. As I shall say later, there is evidence of improvement in several areas—the hon. Gentleman has doubtless touched on one of them—such as new and improved school buildings and facilities, more teacher recruitment, and so forth. All that is outstanding, but since the hon. Gentleman mentions small rural schools, I would mention Settlebeck school—not small, but very rural—in my own constituency. In the last 12 months for the first time ever—the school has been around for decades under Governments of both political colours—that school has had to write to parents to ask for a direct cash subvention to buy books. That never happened under a Conservative Government, but has happened six years into a Labour Government. The hon. Gentleman should not therefore assume that everything is good news.

At the moment, I am being positive, cross party and bipartisan in welcoming all the wonderful things that the Government have accepted from Conservative suggestions, so let us proceed to the next example—arguably the most important of them all. The Chancellor announced that he proposes to increase overall education spending to about £77 billion by the end of the next comprehensive spending round period. You may recall, Mr. Speaker, that some weeks ago, my right hon. Friend the shadow Chancellor set out in some detail the overall public spending envelope that would apply under the Conservative Government after the next general election. Funnily enough, the £77 billion that the Chancellor suddenly discovered yesterday as the appropriate amount to spend overall on education in 2007 is essentially the same figure implied for that year by what my right hon. Friend said some weeks ago. So even on the overall level of education spending, as on all those other things, the Chancellor and the Secretary of State are Johnny-Come-Latelies, once again embracing pre-existing Conservative policy—and once again we welcome that announcement.

Indeed, so frequently, so assiduously, so repeatedly did the Chancellor yesterday announce that he was adopting Conservative policy that I wondered what on earth Ministers would do without Conservative Members here to give them all their ideas? Sadly, however, many voters will choose to judge the Government not on their new-found conversion to Tory principles for the next Parliament, but on their seven-year record of what they have actually done in the last two Parliaments.

What is the good of the Government saying that they now see the case for greater financial management by head teachers, when their first act on taking office was to take financial independence away from grant-maintained schools? What is the good of saying that they are now converted to the need for simplified funding and a single grant, when their never-ending flow of initiatives and paperwork has snowed schools under with three dozen different routes to get money? Why should they be trusted to get rid of 31 per cent. of officials at the Department for Education and Skills, when they have increased those numbers by 25 per cent. since 1997?

Chris Grayling (Epsom and Ewell) (Con) rose—

Mr. Collins: Before the 1997 election, Labour pretended to embrace the Conservative approach to the economy—enterprise and low tax. That proved, sadly, to be an entirely false conversion. Now, in the run-up to the next election, they pretend to embrace the Conservative approach to education—putting power and spending decisions in the hands of schools and parents, not bureaucrats. I fear that that will prove to be an equally false conversion.

I shall now deal with higher education. The Red Book devotes precisely two sentences to the funding of universities and other higher education institutions. It states that the Government "will maintain per student spending levels in real terms over the 2004 Spending Review period".

However, current spending per student is lower than it was in 1997. In fact, it has been lower in every single year of Labour Government than it was in any year of the previous Conservative Government, and it is lower today than it was before the Government introduced tuition fees in 1998. So maintaining those low levels in real terms for the foreseeable future is hardly an act of extraordinary political generosity. On the contrary, it means maintaining public investment in higher education at levels that the university sector has repeatedly called unsustainable and deeply damaging.

Then, of course, there are the Government's plans for top-up fees. We shall see whether, at the end of this month, the Higher Education Bill survives Report and Third Reading. Contrary to the impression given in advance to many potential rebels that further important concessions would be made if a Second Reading were granted, the Bill left Committee almost entirely unamended, so its passage is by no means guaranteed.

What yesterday's Budget showed was that universities are already losing, not gaining, from the proposed introduction of top-up fees. Almost every other sector in education is to get more taxpayers' money under the Government's plans. Overall spending goes up by 4.4 per cent. in real terms. Early years and Sure Start funding get 17 per cent. annual rises, and spending per pupil in schools is to rise by nearly 20 per cent.—but real spending per student in higher education is not to rise at all. That demonstrates that the Government are using top-up fees in precisely the way we predicted—not to provide extra money per student, but to substitute for extra money per student.

Even the guarantee of a real-terms freeze in Government grant per student runs out in 2007, just a year after top-up fees come in, and well before income from them has grown to significant levels. That is why increasing numbers of vice-chancellors are beginning to wonder if the Government speak with forked tongue, and that is why we are confident that our alternative proposals, which we will publish later this year, will be welcomed not only by students who are understandably fearful of the much higher levels of debt involved in the Government's plans, but by universities and taxpayers who will both get a better deal than they will under the Government's scheme.

Helen Jones (Warrington, North) (Lab): The hon. Gentleman is discussing the future of higher education, so will he be kind enough to inform the House what percentage of our young people he envisages going into higher education under his party's plans?

Mr. Collins: I am happy to point out to the hon. Lady that my party has said for some time that it is not desirable for politicians to set targets for participation. We believe that people should go to university on the basis of their ability to learn rather than their ability to pay. That will be reflected in the policies that we put to the electorate at the next election, but sadly not in Labour's policies.

What about school funding, the centrepiece of the Government's education drive and their proudest boast? Was not the last election campaign fought, as Labour told us, to get a mandate to put more money into schools and hospitals? What has been the result? Yes, as I said earlier, the taxpayer has put a lot more into the top of the funnel. Yes, there are undoubtedly many very welcome new school buildings in many parts of the country. However, anyone talking to teachers, head teachers and governors all over the country will hear that many of them seriously dispute claims about huge increases in resources that can actually be used. For example, the head teacher of the Kingsway school in Cheadle points out:

"Our pupil-teacher ratio has risen year on year so that I have seven and half fewer teachers funded now than 10 years ago."

He went on to say:

"It is only our own fund raising, for example through lettings, which has helped us to survive."

That is the scale of the problem that such schools face. The head of Guildford's George Abbott school said:

"My feeling is that secondary schools like ours are likely to need between 6 and 7 per cent. in order to stand still in the next financial year."

That is not what the Chancellor announced yesterday. The head of Newbury's Trinity school and performing arts college said:

"We don't have a balanced budget. Even with the extra £130,000 that we got in emergency funding from the Government, we are still expecting a fiscal year '03 deficit in excess of £100,000."

Doug McAvoy, general secretary of the National Union of Teachers, says—[Interruption.] We shall come to the Government's attitude to the nation's largest teaching union in a moment. Ministers should put their groans on hold and hear what the general secretary has to say, which is that the increases announced yesterday are "unlikely to make good the deficit and at the same time equip schools adequately to enable them to meet the demands made on them."

He went further. Pointing to the fiasco of funding for schools presided over by this set of Ministers just over a year ago, he said that "in the past, what looked like an increase resulted in schools continuing to be underfunded."

I know that the Secretary of State and his Ministers do not like the NUT much. Indeed, for the second year running, the right hon. Gentleman has chosen not to speak at the union's conference. My hon. Friend the Member for South Suffolk (Mr. Yeo) will speak, but the Secretary of State will not. Ministers may therefore like to hear a near-identical warning from John Dunford of the Secondary Heads Association. He says:

"The last spending review, when early joy turned to later grief for many schools facing unprecedented budget cuts, taught us a lesson that we have to wait for the small print."

Is not that true of every aspect of every Budget under this Chancellor? I met representatives of the Association of Colleges earlier this week, and they are less than ecstatic about the Chancellor's proposals. The association's chief executive, Dr. John Brennan, said:

"There simply is not enough money in the system to meet the targets which government has set."

He warned that colleges would have to cut courses for adults that the Chancellor was "guaranteeing".

Chris Grayling: My hon. Friend will know that the real problems for schools and colleges in this Parliament were caused by the tax rises that the Chancellor imposed after promising that there would be none. The likelihood is that the same thing will happen in the next Parliament, with the same consequences.

Mr. Collins: My hon. Friend is entirely right. The Chancellor took away with one hand what he gave—

Mr. Sheerman: What is going on? Why is the hon. Member for Epsom and Ewell (Chris Grayling) now speaking from the Back Benches?

Helen Jones: He was on the Front Bench a moment ago.

Mr. Stephen O'Brien (Eddisbury) (Con): This is now the Budget debate, not education questions. Labour Members do not seem to know the procedure.

Madam Deputy Speaker (Sylvia Heal): Order. Could we have just one debate?

Mr. Collins: I am grateful, Madam Deputy Speaker. It is clear—

Mr. Sheerman: On a point of order, Madam Deputy Speaker. I have never seen it happen before that an hon. Member who one minute is sitting on the Opposition Front Bench is the next minute allowed to address a question, from the Back Benches, to his own Front-Bench spokesman. That is absurd, and brings the House into disrepute.

Madam Deputy Speaker: If I had observed anything irregular, I would certainly have acted.

Mr. Collins: I am grateful, Madam Deputy Speaker. There are alternative policies that offer a greater prospect for success. They include measures to improve discipline in schools, and legislation—which we have offered to support even if introduced by present Ministers—to protect teacher anonymity, and to restore the presumption of innocence when a teacher is the subject of a serious accusation levelled, all too often maliciously, by a child. Other measures would cut through the confusing alphabet soup of vocational qualifications, reduce paperwork burdens on teachers by reducing course work, and give much more financial leeway to schools and their governing bodies.

Yesterday, as in successive Budgets, the Chancellor made great virtue of paying money directly to head teachers. We agree, but he pays only a tiny percentage of school budgets in that way. We want to pay the vast majority of money via that route.

The Government say that they want more money to be paid to schools in one budget. We agree. We have campaigned for years against the excessive complexity that this Government have created. Once again, however, we would go further. We believe that most money should simply follow the pupil, and that is where the pupil passport comes in. It will make sure that schools are accountable—not as now, upwards to bureaucrats, but downwards, to their local parents and communities. It will give parents greater control and choice over schools. We will abolish the surplus places rule, enabling successful and popular schools to expand. We will encourage successful schools to take over the management of neighbouring schools that have not performed as well. It is a policy designed to improve schooling—not for some, not even for most, but for all pupils in all schools.

It is understandable that Labour Members are much more obsessed than we are with the implications of all that for fee-paying schools. After all, their leader went to such a school, while ours did not. The Secretary of State reflected that fascination when he wrote a letter to the Financial Times this morning—

Mr. Sheerman: Before the hon. Gentleman repeats the fact that the Leader of the Opposition went to a grammar school whereas the leader of the Labour party went to a public school, will he accept that none of us is responsible for the school to which our parents sent us? However—I am looking now at the shadow Secretary of State—we are responsible for where we send our children. I know that many Opposition Members have never had any intention of using the state sector for education.

Mr. Collins: I must say that I regret that intervention from the Chairman of the Select Committee on Education and Skills. Although they have party affiliations, Select Committee Chairmen usually attempt, in debates about the subject for which their Select Committees have responsibility, to strike a rather more non-partisan note. If the hon. Gentleman wants to engage in such attacks, I merely point out that the present Secretary of State for Constitutional Affairs sits in the House of Lords, and not in this House, because he refused to send his children—

Madam Deputy Speaker: Order. This is going very wide of the debate that is before the House.

Mr. Collins: Thank you, Madam Deputy Speaker. I was trying to get to a matter about which I imagined Labour Members would want to talk—the Secretary of State's very interesting letter to the Financial Times this morning. He set out what he would clearly like the difference to be between his approach and that of the Conservative party. He wrote:

"It is the difference between billions of pounds of taxpayers' money spent improving state schools or subsidising private schools that have surplus places".

So let me disabuse him. The pupil passport will be usable only at state-funded schools providing education solely to those who pay for it with the passport. It is a policy whose main purpose, and greatest virtue, is that it will not undermine publicly provided education but for the first time make publicly provided education work for every part of our society, not just for some. Not one penny of subsidy will be available for those who send their children to fee-paying schools.

I can tell from the look of shock and disappointment crossing the Secretary of State's face that he realises that I have shot his fox. Let me make it clear, however, that this fox has been not just shot, but shelled, napalmed and obliterated.

The Government, like the Opposition, will concentrate very substantially increased investment in the state schools to which the vast majority of people send their children. Unlike the Government, however, we will not say that choice and freedom should apply only to the wealthiest parents and the wealthiest schools. It has been the historic role of the Conservative Party to spread the privileges once enjoyed only by the few to every part of society, and we shall do that again.

Mr. Stephen McCabe (Birmingham, Hall Green) (Lab): Normally, Madam Deputy Speaker, I would not intervene from this position just behind my Front Bench, but I am trying to keep up with the hon. Member for Epsom and Ewell (Chris Grayling). The hon. Gentleman talks about spreading wealth, so will the vouchers be regarded as taxable income? Will poorer families receive vouchers that are worth more, and will that money be taken away from richer families?

Mr. Collins: I can genuinely say to the hon. Gentleman that I have no idea what he is talking about. Of course there is no question that the voucher would be taxable. That proposition is truly absurd. What is very clear is that the hon. Gentleman is frightened that parents throughout the state system will be allowed to have control over the resources made available to support their children. The Government do not like that idea: they have pretended to throw aside their control freakery, but they have not done so for real.

Yesterday the Chancellor rattled off statistics to try to prove that everything in the nation's garden is rosy. Of course, some things are better than they were in 1997. My right hon. Friend the shadow Chancellor has congratulated the Chancellor on giving the Bank of England control over interest rates. It has taken far more sensible decisions on these matters than any Labour Chancellor ever has or ever could. The Chancellor was right to say that Britain was enjoying its longest period of economic growth in many years, but that is true only because the period in question commenced not in 1997 but in 1992. It started because the Conservative party ignored Labour's advice to stay in the exchange rate mechanism, and it continues only because the Chancellor ignores the Prime Minister's advice to join the euro.

What about some of the statistics that the Chancellor forgot to mention yesterday, and which I suspect the Secretary of State will omit today? The savings ratio—worse than in 1997; manufacturing output—worse than in 1997; business investment growth—worse than in 1997; productivity growth—worse than in 1997; the lowest level of manufacturing employment since records began; the biggest trade deficit in three centuries, and the highest levels of personal debt ever. And in education, teacher vacancies are up, attacks on teachers are up, truancy is up and we have the highest level of pupil drug usage ever.

These problems are not the fault of the teachers and governors any more than the economic setbacks are the fault of businesses. They are the responsibility of a Government who always claim credit when things get better but blame someone else when they get worse. These problems are real and serious, and growing by the day. That is why there is a real difference between the parties over education when the nation comes to vote. Those differences will not be the ones that Labour would have liked. The Labour party would like to be able to say that it would spend more than the Conservatives, but now it cannot. It would like to be able to say that the Conservatives would divert state money for education to subsidise fee-paying schools, but now it cannot. It will have to debate the area in which its record is weakest—not how much money one spends, but how one spends it.

Seven years of socialist centralisation, waste, bureaucracy and interference cannot be wished away just by mass plagiarism of Conservative policy for the future. Labour Members know that we have won the arguments. Now they should get ready for us to win the next election.

1.42 pm

The Secretary of State for Education and Skills (Mr. Charles Clarke): What an extraordinary speech!

Earlier today, I made a written statement on the education implications of the Budget statement made yesterday by my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer. I confess that I am surprised that the hon. Member for South Suffolk (Mr. Yeo) has decided that it is beneath him to respond to the debate. He is the man in the shadow Cabinet who has to discuss with the shadow Chancellor the financial implications for education. I am candidly disappointed that he has not thought to give this subject the priority that most of the country will think that it deserves.

Mr. Tim Yeo (South Suffolk) (Con): That is an extraordinary statement by the Secretary of State. In the time that I have been looking after the education portfolio in the shadow Cabinet, the Government have come closer to being defeated on a major aspect of policy than at any time in the past seven years. I invite the Secretary of State to reverse his decision to absent himself from the National Union of Teachers annual conference and join me on Easter Sunday to debate the issues that my hon. Friend the Member for Westmorland and Lonsdale (Mr. Collins) has raised in the past half-hour.

Mr. Clarke: I stand second to no one in paying tribute to the activities of the hon. Gentleman as the golfing correspondent of the Financial Times, but he has to choose whether he is dealing with education or health. The explicit choice that he has made not to consider the education debate, in this Budget of all Budgets, as the one on which he should focus his attention is genuinely extraordinary, and people should observe that fact.

Yesterday, my right hon. Friend the Chancellor set out measures to ensure stability for education, children's services and skills training and continued progress across the Department's agenda, which is crucial to the economic and social well-being of the country. He made it clear that education spending in England would grow by an average of 4.4 per cent. across the spending review period—that is, by 6 per cent. in 2005–06, by 3.6 per cent. in 2006–07 and by 3.5 per cent. in 2007–08. As a result of this settlement, education spending in the UK will be 5.6 per cent. of GDP in 2007–08, up from 5.4 per cent. in 2004–05. This major and stable advance at every level of education—a point to which I shall return—is based on experience and the advice that we are receiving from teachers in our wide national consultations.

More than 1.6 million children have benefited from free part-time nursery education for three and four-year-olds, and 400,000 children and their families in deprived areas have been helped by 524 Sure Start centres. As a result of the settlement that the Chancellor announced yesterday, the number of children's centres will rise to 1,700 by 2008, covering all 20 per cent. of the country's most disadvantaged wards.

In due course, we will announce the details of an expansion of child care places, family support services and extended schools, which bring together education, health, children's social services and child care. This settlement will provide the funding necessary to address the agenda set out in our Green Paper "Every Child Matters" and, even more important, it offers us a once-in-a-lifetime opportunity to reverse the vicious cycle of decline that has kept people from the poorest parts of this country away from aspiration and hope for the future.

At the level of schools, as a result of the Government's class-size pledge, 350,000 five, six and seven-year-olds are no longer in classes of 31 or more. In 1997, half of all 11-year-olds went to secondary school unable to read, write or count at the necessary level. Now that figure has been reduced to a quarter. It is still too high, but it is a massive reduction from the position that we inherited. The settlement that my right hon. Friend announced yesterday will enable primary schools and teachers to continue to raise standards of literacy and numeracy, supported by work force reform and the recruitment of more teaching assistants.

In 1997, just 45.1 per cent. of pupils got five good grades at GCSE. Last year, that had increased to 52.9 per cent. and, most encouraging of all, the biggest increases were in the toughest areas. Pupils in excellence in cities areas are improving at more than twice the rate of pupils elsewhere in the country. Half of all secondary pupils are now taught in specialist schools. I was honoured to visit such a school two or three years ago in the constituency of the hon. Member for Westmorland and Lonsdale. They are getting better results—56.7 per cent. of pupils in specialist schools get five good grades at GCSE.

Chris Grayling: Does the Secretary of State agree that many of the improvements that he talks about took place in the early years of the Labour Government? Many young people, and even today's GCSE pupils, went through much of their education under the last Conservative Government, so will he pay tribute to that Government for their contribution to the development of those young people and the improvements in their performance to which he has just referred?

Mr. Clarke: I do not wish to appear churlish, but I will not because the facts are at odds with what the hon. Gentleman has just said. The facts are that, with specialist schools and the GCSE statistics that I was giving in particular, the improvements have accelerated recently. That is the progress that has been made. It is a fact, and it is a big issue for the whole of the education service, that there has been a massive backlog of under-investment amounting to billions of pounds at all levels of education from which we have had to claw our way out. We have not done so as fast as all of us would have liked, I am sure, but we are continuing to make steady progress. I do not wish to appear churlish, but I cannot answer him in the way that he would wish. We have had a sea change in policy both in commitment and in resources, which is taking us forward in a substantial way.

Mr. Collins: The Secretary of State has just said—it is a perfectly reasonable position—that the longer the Government have been responsible for these matters, the greater share they wish to take of both the credit and the blame for what is working and what is not. Can he explain why progress towards literacy and numeracy at key stage 2 advanced up to 2000 and halted thereafter?

Mr. Clarke: I am certainly prepared to take both credit and blame. As the hon. Gentleman rightly says, the more time goes on, the more can be stated in that way. I am prepared to acknowledge to the House, as I have before, that the flattening—particularly in literacy, but also in numeracy—in the past two or three years has been a serious problem. We are addressing it seriously, and I believe that the results this year will again show a continued improvement. I have to remind him that, in 1997, half of children were leaving primary school without achieving level 4 of key stage 2 whereas now only a quarter do. There has been a fantastic improvement, but he is right that there is a fantastic lot more to do. That is the point about the settlement that my right hon. Friend the Chancellor announced yesterday.

The settlement will continue the drive to achieve excellence and to narrow the gaps in attainment between schools. It will make a reality of our commitment that every school that meets the standard will have the opportunity to gain specialist status and allow continued expansion in the number of city academies.

[Mr. Clarke]

Over the spending review period, total departmental capital spending will rise from £3.85 billion in 2004–05 to £6.78 billion in 2007–08—a massive increase. That will ensure that, by 2015, through our "building schools for the future" programme, every secondary school in the country can be refurbished or rebuilt, with world-class technology in every school and the best state-of-the-art learning in every classroom. To accompany that new investment, we shall develop a new relationship with schools to help deliver personalised learning tailored to the talents and needs of every pupil, underpinned by a strengthened accountability framework, a simplified school improvement process and improved information and data management.

In higher education, publicly planned funding has risen dramatically under the Labour Government. Expenditure on science and research—a major theme in the Chancellor's announcement yesterday—will have increased in 2005–06 by £1.25 billion a year compared with 2002–03, which is about 30 per cent. in real terms. The settlement will allow investment in the sector to continue to grow in real terms and enable the Government to maintain real-terms student funding per head and to progress towards our target of 50 per cent. participation in higher education. It will also provide the resources needed to deliver the reforms set out in our White Paper, "The Future of Higher Education".

On lifelong learning, 255,000 young people were in modern apprenticeships in December 2003, compared with only 75,800 in 1997. It is worth noting that the Conservatives may talk about vocational education but they made no commitment—as we did—to more than treble the number of people on modern apprenticeships over that period. In 1985, 10.5 million people of working age in England had no qualifications, but in 2003, the number was 4.6 million—a massive reduction. Between 2001 and 2002, more than 300,000 adults were helped to raise their numeracy and literacy skills.

My right hon. Friend's Budget settlement will provide for new measures, through the new deal for skills, to tackle the large number of adults in the UK work force who have low skills. In jobcentres, a one-stop skills service will be offered for the employed as well as the unemployed, with access to personal skills advisers and training. By 2007, 1.5 million adults will have improved their basic skills as part of our longer-term aim of ensuring that, by 2010, the number of adults in the work force who lack NVQ2 or equivalent qualifications is reduced by at least 40 per cent.

We shall take forward the measures set out in our skills strategy to meet the needs of employers, employees and individual learners, including a key role for the new sector skills councils.

Chris Grayling: Given the Secretary of State's remarks about expanding learning opportunities, can he comment on the problems in further education colleges? Because of the Government's focus on basic skills, colleges struggle to find finance for many level 3 courses, thus inevitably weakening the opportunity for certain people to move on to higher education. Can he give college principals an assurance that that situation will change in the current funding round?

Mr. Clarke: I can and I have, when speaking to the Association of Colleges. However, the hon. Gentleman raises important issues and I shall comment on them in a second. The role of further education is central to the whole of our programme and we are utterly committed to it.

Our agenda is ambitious. As the Chancellor said yesterday, the long-term future of our country depends on investment in education, science and enterprise, so commitment must be long term. Labour is making that long-term commitment and the debate offers us the chance to clarify the alternatives set out by the Conservatives. In that spirit, I was glad that the hon. Member for Westmorland and Lonsdale mentioned some of his party's policies, to which I shall now turn.

Mr. Mark Field (Cities of London and Westminster) (Con): In connection with the point on further education made by my hon. Friend the Member for Epsom and Ewell (Chris Grayling), many of us are concerned not only about the understandable need to increase basic literacy and numeracy but to ensure that people in their 40s and 50s are constantly reskilling, especially given all the outsourcing that is going on. Is not the Secretary of State concerned that too much attention is being paid to ensuring that a cohort of 40 or 50 per cent. of youngsters go to university? Does he agree that much more attention should be paid to the next quartile down—people who may not go to university, but who require constant retraining and reskilling if they are to have a long-term career in the marketplace?

Mr. Clarke: I agree, but we give massive priority to the other 50 per cent., if I can describe them thus. Our policy and programme have been powerful in that respect. Our development of modern apprenticeships, on which I have already given the figures, has been impressive and will be even more impressive. Opposition Members criticised our higher education White Paper by saying that we should focus more on vocational education. When the White Paper was published, the Opposition promised that we would hear their policies on those matters but, so far, we have not heard a squeak—a point to which I shall return.

Earlier this year, when the Leader of the Opposition spoke immediately before me at the CBI conference, he said that his intention in leading his party was to have policies that were "clear, costed and credible". I have to say that the policies are neither clear, nor costed, nor credible and I shall clearly set out why.

Spending on education is at the core of the Budget. Under the Conservative education proposals outlined by the shadow Chancellor in February, expenditure on education, apart from schools but including further education, would be frozen in cash terms for two years. His speech was explicit. He said:

"I have agreed with my Shadow Cabinet colleagues"—

perhaps that is why the hon. Member for South Suffolk is not prepared to speak in this debate—

"that the baseline for spending across all of these departmental budgets"— outside the national health service and schools—

"will be 0 per cent. growth for the first two years".

That means real-terms cuts. That clear pledge means massive real-terms cuts in the field that we are debating, namely all non-school budgets. It will mean cuts to Sure Start, to children's services generally, to skills and further education and to higher education. A cuts policy has been set out by the shadow Chancellor.

Perhaps it is not surprising that the right hon. Gentleman's Front-Bench colleagues are unwilling to accept that state of affairs and are in a state of denial, or even non-participation, in relation to those matters. To be generous to him, I shall offer only one example. Less than two weeks after he published his plans, the hon. Member for East Worthing and Shoreham (Tim Loughton) argued at the Dispatch Box that

"Children's services would not be affected, so let us not hear any more nonsense."—[Official Report, 3 March 2004; Vol. 418, c. 973.]

That was untrue.

Mr. Yeo: The Secretary of State has just gone through some arithmetical calculations. As my hon. Friend the Member for Westmorland and Lonsdale (Mr. Collins) pointed out when he opened the debate, the total departmental spending envelope proposed by my right hon. Friend the shadow Chancellor is precisely the same as that proposed yesterday by the Chancellor of the Exchequer. The Secretary of State has probably worked out—perhaps that is why he is not participating in the NUT annual conference on Easter Sunday—that, under the Government's policy, he is proposing to spend less on schools than the Conservative party.

Mr. Clarke: That is the most incredible nonsense, but I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for joining in the discussion, because we need clarity. We need to know exactly what the situation is. Indeed, it was in that spirit that, after the comments of the hon. Member for East Worthing and Shoreham, I wrote to the shadow Chancellor to ask,

"Would expenditure on non-school . . . services be frozen in cash terms for 2 years?

I asked him to confirm the effect of that on spending on non-school services. I further asked,

"Are you yet in a position to indicate the budget lines which you would cut to achieve these targets?"

The right hon. Gentleman did not respond to that set of questions, which I had hoped would inform public debate on those matters, until this morning, when I was extremely excited to receive a missive from him, in which he clearly confirms the position. He said:

"whilst DEL spending remains within the overall expenditure total identified by the Medium Term Expenditure Strategy", the Opposition would do what they can

"to ensure that all important front-line services are maintained".

That position is not sustainable. The whole point of the shadow Chancellor's speech in February was that hard choices had to be made and that certain things would have to go. He said that the NHS and schools would not be included, but that everything else would. I am asking about everything else. [Interruption.] The hon. Member for South Suffolk says, "Not go", but everything else would be cut in real terms and frozen in cash terms for two years. That was the clear statement, which, I am glad to say, has been confirmed again today.

How do those spending plans compare? As I have said, the Government have made a firm commitment to an average 4.4 per cent. increase per year in the period 2005 to 2008. Tory freeze policies could mean cuts by 2007–08 of around £900 million in spending on children's services, £1.1 billion on higher education and £131 million on modern apprenticeships. The hon. Member for Epsom and Ewell (Chris Grayling) raised modern apprenticeships, and over that two-year period such cuts would mean 48,000 fewer modern apprenticeships than under our proposals. It is okay for the Conservative party to have such a policy, but not to have such a policy and then proclaim a commitment to education and vocational training for people who leave school. It should come clean about what it is doing.

Chris Grayling: Given that all three political parties have identified substantial potential to remove unnecessary bureaucracy and waste from across Government, can the Secretary of State explain why, when the Government take that approach, it is a prudent reduction in central administration costs, but when the Opposition propose to do the same it magically turns into savage cuts to front-line services?

Mr. Clarke: That is completely wrong. The cuts that we make in administration are necessary and right for a wide variety of different reasons. One of those reasons is the contribution such cuts make to Front-Bench services.

The Minister for Lifelong Learning, Further and Higher Education (Alan Johnson): Front-line services.

Mr. Clarke: A mis-statement on my part. Perhaps those on the Conservative Benches could have a ballot to find out who wants to be on the Front Bench—four of them are on the Front Bench and two are on the Back Benches.

A cut in administration is not enough to deliver what we have to do. We have a whole set of measures, such as our stable management of the economy and reduction of the billions of pounds wasted on debt repayment and the costs of unemployment, which the Conservative party would return to by, for example, scrapping the new deal.

Some people say that the shadow Chancellor has not only two brains but three brains.

Mr. Stephen O'Brien: At least three brains.

Mr. Clarke: Each thinking a different thing. Those three magisterial brains came together, and the shadow Chancellor made a major keynote speech about the choice that the Conservative party is making about where he is going. That choice means cutting non-school spending. Does it mean cutting 48,000 modern apprenticeships? Does it mean 36,000 fewer social workers working with the most vulnerable children? Does it mean 1,200 fewer Sure Start centres, which would rob 1,000 of the poorest children of the right to life? Does it mean 24,000 fewer lecturers in higher education, which would deny university places to 220,000 students who have the ability to take them up?

The Conservative party should make its policy choices and come clean about them so that the whole country can debate them. The Government's position is that we want better public services; the Tories' position is to call public spending a waste. They say that less money means cuts to budgets and cuts in opportunities.

I shall turn to the famous passport policy. [Interruption.] I am not moving off the question of budget cuts. I am sorry to disappoint Conservative Front Benchers, but I and the whole of the Government will ask the Conservatives at every juncture in relation to every aspect of non-NHS, non-schools expenditure, "Where are the cuts falling? What will you do? How will you deal with it?" We have only to examine the debates in other non-educational fields such as police and defence to see how powerful the issues are. Conservative Members must consider carefully whether the shadow Chancellor has taken the most intelligent course given their party's political strategy.

Mr. Yeo: Why are the Labour Government so opposed to spending as much as we propose on schools? Do they want fewer teachers, fewer classroom assistants, less capital spending on schools or lower salaries for teachers? Is that the reason why the Secretary of State will not participate in the NUT annual conference on Easter Sunday?

Mr. Clarke: I shall be doing better things on Easter Sunday. I must confess that I have not yet decided what better things I shall be doing, but I am sure that they will be better than attending the NUT conference. I greatly admire the hon. Gentleman's courage in spending his Easter in that way.

There has been a to and fro on the serious questions about passporting. On 22 February, the shadow Chancellor stated that the money could be used for "cheap private schools" and that parents could top it up. On 6 March, the Conservative party website confirmed his statement on passporting. On 7 March, it said that the statement on 6 March was an error and that parents could not make up the difference. On 8 March, it stated that parents could use the money to move their child to another state school. On 9 March, the shadow Chancellor once again said that parents could top up for "cheap private schools". On 10 March, there was a victory for the hon. Member for South Suffolk: "Yeo knocks back Letwin" by saying that no parent would be allowed to top up the value of the passport. On 11 March, the shadow Chancellor ruled out using the passport at a fee-paying school and on 16 March, the hon. Member for South Suffolk said that parents could spend the passport in fee-paying schools. Passporting is all over the shop.

I have listened to the hon. Members for South Suffolk and for Westmorland and Lonsdale today, but I wonder what the policy will be tomorrow and what the shadow Chancellor will say tomorrow. Perhaps I can help. I shall ask one or two questions about passporting that the hon. Member for Westmorland and Lonsdale must face up to directly. [Interruption.] I prepared the questions earlier because it is important for the country to try to understand the Conservative party's policies, and a bit of preparation might have served Conservative Members better in this process.

I am sure that the hon. Member for Westmorland and Lonsdale can answer these questions. It is obvious that schools in London and the south-east cost more than those elsewhere. Will the voucher be less valuable in Manchester than in London and the south-east? I look forward to the answer. Will the parents of children with special educational needs or learning difficulties, who can be more expensive to educate, be entitled to a higher value voucher to account for those circumstances? Will parents of children for whom English is a second language be entitled to a higher value voucher? As was asked in an earlier intervention, will the voucher be treated as taxable income so that better-off families can be taxed on its value? Could independent schools refuse to accept a voucher as payment? If any child can take their money to any school, does that mean that admissions policies for schools would be abolished? Will there be open enrolment, however the scheme operates? If every child in an area wants to go to one particular school, how will it house the additional pupils? Will the most popular schools have to use portakabins? Perhaps the hon. Member for Westmorland and Lonsdale will clarify his party's position.

Mr. Collins: To put the matter in context, the Secretary of State went through a long list of discussions, and what I said earlier is the definitive, agreed position. If he really wants to get into a debate about consistency, education policy is not the right area to choose because the Government campaigned on a manifesto pledge not to introduce top-up fees, but they are legislating to do the opposite of what they promised.

I replied to the earlier intervention about children with special educational needs, which is an example that makes our point, not the Secretary of State's. Children who have a statement of special educational needs—the most vulnerable, disadvantaged and needy children in our society—already effectively have a statement with a value that entitles them to resources. In other words, if it is good enough for the most vulnerable children and it works for them, let us extend the same philosophical approach to all parents and all schools. Why are he and his colleagues afraid of giving parents choice?

Mr. Clarke: A staggering intervention. If the hon. Gentleman had had a chance to read our White Paper on special education, which we published two or three weeks ago, he would have seen a detailed analysis of the many children who have special educational needs and learning difficulties, only a relatively small proportion of whom have statements. They are, as the hon. Gentleman rightly says, usually those who have the most serious learning difficulties, although not always. The implication of what he says is that all those children with a wide range of special educational needs should have a statement with money attached to it that follows them. That is an amazing development of policy and would go against everything that Members on both sides of the House are trying to achieve, in a bipartisan way, on special educational needs.

Chris Grayling: Given the fact that the Secretary of State is a member of a Government who will introduce a system of patient choice in health care that will allow patients to carry a block of money around the health service with them to use at a location of their choice, why is he opposed to extending the same principles to the education system?

Mr. Clarke: We are not at all opposed to the principle that parents should choose their schools—[HON. MEMBERS: "Oh!"] No, the overwhelming majority of parents get their first choice school now, and that is right. However, an important principle behind what we do—and I would hope that the Conservatives were ready to commit to it—is the provision of excellent extended schools, with children's centres, in every community and neighbourhood in Britain. That is the way forward.

We have had some partisan exchanges, but I wish to make it clear that through the settlement that my right hon. Friend the Chancellor announced yesterday, the Government will make a profound, long-term commitment to developing education from the cradle to the grave. That is what we are about—for children, for schools, for skills, for further education, for higher education—in the deep belief that that is the way towards economic strength for our country. We have major differences with the Conservatives, but the biggest difference is the complete lack of clarity with which they address the issue except on one point—they will not make the commitment to investment that this Government will make. That will be the choice facing the electorate at the general election. I am certain that at the general election we will be in a position to gain the support of the people of this country for the long-term investment that we all so strongly need.

2.12 pm

Mr. David Rendel (Newbury) (LD): It has been a fascinating debate so far. We have had a speech from the Conservative spokesman in which he was determined to prove that the Labour Government's policies were now identical to Conservative policies, followed by a speech from the Secretary of State in which he was determined to prove that those policies were rubbish. That leads to an interesting logical conclusion about the Government's policies and their view of them, but I shall move on.

I apologise sincerely on behalf of my hon. Friend the Member for Harrogate and Knaresborough (Mr. Willis), who is sorry not to be here this afternoon. He would have liked to make the points that I shall make in due course, but those who attended Education and Skills questions will have realised that his voice has again almost disappeared. He sounds like a ghost, and I have had to act as his nursemaid and send him back to Harrogate to try to recover as quickly as he can.

This year's Budget statement as it affects education is unusual in that it has received a cautious but supportive response from almost all education commentators, with the exception of Conservative Front Benchers who, I assume, are deeply worried about how much additional cash they will have to find to give all students in private schools a £5,500 voucher. Indeed, I wonder how they intend to find the £2 billion extra to fund their free tuition policy in higher education—

Mr. McCabe: On a point of order, Madam Deputy Speaker. I apologise to the hon. Member for Newbury (Mr. Rendel) for interrupting him, but I wish to clarify a point with you. I noticed that when hon. Members rose to catch your eye, the hon. Member for Epsom and Ewell (Chris Grayling) also rose. My understanding is that he is the shadow higher education spokesman, as he certainly was when he and I took part in a debate the other evening. Is it in order for the Conservatives to use the shadow higher education spokesman in that way in this debate?

Madam Deputy Speaker: As I understand it, the hon. Gentleman is eligible to speak in this debate, if he catches my eye.

Mr. Sheerman: Further to that point of order, Madam Deputy Speaker. In the years that I have been in the House, I have never seen a performance like it by the Opposition. They have so few Members in the Chamber that they subject the House to the absurdity of people running, as if they were in a Feydeau farce, from Front to Back Benches. Conservative Front Benchers receive a large amount of Short money to pay for their private office. Is Short money now going to Back Benchers? If so, I would like some. [Interruption.]

Madam Deputy Speaker: Order. I am responding to that point of order. I have already said that anyone who catches my eye will be eligible to speak in this debate.

Mr. Rendel: If that carries on, this will be one of the longest speeches I have made, but I hope that we will have fewer interruptions from now on.

As I was saying, I would be interested to know how the Conservative party intends to fund the extra £2 billion that it will need for its free tuition policy. We have, of course, explained how we would do that. The Conservatives also need an extra £1 billion to provide the skills training for the army of plumbers that they regularly promise us.

Let us get back to reality. The Liberal Democrats cautiously welcome what, on the surface, appears to be a good deal for the majority of the UK's education system. My hon. Friend made that point earlier. Certainly, the global figures showing a rise in total spending from £59 billion this year to £77 billion in 2007–08 are impressive, but what most sectors want to hear from the Secretary of State is how the resources will be allocated and what strings will be attached to spending. In the past, the strings have caused all the difficulty, especially for schools.

It is also important that alongside the seemingly dramatic reduction in the Department's staff—some 30 per cent. by 2008—we see a commensurate reduction in the targets, initiatives and ministerial interference that have bedevilled our education system since 1997. It would be a good start if the Secretary of State were to cancel his plans for the Office for Fair Access before they got off the ground. That is one expense that the HE sector could well do without.

[Mr. Rendel]

The Liberal Democrats welcome the continued real-terms investment in education and broadly agree with the Government's priorities. The extension of pre-school education and the roll-out of children's centres to the 20 per cent. most deprived wards by 2008 are welcome, but 80 per cent. of the nation will still be without a centre. In particular, rural areas will be largely ignored. Indeed, given the high-profile speeches by the Prime Minister and the Secretary of State at last year's Labour party conference about the need to put early years education before further investment in higher education, the response in the Budget appears to lack the resources to match the rhetoric. We should compare the additional £669 million to be spent on early years education with the extravagant and ill-targeted funding of the children's trust fund. Scrapping that fund, as the Liberal Democrats would do, would save the £1 billion to be spent on the Chancellor's gimmick between now and 2008. How many more children's centres could be established for that money, and how much greater would be the impact on our most vulnerable children, for whom we should care the most?

Talking of vulnerable children, where is the commitment in the Budget to support the outcomes from the Children Bill? Successive crises in child protection have pointed to severe resource deprivation, the failure to train and retain staff and the inability of local authorities to make appropriate physical support available when it is most needed. Child protection must not be compromised, as care for the elderly has been, by the fluctuation of local authority budgets. The scale of change envisaged by the Children Bill requires not one-off resources but secure funding from the Government in the longer term. Perhaps when he sums up, the Minister might say whether he envisages that the local safeguarding children boards proposed in the Bill will be funded directly through the Department for Education and Skills, like Ofsted, in order to give them independence and allow them to fulfil their scrutiny functions more effectively.

The Liberal Democrats welcome the continued investment in our schools. It would be unfair to ignore the considerable additional resources that have been promised for the coming comprehensive spending review, but it has to be said that schools have been here before. The current CSR was expected to provide riches beyond belief but, rather like the emperor's new clothes, many schools found that the increases were illusionary. Last year, many of the new resources simply went to fund Treasury or Department-inspired inflationary increases. The changes to pensions, national insurance and the standards fund all took money from baseline budgets, making it increasingly difficult to manage change at an individual school level, as many schools found to their cost.

The Budget, however, again makes much of Government-initiated spending despite the claim of getting more money to schools. Another 1,000 specialist schools will require revenue support to the tune of £500 million, which, when added to the current programme, means considerably less to distribute to the remaining non-specialist schools. There is no mention of how much is to be earmarked for the new academies movement or of the impact that publicly funded independent schools will have on the secondary school sector. There is no reference to the moves by the Secretary of State to allow for-profit schools to enter the marketplace. In winding-up, perhaps the Minister will tell the House what discussions there have been with Sunny Varkey about his plans to provide for-profit, independent school education at the cost of average state-funded education. Perhaps the Minister will explain what the difference would be between such a policy and that proposed by the Tories for vouchers to spend in the independent sector.

At this point my notes, which were calmly passed on by my hon. Friend the Member for Harrogate and Knaresborough, say:

"Having spent much of my time as a head teacher bemoaning the state of school buildings".

Unfortunately, I have not spent any time as a head teacher, so I shall pass over that.

Mr. Sheerman: If the hon. Gentleman moves to the next paragraph—I know the hon. Member for Harrogate and Knaresborough—he will probably find that it says, "Now, you're on your own."

Mr. Rendel: Luckily, I have read through what my hon. Friend offered me, and I know that it does not say that. However, the hon. Gentleman may well have been right; it could have said that.

My hon. Friend said that, as a head teacher, he had often bemoaned the state of school buildings. He wanted to place on record—I echo this—his and our party's appreciation of the continued investment in refurbishment and in new school buildings. Many of us have seen that in our constituencies.

Mr. Paul Tyler (North Cornwall) (LD): Does my hon. Friend agree that an awful lot of the pilot projects under the school building improvement scheme are now being undertaken in urban areas and that there is no rural equivalent? That is extremely unfortunate, and echoes his earlier comment about the extent to which deprived areas and rural communities do not seem to receive the same support as the major cities.

Mr. Rendel: I assume that those on the Government Front Bench will have taken on board that remark with reference particularly to Cornwall. I have no doubt that it is true for a number of other rural areas.

Mr. Mark Todd (South Derbyshire) (Lab): It is fortunate that the hon. Gentleman allowed an intervention from his colleague, because I can disagree and say that rural schools in South Derbyshire have particularly benefited over the past few years. Does he accept that the considerable success that his colleague has prompted me to repeat was based on the new deal funding mechanism that the Liberal Democrats opposed?

Mr. Rendel: As I remember it, my party opposed not the new deal but the way in which it was funded, which was through a special tax at the time. We certainly supported the new deal itself. I could also answer the hon. Gentleman's intervention by pointing out to Ministers that it appears that there is now a serious reason for moving some funding from South Derbyshire to Cornwall, which is clearly where the need now is. If Members from the south Derbyshire area feel that they have had plenty, perhaps some of the money could be moved to other areas. No doubt, that would be very welcome.

We continue to have reservations about the private finance initiative as the preferred and, sadly, often the only method of procurement. However, that should not diminish our support for the ambitious plans to rebuild or refurbish all our secondary schools by 2015. Our concerns, however, are that, by designing the schools of tomorrow to meet the needs of today, we may be in danger of building in obsolescence. The Tomlinson reforms, the 16-to-19 curriculum, the national skills strategy and the concept of lifelong learning should make us stop and ask, "What is the vision we are trying to accommodate?" We should not simply build on the basis of today's requirements. In 15 years' time, it will not be a case of removing surplus places; it will be a case of trying to decide what use redundant buildings locked into long-term PFI contracts can be put to. We will not be able simply to get rid of those buildings.

What surprised the Liberal Democrats about the Budget statement and the Secretary of State's comments today is the fact that our secondary schools continue to be viewed separately from the further education sector, the skills sector and the higher education sector. When Government policy is rightly demanding that all those come out of their silos and work together, why plan future secondary provision in isolation? When overall capital investment in education is to rise from £6 billion to £8.1 billion by 2008, why are we not seeking to look at investment in the FE sector alongside investment in secondary schools?

By 2008, some 200,000 14 to 16-year-olds will be using the training environment of our colleges as their classrooms, and those same facilities will be providing for the majority of the 16 to 18-year-olds in full-time or part-time education, as well as delivering the skills training for a significant proportion of the adult work force. How can the Secretary of State justify a capital investment programme in our schools that is 10 times more generous than that in our colleges? Surely the time has come to extend what some would describe as an "architectural adventure fund" from our schools to the FE colleges. Given that we are about to see a far closer interchange of staff between schools and the FE colleges teaching 14 to 19-year-olds, it is surely about time that the Secretary of State announced a timetable to close the unacceptable gap in funding between the sectors.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Education and Skills (Mr. Ivan Lewis): Will the hon. Gentleman clarify yet more spending commitments from the Liberal Democrats? He wants us not just to narrow but to close the funding gap between the pay of teachers in schools and the pay of teachers in colleges. He also wants us not only to invest significantly in capital for schools and colleges, but to go even further and dramatically expand the amount of capital spent on colleges. I thought that it was the whole basis of the position taken by the leader of the Liberal Democrats that they would make no additional spending commitments other than those that appear in the letters that he is exchanging with the Prime Minister. Can the hon. Gentleman clear up why the Liberal Democrats keep alluding to aspirations and pretending to people outside the House that they can deliver utopia?

Mr. Rendel: I do not think that I was promising utopia; I do not remember using that word. I was suggesting that there should be a fairer allocation of the funds available between the different sectors. The Government seem to be preparing to give all the money to the school sector. They are not prepared to treat all the sectors as one and as part of education as a whole.

Helen Jones rose—

Mr. Sheerman rose—

Mr. Rendel: I have answered that point. I now want to make a bit of progress.

Mr. Sheerman: I am genuinely trying to assist.

Mr. Rendel: It is kind of the hon. Gentleman to offer, but I have dealt with that point.

We know that there has been an historic battle between the Department for Education and Skills and the Chancellor over who should deliver the new skills strategy. We welcome the extension of the employer training pilots, but surely the role of colleges also warrants a proper mention. After all, that sector educates or trains 4 million people each year, and more 16 to 18-year-olds study in it than in our schools. It provides 200 million training days to industry each year and, while helping 300,000 adults to gain basic literacy and numeracy skills, provides our universities with 43 per cent. of their higher education students. Therefore we have to ask why, compared with schools, it has been ignored in the Budget.

The Secretary of State is, of course, right to point to the new deal for skills announced in the Budget and the commitment to provide level 2 training to any adult in or out of work. However, that is an old promise, which the FE sector could deliver now, but is being prevented from doing so by Government restrictions. The Association of Colleges, which is hardly at the forefront of educational militancy, warned in November that 70,000 courses would have to go this year and that thousands of people would be denied the training and education that they needed and deserved. If the new deal for skills is to work, it must be backed by a cast-iron guarantee of resources. When the Secretary of State reveals the content of the Department for Education and Skills resource budget, I hope that the FE sector will receive that commitment.

It would be difficult for me to conclude my remarks without referring to the current problems being created by the Government in higher education. Given the huge investment in the education system and the £20 billion-worth of savings expected by 2008 through manpower reductions in Government Departments, why on earth are the Secretary of State and the Government still determined to push through their HE funding reforms? The amount needed is pitiful in comparison with the amount being spread around in the Budget. Of course I welcome the extra funding for higher education and the commitment that fee income will be genuinely additional; I only hope that the Government manage to stick to that, because that did not happen after tuition fees were introduced. Are we as a nation saying that we are so desperate for what will be less than £500 million of net additional income that it is worth plunging the whole sector into a divisive marketplace in which there will be few winners and possibly a great many losers? The variable fees that are expected to be introduced are guaranteed to make it more difficult for those from poorer backgrounds to go to the most prestigious universities—it will not be worthwhile for them to do that.

Are the Secretary of State and the Chancellor so consumed with their new market dogma that they are ignoring all the problems associated with the policy? The Secretary of State's advisers have warned him that fear of debt will deter students from entering higher education. He knows as well as I do that this year's figures for applicants already show that there are fewer applicants to university than would be expected in that cohort, even given the current level of fees.

The Secretary of State appears not to have calculated the impact on wider society of the actual debt that graduates will bear when they enter the workplace. I readily concede that the annual repayment of student debt—even at the income level of £21,000 that was conceded by the Minister for Lifelong Learning, Further and Higher Education—will be income contingent. It will be income contingent in terms of annual payments, but not in terms of what must be paid in the long run, of course. However, the total tax and national insurance take for even modest salaries in the low £20,000s will still be 42 per cent. The figure will climb to 50 per cent. for incomes over £35,000, despite the fact that the Government tell us that it would be irresponsible and unacceptable for such a rate to apply to incomes over £100,000.

Those same graduates will be attempting to enter the housing market, which, according to a recent International Monetary Fund report, is currently overvalued by between 30 and 35 per cent. Graduates represent the vast majority of first-time buyers, and they are entering the housing market some five years later than they did a decade ago. The only way in which teachers, nurses and other public sector graduates can purchase a home is by taking on mortgages that are several times greater than their annual salary. Given their disposable income, how does the Secretary of State expect the majority of graduates, especially those who live in the south-east, to purchase a home at all? Traditionally, they form the largest part of the first-time buyer market and recently, the number of first-time buyers has fallen rapidly. Last week, I asked the Prime Minister what effect he thought that would have on the housing market, but he did not even attempt to answer my question. When the Paymaster General winds up the debate, will she tell us what effect the fall in first-time buyers, which is caused by a change to the amount that they may borrow, will have on the housing market? There is a significant chance that a collapse in the housing market might begin in the next few years and that that will be caused by a rapid reduction in the number of first-time buyers.

There is a great deal for education in this week's Budget, and Liberal Democrats applaud the Government for ignoring the calls of other parties to abandon steady, prolonged investment in education. My party does not denigrate what is on offer, but we want better use of the resources available. We look forward to engaging in the debate when the comprehensive spending review is announced in the summer.

2.34 pm

Mr. Barry Sheerman (Huddersfield) (Lab/Co-op): The debate has been interesting so far. One or two things have been said that touch on my role as Chairman of the Select Committee on Education and Skills—I had to say this during the previous debate on education in which Conservative Members raised the matter. I know of nothing in the Standing Orders, procedures or traditions of the House that suggests that an hon. Member should become a political neuter when taking over the chairmanship of a Select Committee. I take unkindly and badly to Opposition Members saying that I should not be partisan in my remarks about where former Ministers and shadow Ministers send their children for their education.

I have never believed that a Select Committee Chairman should be neutral. My job is to scrutinise the Executive and, with my Committee, to do a sound job of calling the Government to account. If anyone wants to scrutinise my role as a Select Committee Chairman or examine evidence such as the kind of questioning that Ministers get or the reports that my Committee makes, I hope that they will read the reports and then, perhaps, apologise. I apologise to no one in the House for having a strong opinion on this.

Mr. Mark Field: When the Select Committee conducts further analysis of the Higher Education Bill, I hope that its Chairman will make it plain that the Government should have absolutely no truck with the idea of discriminating against university students on the basis of which school they attended.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Order. The debate is on the Budget, not the Higher Education Bill.

Mr. Sheerman: I shall come to that point a little later. If the hon. Gentleman reads the Select Committee's commentary on the White Paper on higher education, he will find strong criticisms of the Government's policy—not on top-up fees, but on their focus on investment in research at too few institutions. Will he please read the report before drawing conclusions?

Mr. Greg Knight (East Yorkshire) (Con): Knowing the hon. Gentleman as I do, I would not suggest for one moment that he be non-partisan, but will he at least be fair? He made reference earlier to the number of Conservative Members in the Chamber. Is it not the case that he is currently the only Labour Back Bencher in the Chamber?

Mr. Sheerman: I believe that to be so. I think back to the wonderful debate that we had on top-up fees when the Chamber was absolutely packed and the atmosphere was electric. I wish that my colleagues and the right hon.

Gentleman's colleagues were here. I must say in passing that the opening part of the debate looked rather like a Feydeau farce: people who were sitting on the Opposition Front Bench suddenly moved to the Back Benches; people were running about; and people who I have never seen on the Opposition Front Bench suddenly appeared there, meaning that my speech must be littered with congratulations to such people as the hon. Member for Lichfield (Michael Fabricant) on their appointments. I agree with the right hon. Member for East Yorkshire (Mr. Knight) that we want more people to be present, on both sides of the Chamber.

May I get on with the main part of my speech? I have never made any criticism of the Government's passion for education and their commitment to that as a priority. This is the first time in the history of this country that we have a Government who ran on such a clear and simple manifesto: education three times. [Interruption.] It gets more interesting, Madam Deputy Speaker.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Order. Perhaps we can return to the substance of the debate.

Mr. Sheerman: Shall we all start again, Madam Deputy Speaker?

Never in my time in the House has there been a Government with such a clear commitment to education as their highest priority over a four-year term. They repeated in 2001 that education was their highest priority. [Interruption.] I must say that I was very happy—[Laughter.] I was very happy yesterday when I heard the Chancellor's—

Mr. Julian Brazier (Canterbury) (Con): I think that the hon. Gentleman has had a good lunch.

Mr. Sheerman: Madam Deputy Speaker, I must have an apology.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Order. Perhaps the hon. Member for Canterbury (Mr. Brazier) would like to make an apology.

Mr. Brazier: The remark was made in the same spirit of jest as that which we have had for several minutes since the start of the hon. Gentleman's speech.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Order. Will the hon. Gentleman confirm that he is withdrawing the comment?

Mr. Brazier: Yes, the comment was made in a spirit of jest, hence I withdraw it.

Mr. Sheerman: We have a Government committed to education and it was good to hear in the Chancellor's Budget speech yesterday that science, education and enterprise will have priority in future Government spending.

I, like one or two other hon. Members, was at a recent seminar at the London School of Economics addressed by Larry Summers, a former Treasury Secretary in the previous American Administration, now the president of Harvard university. He was asked whether there was any particular ingredient in the relationship between the developed economies, such as Britain, France, Germany and the United States, and their future economic success in a world of great economic competition, which would allow us to maintain the creation of wealth and the lifestyle of our people. We were discussing the fact that the economies of China, India, Brazil and Mexico were growing much faster than we had thought, and world competition was much greater than ever before. Larry Summers' response was that all the research points to such success depending on the number of people who are educated and skilled to a high level and retained in the economy in appropriate clusters. Hon. Members should be conscious of those words. The decisions that we make in these few years will determine how qualified and expert our people are in meeting that international competition and creating the wealth that we need to create.

Chris Grayling: The hon. Gentleman makes an extremely serious point, but does he agree that on tertiary education, the Department's own figures show that Britain has a higher level of both participation and graduation in higher education than any other G7 country, but in the case of vocational skills and further education we fall down, and therefore the balance of resource and effort should go into strengthening that part of our education system rather than necessarily pushing for the 50 per cent. participation rate that the Government are pursuing?

Mr. Sheerman: Yes and no, and I shall come to that in a moment.

We have had some great education successes. The Government's expenditure during the past seven or eight years speaks for itself. There has been a massive investment in education at every level. I was surprised that in his opening speech the hon. Member for Westmorland and Lonsdale (Mr. Collins) made no reference at all to early years education. Most Labour Members believe that the greatest injustice to our people historically has been the inability to give people from poorer backgrounds a fair chance of obtaining the education that their potential deserves. During more than 150 years of public education in Britain, such people have had less chance of a decent education and less opportunity to push their potential to the full. That is the reason for the anger and the passion—which we feel in equal measure—that motivates us. Some Opposition Members will share that feeling too. However, the fact is that many British citizens have never had the opportunity of an education and the acquisition of proper skills to make the most of their lives and their talents. That is usually what is at the heart of what the Labour Government believe in.

If we believe in research-driven policy, as most of the time the Government do, research shows that to break that cycle of underachievement and poverty the earlier we invest the better. Those who have visited the Sure Start programme, as members of the Select Committee and others have done, know what a difference that makes. We know what a good investment it is in terms of the national treasure. Billions of pounds are being focused on where it matters—getting through to the woman who is pregnant and her partner; getting through to people at an early age; and teaching people that stimulation in the first weeks and months of life is vital to the development of a child's potential.

Helen Jones: Does my hon. Friend agree that investment in early years education is not only vital for the individual, but saves money in the school system, because many of the problems that we see later in the education system, particularly in secondary school, can be traced back to lack of intervention in the early years?

Mr. Sheerman: My hon. Friend is right. Any sensible person knows that a pound invested early on is much the best investment. Much more money has to be spent later on trying to make up for the deficiencies of the system. My hon. Friend serves on the Education and Skills Committee and she knows of the interesting seminar that we held on prison education only last week when that became startlingly clear. Prisons pick up the worst cases of those who have lost out on education and skills and the development of their potential. The evidence was that it costs £37,000 a year to keep someone in prison, which I believe is even more than the fees at Eton. Investment early on is crucial. Therefore, I was rather worried that the Opposition spokesman never mentioned early years education.

The Select Committee's first inquiry under my chairmanship was into early years education—nought to eight. All the evidence that we took showed that that was the area that deserved the most investment, and that is what we recommended. That is the area that has had the most investment, and that has to be applauded. That does not mean to say that everything in early years education has been right. It does not mean that everything that we have considered has been the best expenditure possible.

I would query the roll-out of the Sure Start programme only in the 20 per cent. of poorest wards in the country. That is not a sufficiently sophisticated way of identifying where poverty occurs. Poverty is not so simply tracked down. There can be deep pockets of poverty in wards that otherwise do not show in the national statistics, and the Government have dragged their feet in coming to terms with that challenge. That is one part of my disappointment in some of the reactions that they had to the recommendations in the Select Committee's report—but let us put that on hold for the moment. Early years education is a good investment. I would be churlish not to welcome the news that there will be children's centres in the 20 per cent. poorest wards, but I would still reiterate my plea to refine that identification of where poverty is at its worst.

I have something of a reputation for teasing, in a light-hearted way, Ministers who come before my Committee, and I sometimes refer to their headquarters, the education nerve centre, as the Eden project, so when I am told that there will be a 31 per cent. reduction in headquarters' staff by 2008, I am pleased. I believe that there can be slimming down. However, in all fairness I meet a wide range of civil servants from the Department and I am extremely impressed by their quality. Most people who have been in the House for some time and who deal with many departmental civil servants know that the quality does vary, but the quality of staff in the Department for Education and Skills usually impresses me.

At the time when I was a university teacher, a previous Conservative Administration who wanted to reduce the numbers of university teachers gave out generous redundancy payments in order to slim down their number. That was seen as an opportunity to weed out the weaker brethren. However, the result was that some of the brightest and the best in the academic community queued up for retirement at 50 and went off to become professors in the United States, highly paid consultants, or visiting professors going hither and thither, while some of its weakest members hung on to their jobs like grim death. It is all very well to suggest that 31 per cent. should go, but we must ensure that it is the right 31 per cent. and that good civil servants who have served this country well are redeployed in a positive way that enhances their live and professional contributions.

I want to say a few words about school buildings. On the whole, I agree with the hon. Member for Newbury (Mr. Rendel), who worries that too much money is flowing into school rebuilding and refurbishment and wonders whether some of it could go into the further education sector. However, he did not mention the substantial increase—I think it is 19 per cent.—in its funding. By and large, those of us who care very much about the FE sector will be happy about yesterday's announcements and this afternoon's speech by the Secretary of State.

Although it is nice to hear that every school in the country can be refurbished or rebuilt, I am concerned that a recent Audit Commission report says that the standard of design of some new-build schools is not what it should be. I have a long-standing interest in design and good architecture, as well as a great interest in the environment. As we rebuild our nation's schools and hospitals, we should take this opportunity to do it well—to ensure that they are sustainable and of high quality. How many of us who live in this damp and rainy climate of ours have visited schools with flat roofs through which, usually about five years after they are built, water starts to pour? That makes one ask a number of questions. Who is the architect who built it? Which local education authority commissioned it? Why was it not built with a proper roof? Why was it not built sustainably so that it did not use up too much energy?

In that context, I recommend the work of the Sorrell Foundation. John Sorrell and his wife are doing a great deal of work on joined-up design by trying to involve children and staff in designing their own schools. The Select Committee recently visited several schools, not only in England but in Northern Ireland and the Irish Republic, where it was evident that early involvement of staff and students in the design process results in a much better design than one gets from leaving it all to some architect who takes it off the shelf as a standard, or slightly modified, design.

I urge the Minister to be conscious, at this period in our history, that when schools are being rebuilt they need to last for a long time. I am pleased that we will have schools that are fit for the 21st century and in which people can learn in a decent environment. We have waited a long time for that, so let us do it properly by emphasising good design and good build. As the Economic Secretary is in his place, I point out to him that the Audit Commission criticised public-private partnership design as being marginally worse than traditional public sector education authority build. We must learn from that and ensure that that problem is remedied.

The Government promise 1,000 specialist schools. The Select Committee's report on diversity and specialist schools, which was published about a year ago, was rather critical in that respect. We asked where, given that the Government are supposed to believe in evidence-based policy, was the evidence that specialist schools deliver higher achievement and better standards; we noted that all our research suggested that there was no such evidence, and that it was too early to tell whether there was a convincing case that specialism alone produces better results; and we asked the Government to look carefully at whether that was the case.

As the hon. Member for Westmorland and Lonsdale said, the policy has a history. It can be tracked through to the present day from the city technology colleges that were introduced by Kenneth Baker, now Lord Baker, when he was Education Secretary. There is nothing wrong in principle with cross-party agreement, which can often be achieved on education policy, in particular. We thought that we had all-party agreement, even from the Liberal Democrats, when we signed up to the recommendations of the Dearing committee, which we believed to be good news for the future of higher education. Later on, the Liberal Democrats changed their tune. I respect their position, although I disagree with it, but the change of view by the Conservatives revealed the bankruptcy of their higher education policy.

Having visited schools that have won specialist status—there are now many of them—the atmosphere seems to have improved in general, but there are more problems with some specialisms than others. I sometimes worry whether the Department is keeping a close enough eye on the mix in any given local education area. It is no good a large number of schools going for the same specialism. When the Select Committee visited Birmingham, we saw examples of collegiate schools that co-operate with each other. That system was the idea of Tim Brighouse, an adviser to the Department on schools in London. I hope that someone in the Department is ensuring that schools in, for example, a commuting area, or around some geographical focus, complement each other. We do not want them all to specialise in sports, IT or languages—they should offer a range of specialisms that give local students a much better choice.

I have some concerns about academies. I know that they are the Prime Minister's favourite thing. Of all the toys in the box, the little model of the academy is his favourite. He takes it out regularly and polishes it because he likes it so much. What worries me about academies—the Committee has not looked at them in depth, so this is a personal view—is the degree of public accountability that goes with them. As far as I can see, there is massive public expenditure on an academy, which is a school in the public sector but independent of the local education authority. At the same time, although that school has in the main been created with public money, the generous benefactor who perhaps puts in £3 million or £4 million of a total budget of £35 million has enormous influence on it. I am therefore concerned about the public accountability of academies, and I can tell my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State for Education and Skills and my hon. Friend the Economic Secretary to the Treasury that the Select Committee will return to that matter and scrutinise it.

That is not to say that some of the academies that I have seen, or that have been proposed, might not be marvellous agents of the regeneration of deprived communities. I am willing to be convinced that academies are the answer in certain situations and areas where other initiatives have failed, and I am happy to consider them.

To return to my opening remarks, a Select Committee Chairman, although not politically neutral, has with the Committee a responsibility to evaluate evidence fairly, objectively and pragmatically. I hope that I have given a fair impression of our work on specialist schools and academies, and we will keep a careful brief on them.

Turning to 16 to 18-year-olds, two matters have made me feel cheerful about education this week. One was yesterday's Budget statement, and the other was the Prime Minister's speech to the Labour party conference in Manchester, because I have been for a long time a one-person lobby for a real school leaving age of 18. It is a disgrace in Britain in the 21st century that children—I count 16-year-olds as children—are allowed to go to work in rotten, menial jobs with no training, education or guarantee of any further career development. In this day, that is a scandal. I have believed for a long time that the real school leaving age should be 18, although that is not to say that I want every child to be in a conventional school until they are 18.

I welcome what the Chancellor and the Prime Minister have said about a real school leaving age of 18. However, I have read the words of yesterday's statement carefully and they say that young people will be offered the opportunity to have education or training through to 18. I hope that we can push the Government to say that it will be against the law to employ any child aged 16 to 18 in this country without education or training being bound into the contract of employment. That is not wishing for too much. In a modern civilised society, in which we believe that the future lies in the education of our people, a Labour Government should give that guarantee to every child in the country. No more children should enter the labour market at 16 without a guarantee of further education and training. I am absolutely convinced that that is the right thing for the future. If the Ministers will go one step further on that, they will make me even happier than I have been during the past few days.

I want to finish by commenting on skills, and I shall tell the House a little story. I have said that there were very few people in the Chamber at the start of this debate, and that it would be lovely to have the numbers here that we had during our exciting debate on top-up fees. Was it not wonderful, however, that education—higher education, indeed—was at that time on the front page of every newspaper and the lead item on the news? As Chairman of the Education and Skills Committee, I thought that it was wonderful that we were having an intelligent debate on what higher education meant for our country and what Government and Opposition proposals would mean for the future of education in our country. I have never, during my time in the House or in politics, seen an education debate have such prominence, and it gladdened my heart.

However, things are different now that the Select Committee is having a major inquiry into skills. At every debate, discussion and interview session that we held during our higher education inquiry, the television was there, the Press Gallery was full, and after we had finished the journalists were waiting outside in the Committee Corridor. As soon as we turn to skills, however, there is no television and very often no radio present, and there is hardly a journalist to be seen. I know that my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary believes, as do I, that it is in skills that we are most deficient. I agree with the Liberal Democrat point on that. By and large, we have seen nice, steady progress in higher education, with more and more people entering it. We have seen some progress in skills, but not nearly enough. Too many people are still underskilled or unskilled, and it is appalling that they do not have the appropriate skills to survive in this country in the 21st century.

I shall give the House an example that I have given many times. We all get carried away with the idea of 50 per cent. of people entering higher education, but in the average constituency today, only 16 per cent. go into higher education. That leaves 84 per cent. to be other things: not only plumbers and electricians, but all the highly sophisticated technicians who run our local government and hospitals, right across the board, as well as our private sector industries. We need those people to be highly educated and trained, although not necessarily to degree level. That is where we have been lacking.

There have been some Government initiatives in that field, such as sector skills councils, and I can now see something positive shaping up in the Learning and Skills Council, after some disappointments in the early years. I hope that its new chairman will be as good as the outgoing one—I have a lot of time for what Bryan Sanderson did in the LSC in its early years. However, the fact of the matter is that it is in skills that we have a real challenge, because we have not done as well as we could.

The Select Committee is conducting a major inquiry into skills, and we are uncovering an enormous muddle, even today. I recently went with the Engineering Construction Industry Training Board to Thomas Broadbent, a 150-year-old small-to-medium engineering company in my constituency, to meet a group of other employers. They said that they found the complexity of our training and skills system in the Yorkshire and Humber region so complex that they did not want anything to do with it. That involves not only sector skills councils, which those employers have not yet come to terms with and do not really understand, but the regional development agency, which is involved in a whole number of working parties and working groups; the regional assembly, which already has two or three cross-cutting bodies working on skills; and the Government office for the region. There are so many groups with cross-cutting meetings that the representative from the training board said that if he went to half of the meetings that he was supposed to go to he would never do anything else, such as talk to the employers in the engineering industry—an important industry that, let us not forget, still employs 1.7 million people in our country.

When we really get our hooks into skills delivery in a region—I hope that I can persuade my colleagues that that region will be Yorkshire and Humber—we will have good evidence to give to Ministers on how to cut through some of that complex system, which does no one any good. I hope that the present proposals can be pared down so that everyone can understand just where we are going on skills.

Michael Fabricant (Lichfield) (Con): Does the hon. Gentleman agree that there is a real problem getting young people to enter engineering and science? One of the great difficulties is motivating people to explore education in those fields. Will he join me in paying tribute to the Engineering and Technology Board, and will he invite it to give evidence to the Select Committee on its work in trying to persuade young people to enter engineering and science, and to become technicians, whom he also mentioned earlier?

Mr. Sheerman: I should be very happy to invite members of the board to give evidence.

I have spoken for some time, and I should like to conclude by making one more appeal to the Government. I am going to end on a high note by saying "thank you very much" for a proposal that I first saw emerging as a recommendation, and which I have seen being extensively evaluated because it is expensive. I am referring to the educational maintenance allowances. The Government have made the decision to spend the money where it counts: on pre-school, and on big increases right through infant, junior and secondary schools. They have made the hard decision that although they are going to expand higher education, it will not get as much as the earlier years provision. We know that 90 per cent. of those who get to the age of 18 and get their qualifications will go into higher education. It is too late then. Good research evidence shows that most kids from poorer backgrounds drop out between the ages of 16 and 18. Educational maintenance allowances have been properly evaluated and they are wonderful, but they are only available in one third of the country. I want them to be available in 100 per cent. of the country. As soon as we have an announcement that EMAs will be rolled out right across the country, I shall be delighted.

Mr. Ivan Lewis: They will be.

Mr. Sheerman: Well, I hear that that might be the case. Will my hon. Friend give the House a copper-bottomed guarantee of that?

Mr. Lewis: I am more than delighted to make the announcement today that we will be rolling out educational maintenance allowances for 16-year-olds from September and to 17 and 18-year-olds the following year. They will be available universally for young people from low-income families.

Mr. Sheerman: Well, there is nothing more copper-bottomed than that.

I have had a real opportunity today to range around some of the subjects that the Select Committee has looked at. There are issues on which we agree with the Government and others on which we disagree. I think that we have fairly pointed out the Government's deficiencies, and commented on the positive elements of their policies. In the true tradition of a Select Committee, we have tried to ensure that we scrutinise the Executive and hold them to account. That is our job, and it is a great pleasure for me to be doing that in the Education and Skills Committee during this Government.

3.12 pm

Sir Michael Spicer (West Worcestershire) (Con): Mention has been made today of the paucity of attendance on both sides of the House. In that context, I cannot resist putting it on record that the Liberal Democrats have had absolutely nobody on their Back Benches throughout the whole of our second debate on the Budget. I suppose that that is because making figures add up nationally is not their special interest.

Mr. Rendel: I am not sure whether the hon. Gentleman was here when I started my speech, but I did point out that, unfortunately, our Front-Bench spokesperson was ill today and was therefore unable to be here.

Sir Michael Spicer: I was here all the time. I was talking about the Liberals' Back Benches, which have been green and empty throughout. The hon. Gentleman has sat there like a palm tree in a desert for the whole debate.

Mr. Rendel: I am not on the Back Bench.

Sir Michael Spicer: No, the hon. Gentleman is on the Front Bench. But the fact is that there has been absolutely nobody from the Liberal party here to support him, which is very sad for him.

I want to make most of my remarks on the economy in general, and on the Chancellor's speech yesterday. Before I do that, however, as we are focusing on education, perhaps I could make a couple of points on education finance. I am amazed that the Government have not used the opportunity of the Budget to readjust the area cost adjustment formula, which provides money to local education authorities. This argument has carried on for many years. We were debating the issue even when I was at the then Department of the Environment. It is not new. Every time I have gone to see Ministers about it, I have said that it is a subjective formula. Attempts are sometimes made to attach some kind of spurious science to it, but it is subjective. That is why we get comparable authorities having very different area cost adjustments. That is particularly unfair in the case of Worcestershire, where we come out of it very badly. I would like to use this opportunity to make a plea to Finance and Education Ministers to think again. I know that they have been doing so, but nothing ever seems to come out of the thinking-again machine. As a matter of fairness, I would ask them really to address the issue this time and to examine the logic involved in the way in which the Government provide money to local education authorities.

The Conservative Front-Bench spokesman has spelled out our excellent position on parents' passports. One of the good things about that proposal which has not yet quite reached the public domain is that by giving money directly to people we are bypassing the bureaucracy of the local education authorities. In so doing, we would be addressing about 70 per cent. of the cost of local expenditure, and could, if we thought it through, therefore address the enormous rise in the burden of council tax and all its associated problems. This might possibly provide a way through the vexed question of council tax, to which I shall refer later.

A number of speakers in this short debate have said that, on the surface, the economy feels—to most people—as though it is in good shape. Interest rates are relatively low, though rising. Inflation is also low, though probably also rising—certainly above the Chancellor's projected 1.7 per cent. for next year. Both are rising because of significant increases in, and the hardening of, world commodity prices, and also because of lax domestic monetary and fiscal policies. Unemployment is low because public sector—not private sector—jobs are plentiful; jobs in manufacturing are falling.

Beneath this apparently calm surface, however, there are signs that the British economy is in an almost identical position to the United States economy's just before the dollar went into decline. This raises the question of whether pressure on sterling is around the corner. Certainly, sterling fell 4 cents to the dollar in one day last week, following the news of an appalling £4.6 billion trade deficit in January. People might be wise not to delay their buying sprees in the United States for too long.

As was the case with the United States, Britain is no longer paying her way in the world. For several years, she has been running a vast and growing balance of payments deficit, especially with the European Union. This fact was neatly skated over in the Red Book and went totally unmentioned in the Chancellor's speech yesterday. Britain is buying around £30 billion more goods and services abroad each year than she is selling. The value of Britain's visible and invisible exports actually fell between 2001 and 2002 by 5 per cent., which is a very large figure. During that year, as in previous ones, Britain made a surplus on her sales to the United States, but sadly, these did not make up for the vast losses that she made on her trade with continental Europe.

As was also the case in America before the dollar fell, this very significant trade gap has in the past been balanced by a heavy inflow of foreign funds, both in the form of direct investment and through the purchase by people abroad of UK Government bonds and securities. As was the case in America when the dollar began its plunge, the inflow of funds to the United Kingdom, which peaked in 2000, is drying up. In the American case, the result was a fall in the requirement for foreigners to hold dollars. There is absolutely no reason why the same principle should not apply to the willingness of foreigners to hold sterling if the present trend in both the balance of payments and the compensatory capital flows into the United Kingdom is maintained. The foreign account is therefore the first reason why pressure on sterling must be mounting.

[Sir Michael Spicer]

The second, related, similarity with the American economy before the dollar went into its slide is the growing financial deficit in the United Kingdom—the continuing gap between public spending and the revenue raised to cover it. According to the Chancellor himself, that is running at an annual rate of well over £30 billion a year—currently about £40 billion—despite massive tax rises. On past form, the £37 billion he promised for the current year will be exceeded.

That financial gap has been caused, essentially, by a vast rise in public spending, set to reach well over £500 billion, or 42 per cent. of gross domestic product. All that must require one of two things: either a massive rise in tax rates or the Government substantially increasing their borrowing. In the context of what I am arguing today, the question then arises as to how successful the Government will be in raising the necessary loans, especially at current rates of interest.

It is arguable that, as with America, the appetite for British Government stock will begin to wane as more of it begins to flood the market. Again as in America, that will not only put pressure on long-term interest rates, but add to the vulnerability of the currency as foreigners begin to fear an interest rate rise and a fall in the value of Government stocks. I am saying that, contrary to the impression left yesterday by the Chancellor, the Government are dangerously gambling with the future of our country's economy and with its currency, the backing for which has been greatly weakened since the bulk of our gold reserves was sold.

What has caused those two major deficits in our trade and our finances? On the trade account, it is quite clear that since the Government took office the competitiveness of the British economy, relative to others, has declined. Productivity rates have fallen virtually continuously since Labour came to power. That is presumably why the Government no longer publish productivity rate tables in their general reports on productivity.

The reason for that decline in the competitiveness of the British economy is that from being one of the least restricted, lowest taxed western economies in the 1980s and 1990s, it has returned to being one of the highest taxed and most regulated. According to the Office for National Statistics, a further contributory factor to the decline in productivity has been the remarkable growth in non-productive public sector jobs. Whereas, for instance, the number of full-time teachers rose between 2000 and 2003 by 6.8 per cent., the number of full-time education administrators rose by 26 per cent. in the same period. A comparison between full-time nurses and administrators provides figures of 7.3 and 15 per cent. respectively.

In that context, it is of course to be welcomed that the Government have introduced a proposal in the Budget to amalgamate the Inland Revenue and Customs and Excise. I suppose I am bound to be enthusiastic about that, because I chaired the Treasury Committee that twice made such a recommendation. The amalgamation will undoubtedly create administrative savings.

The effect of the decline in the productivity rate has combined in our country with a switch from growth markets in north America and the far east to the sluggish markets of Europe. Far from benefiting the balance of payments, trade with the European Union has been to its detriment. It used to be said of the Germans and the French that the EU had an economic price for a political benefit, whereas Britain paid a political price for an economic benefit. For our trade account, the economic benefits are highly questionable.

As for the deficit in the financial account, this raises one of the central dilemmas facing British Governments of all political complexions: how to recreate for ourselves public services on a par with those of comparable countries while keeping taxes down to a level at which people are willing to invest and to work.

The problem is aggravated by the fact that certain taxes have begun to hit their ceiling in terms of public acceptance. Council taxes and much VAT are the most recent example of high taxes hitting the relatively poor hardest and becoming unacceptable. The resentment against local taxes is unlikely to be reduced by changing their form or name. People simply want to pay less tax, whether it is called council tax, local income tax, property tax or, for that matter, poll tax.

The answer to the conundrum of getting better public services and keeping taxes down is to pursue the path on which this Prime Minister's Government claimed to have set out under the label "new Labour": revitalising public services through a mixture of public and private money and management. Labour's attempt to do that failed in the starting blocks with, effectively, the dismissal of the right hon. Member for Birkenhead (Mr. Field).

A good place to start the whole process would have been state pensions. Launching a properly funded, actuarially based pension scheme to which state funds were applied where premiums were beyond the reach of contributors, and paying pensions properly related to previous earnings, would have been an excellent start. That should have been followed by radical reforms to the management of the health and education system, on which we are basing today's debate.

It has become a proven fact that when patients, for instance, are given financial power to make their own choices, as in the case of most European countries, not only have more resources become available, but the whole system begins to respond with much greater effect and efficiency. In this country, it remains a privilege to visit a doctor and to receive treatment in hospital. When the patient is financially in charge of his own destiny, it becomes a right and an obligation on the health provider to give him or her the best possible service.

Mr. Sheerman: Will the hon. Gentleman answer one question? He knows a great deal about the health sector, but the US spends 15 per cent. of GDP on the health service while we spend 7.5 per cent. The figure for France is very high indeed. France delivers a good health service, but it is enormously expensive, as is America's, which is also very poor. Which example does he suggest we follow?

Sir Michael Spicer: I am saying that, particularly in the health service, we need a mixture of private and public funds. We cannot do everything off the taxpayers' back for the reasons that, in a sense, are implicit in the hon. Gentleman's question. At 7.5 per cent., we are already straining taxpayers, so there has to be new thinking and a radical approach. I thought that new Labour, in the first instance, was about exactly that mixture of public sector management and finance combined with private sector management and finance.

That is what new Labour was to bring to the pot, if I may put it that way, but it has not happened. Ever since the right hon. Member for Birkenhead was thrown to the dogs, the momentum has gone out of that particular philosophy and that approach to government, which was an interesting one. I believe that it should be taken forward, because under such a system waiting lists become a thing of the past, but not because of Government edict.

Mr. Andrew Love (Edmonton) (Lab/Co-op): The hon. Gentleman is painting a gloomy picture, but to pick up the point about the mixture of public and private funding for the health service, he says that it is a privilege to be able to go to a GP or to hospital. Under private financing of the kind that he is talking about, would not that become even more of a privilege and one based on the amount of money that someone could bring to bear to access the health service?

Sir Michael Spicer: All I can do is give the hon. Gentleman an example. Because of France's largely state-funded insurance scheme, immediately people become ill, they get a fistful of what used to be francs but, unfortunately for the French, are now euros. They wander around the high street looking for a doctor. The doctors come out of their doors very rapidly, because those people have money in their hands. Suddenly, the boot is on the other foot and the whole emphasis shifts from subservience or dependence on the system, as the patient has the power and the ability to buy services. The attitude and approach of the provider would change overnight. That is exactly what has happened in France; I am not talking speculatively.

Mr. Love rose—

Mr. Todd rose—

Sir Michael Spicer: I shall give way.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Alan Haselhurst): Order. I do not know whether the hon. Gentleman wishes to make the adjudication between the two, or whether he would like to leave it to the Chair.

Sir Michael Spicer: I thought that I would allow the hon. Member for Edmonton (Mr. Love) to follow on.

Mr. Love: I thank the hon. Gentleman for giving way a second time. In the case of France, the French are already looking at the gateway system operated by GPs to restrain the cost of the health system. The French health system is paid for through a tax on employment. How would he seek to pay for the private sector contribution?

Sir Michael Spicer: The way the system is funded is, of course, an issue. In this country, funding is from taxpayers generally, and there is no reason why that should not continue. The issue is what happens to the money once it is raised, and how it is combined with other money, which the French have done very well. I totally accept the hon. Gentleman's point about the need for cost control, which is, of course, right. Were I a Frenchman, I would want much tighter controls in many ways on cost.

Mr. Todd: May I suggest to the hon. Gentleman that his earlier remarks about the number of bureaucrats and administrators within the NHS—it depends on how one counts them—could be applied to the French system, in which vast numbers of accountants and pen pushers shift around the various financial transactions generated by the high street shopper to whom he refers? Surely he recognises that there is a linkage between that and the overall cost of the system.

Sir Michael Spicer: But surely the hon. Gentleman will recognise that the French system provides a far better health service than ours. [HON. MEMBERS: "Oh."] Well, I would not have thought that anyone disputes that. Certainly, as I said, were I a French taxpayer I would be in the business of trying to control some of the expenditure. I do not intend to deny that at all. Basically, however, an effectively state-run insurance system has worked extraordinarily well in France and in other countries.

Sir John Butterfill (Bournemouth, West) (Con): Spain.

Sir Michael Spicer: As my hon. Friend rightly says, Spain is one of those countries. The idea that our health system is a good system compared with other countries' systems is a figment of the Government's imagination.

Michael Fabricant: Is my hon. Friend aware that as a proportion of GDP, about as much money is spent on health in Scotland as in Germany, and yet the biggest killer for men is prostate cancer? In the United Kingdom, the chance of being cured of prostate cancer is roughly 50:50, whereas in Germany it is 76 per cent. Does not that show that we have no room for complacency?

Sir Michael Spicer: My hon. Friend makes a good point. An even better point—his point was good enough—would be provided by the example of Wales, where, I understand, the per capita expenditure is in some respects higher than in many other European countries, and yet the waiting lists are far longer than in England. It is a perfect example of how the system of delivery and the system of financing count. The Government used to believe that, when the right hon. Member for Birkenhead was in charge of thinking in the Labour party, but they have given up on it. The situation with this Government is now hopeless. In fact, they have been exhausted on these matters by their own Back Benchers, and the original objective has been destroyed. What remains is increasingly marginal though bitter in-fighting within the Labour party over a rump of policies on hospitals and further education. New Labour has lost its point.

Britain's twin deficits are serious. They have at their root the Government's failure to produce a truly competitive economy. They are bound in the end to create pressures on our currency, and instability for its future. Whether that turns eventually into a full-blown sterling crisis, or, as in the American example, results in a gradual but persistent slide in the value of the pound, is anyone's guess. One day, as always, a Conservative Government will have to pick up the pieces.

3.34 pm

Helen Jones (Warrington, North) (Lab): Let me say at the outset that the doom and gloom of the hon. Member for West Worcestershire (Sir Michael Spicer) does not reflect what is happening in the real world outside. I hope to say a little about the positive effect of the Budget on constituencies such as mine.

In his Budget, the Chancellor set out policies that would maintain a strong economy and allow our public services to grow and develop. It is interesting that the Opposition always present those two things as alternatives. That is nonsense in a modern economy. Good public services that support individual effort, provide the infrastructure that the economy needs and ensure that we create a cohesive society in which people are enabled to innovate and take risks are essential for the development of our economy. Public services have a moral function, but they also have an economic function. The twin track that the Government have pursued has borne, and continues to bear, fruit in areas such as the one that I represent.

It is worth reminding ourselves of the situation that we faced in 1997. We have heard a lot from the Opposition today about manufacturing industry. I must remind the House that, under the Conservatives, nearly 20 per cent. of the manufacturing industry in my area was wiped out. There were families in the middle of my constituency who, by 1997, were almost in their third generation of unemployment, and children who had never seen anyone in their house going out to work. The situation in my area has been transformed. The unemployment rate in Warrington is 1.7 per cent., which is below the 3 per cent. figure that Beveridge used to define full employment. Far from that being dependent entirely on public sector jobs, new businesses are being created every week in my area. It is a north-west success story. The reason for that, and the reason why the policies that the Chancellor is pursuing are right, is that Warrington has developed precisely because of that mixture of public sector innovation and private enterprise that has borne fruit. I will give way to the hon. Member for Epsom and Ewell (Chris Grayling), because the voters of Warrington, South, resoundingly rejected him.

Chris Grayling: The hon. Lady is right that I was a candidate in Warrington, South at the 1997 general election. I simply ask her to reflect on the circumstances in Warrington in 1995 and 1996: by all measures, it was a boom town. Development and new businesses were appearing everywhere and there were huge pressures on infrastructure. Her memory and mine of the environment in Warrington at that time are very different. Warrington was doing pretty well under the Conservatives.

Helen Jones: The hon. Gentleman' intervention is almost entirely wrong, because Warrington was not doing well. Large parts of Warrington had very high unemployment under the Conservatives. If he will permit me, I will give him the figures and the reasons why we managed to tackle that.

First, because Warrington was a new town—the hon. Gentleman may well have a point on this—it was fortunate enough to be at the heart of a very good motorway network. That was public infrastructure provided by public money. Warrington was also fortunate enough to have a council that actively promoted economic development and provided sites for new businesses in the town—a Labour council, looking forward.

The council was able to take advantage of the improvement of the economy under this Government because of many of the schemes that the Government introduced, such as the new deal, which the Tories opposed consistently, and modern apprenticeships. We hear a great deal of discussion about those, and the Tories try to talk them down, but they are providing good training for a number of young people in my constituency. The results can be seen very clearly. Long-term unemployment in Warrington has fallen by 83 per cent. since 1997, and long-term youth unemployment has fallen by 79 per cent. I can tell the hon. Gentleman in very simple terms what difference the Government have made in Warrington. They got people back to work, and everything else has followed from that.

I do not deny that there is much more to be done. There are still serious inequalities in the borough, and I represent many of the most deprived wards. We have surmounted the first challenge, which was to return people to work; the challenge for us now is to improve their skills and give them long-term careers in which they can develop those skills and earn a good living. I welcome the new deal for skills that was announced in the Budget statement, which I expect to benefit many of the people whom I represent. It must, however, be accompanied by ways of helping people to move on after gaining those skills.

If, as the debate suggests, we all agree that vocational skills are undervalued, we must ensure that the acquisition of such skills can lead to other things—further and higher education, for instance, according to how people want to develop. We cannot do that if we cap the number of people who can move on. That is why I am so worried about the Conservatives' refusal to tell us how many people they want to put into higher education. Talk is all very well, but if an artificial cap is imposed on numbers, those who suffer will be the very people who have been traditionally under-represented in higher education throughout history.

The Conservatives talk of making sure that people who are capable of undergoing higher education can do so, but that has never happened in this country. Only those who believe that ability is distributed according to income—which is complete nonsense—could imagine that it had. Working-class pupils are always, and have always been, under-represented in higher education. It is people from poorer families whom we must help to grow and develop.

My constituency needs that above all, because we hope to benefit from the recently proposed northern corridor. We are ideally placed to benefit from it. On the M62, we have Omega, the largest industrial development site in the north-west. I want—and I know that the local council wants—to attract high-tech, science-based jobs to the area. I hope that we shall be able to use both the new deal for skills and the investment in science and innovation that the Chancellor announced to attract such jobs to regions such as mine—not just the golden triangle of the south-east—so that we can turn the ideas developed in our north-western universities into employment opportunities. That is the way to enable our economy to prosper in the future.

Chris Grayling: The hon. Lady speaks of the need to give more opportunities to young people from less well-off backgrounds in her constituency. Following the passage of the Higher Education Bill, even given the new grants that it will provide, those young people will leave university £10,000 in debt. Does she support the Government's policy on introducing fees, and will she vote for the Bill's Third Reading?

Helen Jones: My constituents and the hon. Gentleman know my views on the Bill, but let me say this. The Opposition's policies would benefit none of the people whom I represent, because they would prevent them from going to university at all. I will take no lectures from him on opportunities for members of lower-paid families.

Mr. Sheerman: Does my hon. Friend agree that the Budget statement said that the expansion of UK universities would be funded, and that the amount received by each student during that expansion would be maintained, whereas critics had said that the £1 billion from fees would be compensated for by the taking away of public money? Is that not a great relief for most of us?

Helen Jones: I agree. It is also proper for the Government to tackle the scandalous underinvestment in universities that has continued for far too long.

If my constituency is to benefit from future development in the north, investment is needed in public transport as well as in skills and science. The corridor cannot be developed simply by blocking up the M62. The Government have already made some advances, with investment in buses, bus exchange and traffic management in my constituency. The upgrading of the west coast main line will bring particular benefits to my constituents but more needs to be done. Bank Quay station in Warrington is an absolute disgrace for a mainline railway station. The rail corridor from Liverpool to Manchester needs considerable work to upgrade local stations such as Birch Wood and Glazebrook, to ensure that more trains stop at smaller stations and that bus services link up, so that public transport can be used to get to work.

It a long-cherished wish of my hon. Friend the Member for Eccles (Ian Stewart) and myself that before long the Manchester tram system will be extended to Cadishead in his constituency and to the Birch Wood industrial area in mine. That is a long-term project but it has been a failure of Governments over time not to think long term about infrastructure and its contribution to developing the economy. I hope that the present economic stability will allow the planning of such projects in future.

If my constituency is to benefit from the Budget, projects are needed that tackle disadvantage in the most deprived areas and allow all to benefit. There is only one Sure Start project in my constituency—for a new children's centre at St. Stephen's. Although it provides the best possible start for youngsters in that area and spreads best practice elsewhere, more projects are needed. I am pleased about the Budget proposal to extend children's centres to the most deprived wards and then to every community.

Sure Start is one of the Government's most forward-thinking and innovative initiatives. I hope that it will be combined with improvements to child care. Warrington has more than 4,000 nursery education places for three and four-year-olds, which is a great improvement, but they are part-time places. Parents in work often find it a struggle to find appropriate child care. The new tax credits have helped, but parents on low incomes in particular have difficulty finding the nursery places that they need. Investment in child care fulfils all the criteria for good public services. It supports individual effort, looks after the most vulnerable, tackles disadvantage and ultimately saves money. As an ex-secondary school teacher, I believe that early-years investment ultimately saves the schools system a great deal of money because it prevents problems developing later.

Sir John Butterfill: I agree with the hon. Lady's comments about Sure Start. Does she agree that one of the great benefits of that scheme is not simply that it provides child care but that it assists young mothers to acquire parenting skills?

Helen Jones: The hon. Gentleman is right. The other advantage of Sure Start is that it is a universal service, so no stigma attaches to anyone in using it. That, too, is important in trying to tackle disadvantage.

We also need further investment in community policing. My constituency is lucky in that we have community action teams in various areas and 11 community support officers. The Budget was right to make it clear that there will be no cuts in policing. If we are to create a confident society in which people feel at ease, it is important to ensure that they feel safe and secure on our streets and in other public spaces.

The key for any politician is how we maintain support for investment in public services and how we tailor them to people's needs. The Opposition propose the parent's passport and vouchers. Such an approach has the merit, I suppose, of being simple, but it has the demerit of being absolutely wrong. Under the mantle of choice, it would actually deny choice to most people. We heard about the Opposition's school proposals—we can never be sure exactly what they are as they seem to change from day to day—but we need only to look at their proposals for the health service to see how misguided they are. Apparently, a patient would receive 60 per cent. of the NHS cost of an operation, but let us consider the example of an old lady waiting for a hip operation. Unless she could raise the rest of the money, she would have no choice whatsoever, while at the same time her local hospital would be being starved of funds. That is a classic example of "To them that have shall be given."

I see no merit in considering people's relationship with public services solely through the consumer model; the situation is much more complicated than that. It is right to say that people want public services to meet their needs quickly, but a consumer has no responsibility except to herself. She buys or does not buy, turns up or does not turn up, as she wishes. People think about public services in a way very different from that. They recognise a whole network of complex obligations that entail meeting not only their own needs, but the needs of others. The key for us is how we meet those needs and spread best practice in public services.

We need to define what people want when they talk about choice in public services. It is easy to do that when they talk about wanting to see a doctor near their home or place of work, or about wanting to book their hospital appointment at a time convenient to them. But much of what we hear about choice depends on improving access. I see no evidence to suggest that many people want to rush off to hospital at the other end of the country—unless they need a particular specialist service—or that they want to be able to change their child's school or child care arrangements in the same way as they switch between supermarkets. They have a much longer, two-way relationship with such services. What they want is for us to ensure that the service provided by their local hospital, school or child care facilities is as good as that found anywhere else.

In looking at funding, the question for us is how we spread best practice. A model that we should think seriously about is the one that was used for beacon schools. Best practice in schools was recognised and rewarded, but in a way that required schools to spread that best practice elsewhere. We need to do much more of that in public services and to find many more such models. My fear is that if we fragment our services too much, we will lose the chance to operate the virtuous circles that spread best practice. That is why I have some reservations about how we devolve services locally. It is true that many communities, particularly poorer ones, are not consulted enough about the services provided for them and that they are not involved in those services. Things are often done to them, rather than with them, so we must build funding mechanisms that involve people on the ground.

I enter a note of caution, however, about devolving ownership too far down, because two problems often follow. The first is that there is no evidence of loads of people wanting to go out and run the services. The experience of most Members in respect of finding school governors would confirm that. Even as governors have been accorded more and more powers, it has proved more and more difficult to find people who want to become governors.

Mr. Sheerman: Does it gladden my hon. Friend's heart to hear that 40,000 people have signed up to be involved in the Birmingham foundation proposal?

Helen Jones: It would gladden my heart if I thought that it would be repeated elsewhere, but sadly the evidence suggests that it will not.

The second problem is about funding. If we move towards a model in which local communities own their local park or library, for example, we face the danger of losing the current cross-subsidies. We try to allocate funding, through whatever mechanism, on the basis of need. We may disagree about which are the greatest needs, but we all try to operate on that basis. If, however, I part own my local library or park, why would I want any of my funding to be moved elsewhere in the borough? I suspect that it would not be long before wealthier communities were pressing to keep their local council tax—or whatever mechanism is used—in their own area rather than see it transferred elsewhere. That might lead to improved services in wealthier areas and a decline in services in others. We should be very wary of that.

Accountability is still another problem. If services are devolved to the locality, they would presumably have to be run by different boards, but how is it possible to be accountable if a body spends money without raising it? Conversely, how can a Government or local council be accountable for something that they do not control or own?

Those are the sorts of problems that need to be resolved, but it is encouraging that we can now discuss them on the basis that our local services are properly funded and improving. We are no longer firefighting, as we were throughout most of my career in the public services, but discussing ways of improving them. That is the real message of the Budget. It is an encouraging one for my constituents and for the country as a whole. In future years, I hope that we will continue to build on the progress that we have made in the last few years.

3.58 pm

Chris Grayling (Epsom and Ewell) (Con): I wish to deal with several aspects of the Budget. Before your arrival, Mr. Deputy Speaker, there was great excitement among Government Members at the idea that a shadow education spokesman was going to participate in a debate about education. The fact that our debate is about much more than education is evinced by the presence on the Government Front Bench of two Treasury Ministers but only one education Minister.

We are debating a Budget that was, in my view, something of a nothing Budget. Had the Chancellor stood up and said that he had no speech to make this year, it would have passed by unremarked. Frankly, in respect of its content, his speech offered not a lot more than that. There was rather too much party politics and not enough substance. It did, however, have a pronounced sting in the tail about public borrowing—it emerged from the Chancellor in his usual way of speeding so fast over bad news that it is difficult to catch his words. The trend is alarming, to say the least, and certainly much worse than the picture that the Chancellor portrayed to the House 12, 24 and 36 months ago. Every year, the Government's borrowing position seems to get worse.

Beyond that, however, it was very much a nothing Budget. There was no mention of income tax or national insurance. Although there was a lot of party politics, there was no real analysis of the challenges that the nation faces. The Chancellor missed out some fundamental matters that are crucial to our international competitiveness and our ability to deliver high-quality, efficient public services.

I shall begin by talking about international competitiveness and our economy's efficiency and productivity. Those factors are crucial to our future success as a nation. The Chancellor continued his bombast about his successes of recent years. To his credit, there have been economic successes recently, although they have been achieved at serious cost to the public finances. However, my profound concern is that growing storm clouds overshadow the Chancellor's good headlines on our economy, on the success of enterprise and on our ability to compete in the world. I am alarmed at how little yesterday's Budget had to say about those matters.

We face an enormously challenging world in which manufacturing industry is moving at a rate of knots from the developed world to the developing world. In addition, different enterprises in the service sector are making the same move.

Eighteen months ago, when I was a member of the Select Committee on Transport, I took part in a visit to Japan and Hong Kong. The proprietors of a container port in Hong Kong told us that, whereas 10 years previously they would have bought their new cantilever crane from Japan, they now bought such items from China, where the quality was the same but the cost was massively lower. Countries in the west, and those such as Japan, will be unable to compete effectively with the bulk manufacturing capability of countries such as China.

Mr. Todd: I am following the hon. Gentleman's argument with care. One of the trends established under this Government has been a rising share of trade with the high-growth Asian economies such as China. That is a critical factor, and we must get to grips with it. Trade may have shifted to China, but does not the hon. Gentleman agree that the key is how well we support that country's infrastructure through trade from these shores?

Chris Grayling: I agree, and if the hon. Gentleman bears with me, I shall explain my concerns in that area.

Many of the traditional foundations of western economies are shifting because the cost differences—such as those that I described in connection with the cranes in Hong Kong—are fundamental, pronounced and unavoidable. In future, western economies will not be centres for mass manufacturing. Increasingly, the bulk service sector, which includes back-office operations, will move out of this country to other parts of the world.

To survive, compete effectively and flourish in the future, Britain must be a specialist, dynamic, innovative and entrepreneurial economy. We must offer a deregulated and competitive environment, so that companies will want to keep their business here. We must foster new business, attract international investment and offer the specialist components, products and innovations that will ensure the continuation of the flow of trade to which the hon. Member for South Derbyshire (Mr. Todd) referred.

Why am I so concerned? For all that the Chancellor painted a picture of unblemished blue skies, I believe that the trends and indicators in this country—the warning signals coming from industry—show that, step by step, the deregulated, lower-tax environment that we have had for the past 10 years, which enabled businesses to flourish and helped the economy to perform well, is being eroded on every front.

Mr. Todd: Is the hon. Gentleman therefore puzzled by the apparent support of both the Institute of Directors and the Confederation of British Industry for the approach taken in the Budget? It sounds as if those organisations do not share the hon. Gentleman's deep-seated concerns.

Chris Grayling: The hon. Gentleman is doing well in anticipating me. Let me pray in aid those very organisations and the concerns that they have raised. I suppose one could say that the fact that the Chancellor did not come up with another swathe of business regulations that would have caused even more problems for those running enterprises in this country is a positive step, but he did nothing to address the already substantial competitiveness issue that Britain faces—the burden of regulation.

There is a major storm cloud ahead, not just for individuals but for business. In the unfortunate and increasingly unlikely event—given the Government's performance—that Labour remains in office after the next election, the Chancellor's figures will, by every independent estimate, require substantial tax increases in the next Parliament. If that happens, given the Government's track record in the past seven or eight years, part of the burden will fall on business and make it even more difficult for our companies to compete.

The hon. Member for South Derbyshire talked about the CBI, which has specifically said that red tape and extra taxes are making the UK a less attractive place to do business. The hon. Gentlemen may be aware of a survey conducted by MORI for the CBI last November of 250 senior figures in industry. Some good points came out of it: 78 per cent. of business leaders said that they believe that the UK remains an attractive place to invest. But two thirds of respondents believed that the Government place a low priority on delivering a favourable business climate. Seventy five per cent. said that the Government were less business friendly, and 68 per cent. expected the situation to worsen. Sixty per cent. of those captains of industry—this is the key point; we are talking not about today, but about the future—expected the climate for investment in Britain to get worse in the next five years. That is the issue and the real challenge. Although things may be fine today, business leaders expect that, step by step, the regulatory environment and the growing burden of taxation will make life more problematic for them. As time goes by, our competitive position will be eroded.

Mr. Bellingham: Does my hon. Friend recall that in that same survey, 6 per cent. of those FTSE 100 chief executives said that they were thinking of moving part of their operation offshore in the next four years?

Chris Grayling: My hon. Friend is right. That is the concern. The Chancellor's speech was very much about the here and now. What happens in the future? What about the trends that are becoming alarming and a genuine cause for concern? In the context of the increasingly difficult international climate, with real competition from parts of the world from which we have not faced competition before, business leaders are beginning to consider moving services offshore and talk about the climate in Britain becoming worse. If we are complacent and do not wise up to the challenge that we face, there will be a significant threat to our enterprise and competitiveness.

I pray in aid the director general of the CBI, who said last November:

"when top company decision makers start giving the kind of signals contained in our survey the government must sit up, listen and take action. There is widespread concern about the UK's declining competitiveness and this is starting to feed through to investment decisions. There is no room for any complacency by anyone anywhere."

That is a pretty stark message.

In search of a real drive to deal with those issues, I turned to the section of the Red Book marked "Enterprise culture" on page 54. I looked for the steps that the Government might be taking to address the problem. In January 2004, the Chancellor hosted a conference in London called "Advancing Enterprise: Britain in a Global Economy." We also have the Davies review of economy and enterprise in education and the Tomlinson review of the 14–19 curriculum. Then we have enterprise week in November. We have the £1 million enterprise promotion fund, the launch of a new competition to identify European centres of enterprise and an online summit of experts from the United Kingdom, the United States and Canada to be held in April. We have a new council for graduate entrepreneurship, a working group and a pilot programme of "devolved RDA-led Business Link services in the North West, East Midlands and West Midlands".

The problem is simple and stark: those are not the issues that the Government should be addressing. The Government should be going step by step—the steps should be big—towards a more deregulated and more competitive environment, with lower taxes for businesses, which will encourage enterprise in this country to grow and develop.

The Paymaster General (Dawn Primarolo): The hon. Gentleman used some rather outdated quotes. I wonder if he has seen the comments made yesterday by George Cox, of the Institute of Directors, who said:

"We are delighted to see the red tape agenda is now being taken very seriously. It's been a genuine impediment to British growth . . . the Government is now taking that forward."

The Federation of Small Businesses said:

"The Chancellor's announcements on red tape and tax administration are timely and welcomed"?

I shall not read out all the comments but, for example, William Sargent, chairman of the Small Business Council and joint chief executive of Framestore CFC, said:

"The ideas are exactly what I have been looking for and I look forward to them being effective."

Do not such statements address the point that the hon. Gentleman is making? The Government are taking the agenda forward and business welcomes that, which is more than his Government—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The right hon. Lady is meant to be making an intervention, not a speech. She may hope to catch my eye later.

Chris Grayling: The Paymaster General prays in aid post-Budget comments, but she has been in power for seven or eight years and the comments about the need to improve our nation's competitiveness and to reverse some of the regulatory steps that have been taken are not new—they have been around for years and the Government have done precious little about them. Furthermore, the Government have quite a record for making announcements on dealing with competitiveness issues. For example, yesterday we heard announcements about the housing market. The Chancellor made yet another announcement about the need to take the brakes off development to allow massive expansion of housing across the south-east.

I have been a Member for nearly three years and have heard that announcement at least four or five times before. It seems to be seasonal, like the first cuckoo of spring; we reach a certain point of the year and the Chancellor makes yet another pronouncement about the need to improve the productivity of the nation by building lots of new houses. Shortly afterwards, the Deputy Prime Minister announces the building of lots of new houses. We wait another year and the same thing happens again. I shall believe the Government's commitment to remove red tape when we see in this place motions to repeal regulations rather than to add new ones to the statute book.

In reality, that repeal is not happening—nor will it happen. We have only to consider the changes in employment law that are due to come into force on 6 April. They include the right to request flexible working for parents with children aged under 6; an increase in paid ordinary maternity leave from 18 to 26 weeks; an increase in maternity pay for ordinary maternity leave from £75 to £100 a week; the right to an additional 26 weeks of unpaid maternity leave; the right to two weeks of paid paternity leave; the right to adoption leave; the right to 13 weeks of unpaid parental leave and the right to request information on equal pay. All those changes will be made on 6 April— and that is just in one year.

Helen Jones: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Chris Grayling: If the hon. Lady will bear with me for a moment, I may anticipate her point. No doubt she is about to ask me whether I am bitterly opposed to all those changes in employment law. It is difficult to argue that many of those changes, taken individually, are a bad thing; the point is that when we add them up for business, time after time and change after change, we are ultimately piling straws on a camel's back. Labour Members may be sincere in their belief that such things are necessary but they miss the point: if we have no wealth generators in future because we have over-regulated and been too ambitious about what we expect them to deliver, we shall all suffer. The hon. Lady's constituents who struggle in life will suffer, too.

Helen Jones: The hon. Gentleman says that there are too many regulations and they are cumulative. I disagree, but can he tell us which ones he would get rid of: flexible working, leave for adoptive parents, enhanced maternity provision?

Chris Grayling: In due course, my hon. Friend the Member for Eddisbury (Mr. O'Brien) will publish a wide range of such regulations. The hon. Lady asks for a specific example of a regulation that will come into force this year and have a profound effect. Last week, I visited a retailer in a small village near Lewes in Sussex. The retailer is basically a herbalist who manufactures a small range of her own products, which she sells from a shelf in her shop. The hon. Lady will know that the traditional herbal and medicinal products directive is currently going through the European Parliament and the Commission in Brussels, and that it will ultimately be put before this House. As the directive is currently set out, the herbalist, who enjoys what she does but probably does not make a lot of money, must batch-test every single box of five or six products that she mixes up and puts on the shelf. Theoretically speaking, every one of those products must be registered—at a cost. That is one example of a regulation that the Government will enact and that will have a severely detrimental effect on a small business.

Mr. Love: I have listened carefully to the hon. Gentleman's contribution. The last Conservative Government set up the Deregulation Committee, and this Government have reformed it to improve its powers—it is now the Deregulation and Regulatory Reform Committee. Can he explain why Conservative members of that Committee never turn up? Is it not another case of all talk and no delivery from the Opposition?

Chris Grayling: If I respond to that intervention, you will rule me out of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker, and I do not intend to be drawn down that path.

The hon. Member for Warrington, North (Helen Jones) asked me for an example of a regulation that will have a severely damaging effect on a small business. If the example that I gave were isolated, it would not be a problem, but such regulations occur in sector after sector across our economy, which means that individual small businesses must take on extra administrators and work late nights doing paperwork. Many business men and women have decided that enough is enough; they are stopping employing people and are becoming sole practitioners.

Ultimately, the regulation that I described will make us uncompetitive and provide a disincentive to our entrepreneurs, and the economy will suffer. If we do not have the innovators and entrepreneurs of the future—people who invent and market things, set up and build businesses and allow our economy to compete effectively—we will not succeed and will sink into decline in the face of overwhelming competition from parts of the world where the cost base is cheaper. Yesterday's Budget was worrying because I heard nothing from the Chancellor about that challenge and no long-term strategy to reduce the regulatory burden.

I listened to what the Paymaster General said, but I shall start to take her remarks seriously when I see motions before the House to scrap regulations. As far as I can see, that has not happened yet. I shall stand corrected when I see those motions come through, but I have not seen them yet and do not believe that they are coming soon. Unless they start to come and unless we start to rationalise our regulations and think about creating a more flexible entrepreneurial environment for our people to operate in, the consequence for our competitive position in the world in the future will be extremely serious. We face an economic challenge of a kind that the developed world has not faced in 200 years. Unless we respond to it effectively, we will not flourish and survive in the future and will not be able to deliver the service improvements that we want for all our people. I listened in vain to yesterday's Budget for a clear strategy to deal with that problem.

4.19 pm

Mr. Mark Todd (South Derbyshire) (Lab): I shall confine my remarks to three areas of the Budget. First, I shall talk about education, the subject of today's debate. I especially welcome the commitment to increase capital investment in schools, which should mean that the building schools for the future programme, which is intended to replace secondary schools that require replacement by 2015, will be completed in that time scale. Specifically, of course, I hope to ensure that the bids submitted by Derbyshire and Derby City local education authorities commend themselves to the Department when next it considers bids for that programme. Derbyshire LEA was disappointed not to feature in the list of local authorities selected in the first round, but it will have the opportunity in the near future to explain its concerns and to listen to any critique there might be of its bid, so that it can improve its efforts when it submits its next bid.

I shall briefly comment on the merits of the bids. The Derby City bid was an expression of interest in the scheme. One of the key features was the integration of special schools with the secondary school sector. The LEA makes a powerful point about the built environment of the small group of special schools in the city and the need for new facilities within the mainstream educational environment. The proposal has much to commend it.

Derbyshire LEA submitted a bid that focused on the former coalfield areas in the county, including the south Derbyshire coalfield, and the three excellent secondary schools that serve the town of Swadlincote and the immediate surrounding villages. The heads have met and put together a challenging approach to improving the school buildings in the town, and I hope that it will commend itself to the Department when it next considers the proposals. Derbyshire has an excellent track record. It is an excellent council, and is one of the small group of councils that already commands that badge. It has set high standards in developing its education services in the past few years. Among the exciting aspects of its proposal is the extension of online courses in secondary education. I hope very much that its bid will be successful in the future and I shall do my best to ensure that it is.

The other aspect of the Derbyshire bid that is especially strong is the proposal for cluster working. I mentioned that the three secondary schools in the Swadlincote area were working together, but it would be easy to find neighbouring schools that do not agree with each other on the future provision of secondary education in a town, especially if they include—as in this case—a former grant-maintained school. It is to the credit of the leadership of the three schools that they have been able to work together on an agreed solution.

The Budget will consolidate the track record of solid educational capital spending over the past six years. I sometimes feel like a market trader when I talk about the increase in capital spending in schools in south Derbyshire. I say, "Well, it's not double, it's not three times, not four times, but something like six times greater than the equivalent period under a Conservative Government." The result of that spending on the buildings in my community is now noticeable.

Mr. John Horam (Orpington) (Con): While we all welcome the extra expenditure on secondary education, does the hon. Gentleman agree that it is a pity that similar largesse has not been extended to colleges of further education, in Derbyshire and elsewhere? Those colleges produce results at approximately two thirds of the cost of secondary schools and could provide the improvement in vocational education that we desperately need.

Mr. Todd: I respond to that with some degree of agreement. There is no further education college in my constituency, so my views are second-hand, although many young people from the area travel to FE colleges in Burton, Coalville or Derby. The point is well made, but it is now being addressed by the Government. However, the hon. Gentleman's fair criticism could be directed at past choices.

The track record has been excellent. Only a month ago, in two separate announcements, John Port school in my constituency—it is one of the largest secondary schools in the country and one of the most successful in Derbyshire—received in two wedges £4.7 million for new buildings. The money will extend places for pupils, replace redundant temporary buildings and provide new buildings. I have referred to the excellent track record, and the Budget gave me confidence that we will continue to see that level of funding and, if anything, an acceleration in it in the future. Despite my intervention on the hon. Member for Newbury (Mr. Rendel), my expression of enthusiasm for what we have had in south Derbyshire was not meant to suggest that I wished that funding to be transferred to another part of the country.

I very much welcome the announcement on early years, to which much the largest increase in expenditure has been committed. I endorse all the points made by earlier speakers about the importance of early years provision. South Derbyshire is now a relatively prosperous area, so it has not benefited from Sure Start. It has one mini Sure Start, which is a slightly different programme, and exciting ideas about the development of children centre services. That will require innovation as the area is dispersed and has one smallish town and many villages. The provision of one building to run a service might not be as appropriate a model as it would be in a larger urban environment.

My right hon. Friend the Minister for Children met representatives from Derbyshire only recently. We discussed those issues and other funding matters, and I am sure that she must share my delight at the Chancellor's announcement, which indicated that we could confidently project future growth in this sector, which would benefit my constituency as well. That is excellent news.

I wish to make one other remark on education. We need to focus much more on skills retention and on raising the skills of existing workers. The focus has rightly been on the low-skill capabilities of school leavers and those joining the work force, but one of my critical concerns is the loss of high skills in companies such as Rolls-Royce, Toyota and other manufacturing businesses that operate in the Derby area. Those skills are sometimes lost when such companies go through the strategic change that is necessary to compete in the modern world. It is a tragedy if high-quality engineering skills are lost when people learn how to run a pub, become a taxi driver or teach people how to drive. We say goodbye to long-entrenched skills at our peril. We need to look harder at models that will allow us to retain them within the local economy where they are relevant.

I come now to an issue in which I have long taken an interest, but which is pretty dry. I refer to organisational change. I was delighted to see the emphasis that the Chancellor put on the need to transform aspects of our public services. I say that because I have made many comments in the Chamber on how that might be achieved and I have urged more radical approaches in the past. I am pleased to see the Gershon review, which indicates the scope for dramatic change, and the O'Donnell review on the Inland Revenue and Customs and Excise producing concrete proposals for change. I also welcome the fact that the Department for Education and Skills is looking hard at its core office functions and the way in which those skills may be utilised better.

I want to express some cautionary words while strongly endorsing what has been said. First, in projects of such scale and complexity, specific things must be got right from the very start. For example, there needs to be clear accountable leadership of any project of such a scale. Both political leadership and managerial leadership of the specific services are required. We have all learned from civil service change that is it often extremely difficult to achieve that key aspect. It is easy to justify confused agendas and complex accountabilities, but if one goes down that route in a project of such a scale, the result is inevitably failure. It is absolutely critical to establish the principle that when we set up a change programme of such a scale, one person should be in charge, and that person should be given a great deal of flexibility and freedom to act.

Secondly, we need a clear definition and quantification of the goals of the change process and the outcome that we want at the end of it. Thirdly—this is another key aspect associated with failure—we need clarity of communication with stakeholders and constant external reference so that we look outside at other experiences and learn from other people. After reading the O'Donnell review—I shall refer to some of the remarks in the appendix later—I was delighted by the quality of comments made about that process by external advisers.

Fourthly, we need an ongoing risk analysis. The projects are likely to be extremely high risk, and they will require constant awareness of their impact on ongoing service provision. One could not talk about a higher risk project than one involving the Inland Revenue and Customs and Excise, because if things go wrong there, the impact on the Government's cash flow would cause major difficulties in a short time. It is thus vital to work to ensure that there is continuity with legacy systems and processes while we engineer change.

Fifthly, beyond the leadership of a project, we must ensure that we have skilled technicians in project leadership who have considerable freedom. It is critical that politicians do not attempt to pre-empt a large number of answers. We must give people who are challenged in such a way a great deal of freedom to think out of the box and produce their own solutions to the problems that they face.

The final requirement is perhaps not quite as transparent as the others, given the way in which the Chancellor made his announcement yesterday. Clear financial provision is required. The process represents investment to save, rather than the idea of making immediate savings or saving in the short term. There are substantial additional costs during the first year or two of changing large organisations. Incidentally, I think that it is perfectly legitimate to borrow against such costs because they represent an investment to save that can be demonstrated. Nevertheless, I would want to ensure that such spending was provided for cautiously and prudently in our expectations.

I would like to draw attention to comments made by external advisers to the O'Donnell process. John Coombe, the chief financial officer of GlaxoSmithKline, identified the need for both a chair and chief executive. The Government have not endorsed that in their organisational approach, although they make a powerful argument for clarity and accountability over the critical mass of project leadership, which is suggested by John Coombe. Nevertheless, he emphasises that "top level action people" are required in the project, which has been my experience of projects in the private sector. He says that a "big investment in taking a number of the very best people out of normal business activity" is needed if one is to achieve the change required.

Information systems will clearly be central to achievement and, to take another comment, Martin Taylor, one of the other advisers to the report, emphasised that this would require a very highly qualified chief information officer, and that the post would be one of the most important chief information officer jobs in the country. That is a substantial understatement. This is a post next to that of the chief information officer, as I would regard him, for the NHS, who has been recruited in the last year at a substantial salary, but still fairly modest in private sector terms. This is a critical post that I cannot imagine will be recruited from within the public sector. There are some large challenges within the project, and I give notice that I will certainly be watching its progress with considerable interest and some concern.

The last point that I want to dwell on is the importance of flexibility, which comes back to the speech made by the hon. Member for Epsom and Ewell (Chris Grayling). The Government produced some interesting reading as part of the Budget pack this year, and I want to refer to two of the documents—first the discussion paper on the stability and growth pact, and secondly the paper on flexibility in the UK economy, which drew out some reinforcement of the Chancellor's reference to the British model of economic success. I think that he was quite deliberately drawing a distinction between the British and the European model, as many of us would understand it, and the United States model.

The key thrust of the document on the stability and growth pact was the importance of flexibility in economic management. For example, it highlights the inflexibility of the 3 per cent. GDP deficit and admits the need to take account of overall debt levels. The hon. Gentleman did not refer to the fact that the Government have been extremely successful overall in bringing down Government debt. The document notes the continuing high debt levels of many existing eurozone member states and highlights the challenges of maintaining long-term public investment if short-term limits are set instead. It points to the challenge of the absorption of the new member states, which have very different economies from the core group of eurozone members. For example, they have much lower public debt levels, but substantial infrastructure deficiencies that would suggest long-term investment requirements needing to be funded by debt. It highlights the modest progress made in addressing the challenges of an ageing population in states within the eurozone, and it notes the challenges in responding to business cycles and the evidence to date of the use of inappropriate fiscal policies within the eurozone core states.

I read the document as a warning of the need for significant reform, both in the way in which the stability and growth pact operates, and within the economies of the core eurozone countries if we are safely to enter into closer economic union with them. I have long been an enthusiast for that, but I take the view, based on hard analysis of the benefits, that a significant amount of listening is required by our European partners to some of the successful experiences in Britain of how to manage an economy—

Chris Grayling: I very much agree with the hon. Gentleman's last comments, but does he share my concern that all too often the process of harmonisation is not about deregulation, but about regulation that brings standards into line, and, in reality, in far too many areas of our economy we are moving in the direction of what he describes as the wrong model, rather than the other way?

Mr. Todd: I think that the evidence on that is mixed. There has been some well-founded resistance to some elements of European regulation that we believe are unhelpful to a competitive economy. There has also been misinformed consideration of some of the sectors—for example, health food and herbal remedies—in which convergence is taking place. As regards the small business cited by the hon. Member for Epsom and Ewell, the lady involved may well have more difficulty in running her business in that environment. However, I would pray in aid Peter Black Healthcare Ltd. in Swadlincote—a large company that is barred from much of the European marketplace by the rule sets that prevent certain members states from importing particular kinds of non-traditional remedies, whether alternative medicines, dietary supplements or various kinds of herbal remedies. We have to balance the advantages of the larger European market that we are prevented from breaching against the disadvantages experienced by the smaller consumer sectors. There is some misunderstanding of the balance between disadvantage and advantage in adopting single European market rules.

The paper on the stability and growth pact is essentially about the need for flexibility in economic management. The paper on flexibility in the UK economy re-emphasises the importance of regulatory reform. I am delighted that my right hon. Friend the Paymaster General was able to set out in some detail the Institute of Directors' support for the Chancellor's statement. The Government clearly recognise the need for ongoing regulatory reform. Several of the major European economies need to make progress on revised labour market policies. They could also usefully learn from our reforms of the tax and benefits system to improve work rewards and investment in skills.

It is increasingly clear that a UK economic model is emerging. I shall explain my definition of that. It combines the advantages of a broadly liberal regulatory framework—I accept that there is some disagreement about that, but it is hard to argue against if one measures it against those of other European economies—with a recognition that the cost of social provision should be shared between citizens and society at large. Wholly socialised or wholly privatised models carry major inefficiencies. The hon. Member for West Worcestershire (Sir Michael Spicer) talked about health care models. Although there are failings in our NHS—no one would claim that it is perfect—we tend to forget that the cost of public provision is offset by our private contributions. Most of us pay substantial sums for prescriptions, dentistry, opticians and other elements of health provision. That mix is rather more efficient than a decentralised system whereby the state provides support for insurance or a system of claiming after treatment, which carries huge administrative costs. There is plenty of evidence for the strengths of our system.

The UK model also embodies a simple framework to protect workers and to ensure that the value of work is consistently rewarded; a commitment to liberalised markets while recognising the social costs of raw market mechanisms; an emphasis on raising skill levels; and an emphasis on strengthening the infrastructure of innovation and increasing rewards for entrepreneurs.

Yesterday, the Chancellor set out the major tasks that lie ahead before we can participate in closer financial union with other European states. He drew an encouraging picture of growth and prosperity in this country, although we must always have some caution about the competitive environment in which our country and our businesses have to work. However, I was filled with substantial confidence that we have a strategy that should work—and that is working—much better than the European model or even, to some extent, the United States model, about which Opposition Members have made some negative comments.

Mr. Mark Field (Cities of London and Westminster) (Con): Let us face facts: this is a rather dull Budget, although I hope that the Front-Bench spokesmen will agree that this debate has not been quite as dull. I shall touch on one or two education points later, but would first like to address other issues.

Among many economics experts, this will not go down as the most exciting or innovative Budget that there has ever been, although in many ways that might be regarded as a compliment to the Chancellor of the Exchequer. Certainly, there have never been so many post-Budget briefings, breakfasts or brunches prepared in vain, and never was there so little on which commentators could report.

What is there to say, then, from this side of the House? As I am very much on-message, I should refer to the third-term Labour tax rises that are on their way, or the "credit-card Budget from a credit-card Chancellor".—[Official Report, 17 March 2004; Vol. 419, c. 337.]

I hope that that shows that, some 72 hours after leaving the Whips Office—I see that my Deputy Chief Whip is here—I am still very much on-message, at least so far as the Budget is concerned.

Let us make no mistake: this is a political Budget, and a Budget that is very much on hold. It is fair to say that the Chancellor and the Treasury Front-Bench team will be saying a silent little prayer that the economy remain in much the same state as it is in now for the next 14 or 15 months. It is with that in mind that so little has been done in the Budget to change the economic outlook. The key question, now that the Chancellor has reaffirmed his growth projections and they have been proved correct during past year—although many in my party had their doubts 12 months ago—is why there has been such a gap in his revenue. That augurs badly, not, I suspect, for the period this side of a general election, but for the medium term.

As a Member representing a capital city constituency, I shall focus on one or two issues close to the hearts of Londoners, especially the proposals to spend more public money on countering terrorism, which have important implications, and the much broader issue of housing here in the capital city. I suspect that that will be the subject of a much longer future debate, but it was made clear from the introduction of Kate Barker's paper on housing on the day of the Budget that it contained some pointers for the future of public finances.

If the Chancellor's words are to be believed, as I suspect that they are in this instance, this is a self-styled Budget for education, science and enterprise. I am tempted to suggest that the Government were, to a certain extent, making that up as they went along, because in their last manifesto, if that was to be believed, they claimed that Labour had legislated against the introduction of top-up fees. We all know what is likely to happen on that, if they are successful in getting their Higher Education Bill on to the statute book in the months ahead.

It is right for the Government to identify education and science as key. However, some complacency has been shown in a continued comparison of the UK's economic performance with that of the other G7 nations. The reality is that the world has moved on. This side of an election, there is little doubt that our economic performance will tower above that of France and Germany, as it has done since the mid-1990s. Surely, however, we should be aiming higher and more extensively. I was interested to hear the eloquent contribution of the hon. Member for South Derbyshire (Mr. Todd). He made constant reference to the European and north American models, but economic models seem to me to go well beyond the region this side and just the other side of the Atlantic. I look far beyond Paris, Frankfurt and New York for the great competition.

For those of my age group—I am still, by a few months, in my 30s, as I am sure the Paymaster-General is. She certainly looks as though she is in that age group. I hope that I shall now get a good reception in Bristol, South the next time I am there—and for younger people entering the world of work, there is a realisation that the real economic capitals of the world will not just be those that we already know. They will also be places such as Shanghai and Bombay. Perhaps it is unfair to compare growth rates in those fast-growing young capitalist economies with those in the UK, but those economies are now the relevant competition. The growth rate in China is roughly 9 per cent.

The great debate that is taking place on outsourcing presupposes to a great extent that we have much to lose from our competitive relationships with India and China. It strikes me, however, that nothing could be further from the truth. These are our traditional longstanding trading partners, as they have been for many centuries. I represent the City of London, which has been the heart of our global trading arrangements, and I believe that we should be proud of continuing to foster those links with China and India, which will be the great economic powers of the second half of this century.

When I look at the strength of the United States of America, I feel that Europe is rapidly going downhill in the league table. I do not say that from a wildly Eurosceptic viewpoint, not least as I have European blood running through my very veins, but we as a nation must be proud to foster our longstanding links with China and India, and I hope that we shall continue to do so in the decades ahead. The relevant comparisons should not just be with the G7 nations; they must be with these other important global trading nations.

There is a paucity of ambition at the core of the Budget. The Chancellor's idea of enterprise seems all too often to be an academic exercise, rather than a practical one. Let us face it, compared with many G7 nations, our economy is in a good state. There seem to be few direct problems on the horizon, at least this side of May 2005.

What do businessmen in small or growing enterprises want? I was in that position before I entered the House less than three years ago. I was a businessman in an enterprise that I had set up from scratch in the mid-1990s and built up to a £2 million turnover and a dozen staff. That is a standard size for a small business. I personally have to thank the electoral deluge of 1997 for delaying my entry to this place. Had that not happened, I would not have had the benefit of seeing a business growing in that way. Let us be honest, a lot of the changes that have been introduced, particularly in regard to capital gains tax for owner-managers, are greatly to be welcomed. I admit that I personally benefited from those changes, as have many businessmen across the UK.

There are real problems ahead, however. There is more and more regulation and red tape. I know that that is a fanciful thing to say, and that we have to look at the specifics. I was a smallish businessman—as I have said, we had a dozen staff—and my co-director and I bore much of the burden on a day-to-day basis. We did not have a large human resources department or a payroll department. We had a lot of very young employees, many of whom had had graduate loans and therefore came within the scope of our payroll arrangements. I remember getting on a daily basis from the local authority all kinds of literature which had to be filled in. We also had bits of paper from the Office for National Statistics. There were more and more burdens. Obviously, the filling in of a VAT return filled our hearts with great gloom, not just because of the sums of money that we had to pay but because of the sheer logistics of filling in the return during the last week of every quarter.

There are more and more burdens, and if we are going to rely on smaller businesses getting larger—realistically, they have to be the vehicle for employment growth—there needs to be a lighter touch. I have a great fear that the Government, in following what the hon. Member for South Derbyshire might describe as the European model, have succeeded at times only in placing more burdens on small businessmen.

There seems little doubt that we will see and hear a lot more about the notion of light-touch regulation, and I think all of us were in the Chamber only a week or so ago when the Penrose report was introduced by the Financial Secretary. At least, we had her spin on the conclusions of that report in relation to the near collapse of Equitable Life, which was that an over-light regulatory regime before 1999 was responsible for some of its travails.

I suspect that the story is even more complicated than the one that I am presenting at this juncture, but we could learn some wrong lessons and I fear that, in the run-up to the next general election, we will hear much more from Conservative Members about too much red tape and too much regulation, while Lord Penrose's report on Equitable Life will be cited in opposition to that notion. Indeed, we are perhaps already starting that debate.

It is fair to say that the Chancellor has been a significant political figure in view not only of his longevity, but of how he has managed the economy. Many Conservative Members had great fears immediately after the 1997 election that have not come to pass, but I fear for the economy in the medium term and there are problems that will probably be for us to fix when we are in government. Above all, there seems to be little sign of the end of the great borrowing. Today's borrowing is, almost inevitably, tomorrow's taxes. That augers ill for the future.

There has been a particular rise in personal borrowing, whether it is to do with housing equity release or credit cards, and even the Chancellor accepts in the Red Book that the savings ratio cannot be expected to rise over the next year or two, so one has to ask just how sustainable the borrowing is, especially if interest rates go up.

My great fear is for my younger constituents—people in their 20s or 30s—many of whom are relatively well paid. Some work in financial services in the City of London, but very few see any value in investing for the future, at least in a pension. Many will perhaps invest in property, which might help only to ratchet up a property boom, especially in London and the south-east. There has to be a great fear that that will end in tears.

If consumer and Government-led consumption are the only means to continue the expansion of the economy, which seems to be suggested by many of the figures that we see, there is a real risk of overheating, not least, as has rightly been pointed out, because we have near full employment. If we rely on the rapid raising of interest rates to prevent that from happening, there will be worrying problems ahead.

I also have a concern, which a number of my hon. Friends have expressed and I guess will continue to express during our debates over the next few days, about the vast growth in public sector employment over the last two years. It is always rather invidious for those of us who have spent our working lives in the private sector suddenly to berate the public sector in such a way when we enter it. However, there are great concerns that much of the job growth of the last two years, even if not necessarily of the last six or seven, has been in the public rather than the private sector.

I also want to make a small but important point on the tax issue. Funnily enough, this is one of those opportune moments, as one of my constituents got in touch on the morning of the debate while I was sketching out a few notes. My constituent lives in Mayfair, which is not quite the untrammelled and affluent area that many might assume. It has a mix of accommodation. She complained that she finds herself in a higher tax band, although she works in the public sector. Of course, the number of people paying higher rate tax has increased massively over the last seven or eight years, especially here in London and the south-east, as tax bands have not risen in accordance with the relatively large increases in average pay.

That is a particular problem in London, although I accept that it is difficult to have entirely localised rules. The Chancellor, to this limited extent, should at least be congratulated in relation to the benefits system and on recognising the particular difficulties of the capital. As a result, there have been London-based allowances. In relation to much of public sector pay, I hope that there will be a more meaningful London weighting, which, I guess, will also have to apply to other hot spots in the south-east.

I want to make a couple of comments on the London issue as a whole. First and foremost, on the terrorist threat, all of us, particularly after the events exactly a week ago today in Madrid, have at the back of our minds a fear of a terrorist attack. It is important that life should go on, and as there are a number of other London Members present, let me say that we all know that we must try to instil a sense of confidence and optimism in our constituents about going about their everyday life. In many ways, failure to do so is almost allowing the terrorists to win their battle. But it is urgent that proper provision be made.

The Government have a clear understanding of the problem at stake, which has been at stake in London for the past two and a half years. Coupled with that is a clear understanding that more powers have been required. I, for one, have spoken up often in criticism of some of what appear to be the quite draconian powers introduced by the Home Office. None the less, it has recognised the threat—in my view, perhaps overstated it—and we have those powers on the statute book.

It seems to me that we need a proper civil contingency protection force in the capital city, and significantly more resource needs to be associated with that if we are to protect all our fellow citizens. For example, there are only 7,000 people in such a protection force in the UK as a whole, and London's is woefully short of what is required and heavily reliant on Territorial Army reservists. As far as London is concerned, the great problem with the TA is that our main London regiment finds itself stationed in Iraq. Were there to be a major incident, perhaps of a far more violent nature even than that in Madrid last week, it is difficult to see how our civil contingency force would be able to cope with that.

I therefore welcome the notion from the Chancellor that he is putting more money into this area, and I hope that it will be directed urgently towards some of the key targets in the capital city. It is a depressing state of affairs when both the Mayor of London and the chief of police, Sir John Stevens, refer, as they did earlier this week, to the inevitability of a London attack. If it is so inevitable, we must act urgently.

On the issue of housing, which will be subject to much broader debate in the months ahead, Miss Barker's watchwords seems to me to be "dictate and provide". If implemented, that has a worrying implication for much of this country. In London, however, the problem may be the converse, because the delivery of affordable housing targets in the Mayor's recently published London plan depends on grant being made available under planning agreements by private developers under section 106. The current policy of the Housing Corporation, however, is that such section 106 agreements should be self-funding and the grants would be available only in exceptional circumstances. It seems to me that London, under this Government, has failed to meet its obligations on new homes since 1997. Certainly, the new build rate is considerably lower than it was during the first half of the 1990s. I hope that Miss Barker's paper, although it offers little hope for London, will at least be the starting point of a debate on this important issue, which will obviously have an impact on the public finances.

The economy is likely to be in a relatively steady state this side of a general election. One of the difficulties about being in opposition is that often things need to go wrong for great advantages to flow towards one's party for purely electoral purposes. Certainly, as I represent the Cities of London and Westminster, the last thing on earth I want to see is a sustained downturn, and in so far as there was a slowdown in the last two years there are distinct signs from the City of London that the corner has been turned. Some major mid-term problems are mounting for this Government. They will have to arrest large-scale borrowing, both public and private, and if steps are not taken to arrest that problem this side of a general election, there is potential for a much more precipitate increase in interest rates in the second half of 2005 and the risk of much higher taxes to be paid.

I look forward to hearing what the Paymaster General has to say when she winds up the debate later. No doubt we will continue to debate these issues—me with my London hat on, and more specifically, representing the City of London—in the months ahead.

5.5 pm

Sir John Butterfill (Bournemouth, West) (Con): Yesterday, the Chancellor spoke of the need to smooth out the economy with Government intervention. I think that we all agree that it is important for a Chancellor to smooth out the variations and the stops and goes to which economies are prone by means of some form of intervention, from time to time.

I well remember when we were in the grip of the last world recession, at the time of the last Conservative Government. We borrowed extensively to cover the difficulties that the recession had caused our economy. As a result, the recession in the United Kingdom was both shorter and shallower than in any other part of the western world. What I consider a new departure is the Chancellor saying that a time when our economy is growing faster than most of its competitors is appropriate to increase borrowing at a faster, almost unprecedented rate. That strikes me as the reverse of the normally accepted discipline.

The Chancellor says that he is following his golden rule. He says that, in terms of percentage of gross domestic product, we are still within reasonable parameters. However, a large proportion of the growth in our GDP has been caused by public expenditure and public projects—what the Chancellor is keen to call investment in the public services, although he defines investment rather differently from most of us. Most of us see investment as capital expenditure on things that will produce benefit for the future. The Chancellor seems to apply the term to any payment for the public services, including the payment of current running expenditure. That is really rather different, and may not produce a yield for the future.

We put ourselves in great danger by extending public expenditure in that way, through borrowing, when it is not underpinned by tax revenues from the private sector. We are in danger of running into all sorts of trouble in the not-too-distant future. This is not just my view, but that of the Organisation for Economic Co-operation and Development and the International Monetary Fund. We should heed the warning given by my hon. Friend the Member for West Worcestershire (Sir Michael Spicer) that trouble could be around the corner. At the very least, substantial tax increases could be around the corner if the Chancellor continues down his unusual chosen path.

Industrial performance in this country is not particularly good, and our international competitiveness is declining. All that suggests the need for much more caution than the Chancellor seems to have shown. His present borrowings will have to be repaid some time, and they will have to be repaid from taxation. They cannot be repaid from more borrowings: that process cannot continue indefinitely.

The Government's record for making savings, on which the Chancellor placed some emphasis, is not particularly good. In fact, it is not good at all. The Government have not made savings in the public services—or, at any rate, when it has been possible to make them, they have been very marginal. The idea that the Chancellor will be able to make savings of the scale required to meet the strategy upon which he has embarked is worrying. He seems to believe that he can make savings by tinkering with the number of people employed in Government Departments, which admittedly has grown out of all proportion. Making the real savings necessary requires substantial deregulation and restructuring of the way that public services are delivered. I heard nothing in his speech yesterday to indicate that he has fundamental restructuring in mind.

Education is a good example of the need for restructuring. Although the number of teachers has increased, there has been a much larger increase in the number of civil servants who supervise them. Surely it would be much better to give devolution to the providers of education and allow them to decide priorities, rather than have teachers permanently accountable to armies of local authority officials and civil servants who soak up a disproportionate share of the education budget.

The hon. Member for Warrington, North (Helen Jones) made an articulate speech and I am sorry that she is not in her place. She asked to whom schools would be accountable in the circumstances that I have described. They would be accountable to some degree to the state and to the local authorities providing funding but fundamentally they should be accountable to their customers—parents and pupils. Unfortunately, the Government are still locked in a public sector mindset, believing that schools should be accountable only to ever-growing central Government. Going down that road will not achieve the savings that the Chancellor hopes and needs to make if he is to enjoy any success with his long-term economic policies.

Pensions were not dealt with to the extent that I would have liked. I was pleased that the announcement about the lifetime limit made some recognition of the universal opinion among the actuarial profession and others that the previously proposed limit of £1.4 million was inadequate and did not correspond to the real cost of the previous annual limit converted to a lifetime limit. The figure of £1.5 million rising to £1.8 million probably more accurately reflects reality. Despite the fact that that range has been given the imprimatur of the National Audit Office report, it is still at the lower end of the scale considered necessary by the actuarial profession and the industry, who suggest a figure nearer £2 million.

I am never sure where the figure of £1.4 million originated. In a previous speech to the House, I had presumed that it had been calculated by staff at the

[Sir John Butterfill]

Government Actuary's Department and said that they were the guilty men. The Government Actuary wrote a rather irate letter to me, stating that he had not even been consulted on that figure and certainly did not agree with it. He believed that figure had been calculated by a private sector actuary consulted by the Government, whose identity no one knows. It is odd that the Government's own actuary, who would normally be expected to calculate such a figure, was not involved.

I am disappointed that the Government have not so far published much information in their own publications or in notes provided by the Inland Revenue and Customs and Excise about what is to happen to legacy systems. I know that the new procedures are supposed to sweep them all away, but it is not clear how that will be achieved. I hope that Ministers will explain.

I am concerned about a number of matters, but one of the most important is what will happen to the retained benefits regime. If we are to have a lifetime limit, we will not need the retained benefits regime, which causes enormous problems for the trustees and administrators of pension schemes and creates a great deal of work for civil servants. Similarly, if we are to have a lifetime limit we will not need an annual limit. In such a situation, I see no reason why a restriction should be placed on the time at which the huge amount of money that a person might be fortunate enough to earn at a particular point in their career—as a sports star, for example—is injected into their pension pot. Again, it would be interesting to hear what the Government have to say about that.

I was pleased to note the Government's willingness to establish real estate investment trusts. They will prove valuable not merely in assisting in the provision of housing—a desirable objective in itself, about which the Government have spoken—but as a much more flexible and convenient arrangement for general investment by pension funds. One problem for pension funds is that, when a secure form of investment is needed that matches the requirements of payments to their pensioners, such funds are forced increasingly into bonds rather than equities. But the bond market is very restricted, is producing very low yields and is nothing like as desirable a vehicle as it used to be.

The use of real estate investment trusts would overcome the problem of illiquidity in investing in property. One problem for trustees investing in property is that they cannot always readily sell the asset at a time of their choosing. Through a REIT, they would be able to sell what effectively amount to shares in a building simply and quickly, and the element of illiquidity would disappear. The advantage of such a secure investment over bonds is even greater than it may initially appear. There have been a number of academic studies on the prospect for REITs and the yields and stability of property investment. Members may be interested to know that, on average, the aggregate yields on property have been double those on bonds in the past 10 to 30 years, yet the price stability of property has actually been better. There have been fewer fluctuations in property values than in the capital value of bonds.

For all those reasons, REITs could perform a very useful function by making trustees' investment in pension funds far more attractive to those who will benefit. That might help the Government with their own protection scheme, while creating an alternative vehicle to bonds through the formation of annuities. If annuities could be underwritten by REITs rather than bonds, the current problem of very low bond yields—resulting in annuities being worth only half what people were expecting on retirement—could be solved very quickly. I hope that the Government will actively and speedily pursue their idea of introducing REITs.

I also welcome the Government's proposals to clarify the tax treatment of immediate needs annuities. Their tax status was in some doubt and the clarification is extremely helpful, particularly for the increasing number of elderly people who are living longer in our society and will need long-term care. The ability to fund long-term care in a tax-efficient way is an interesting and important issue.

What will be the position on lump sum payments made to care home operators? It is common in the United States that people pay an upfront sum to provide lifetime care, but what will be the taxation position here of the notional value of the care thereby provided? Will it be dealt with in the same way as immediate needs annuities or will it be necessary to purchase a specific annuity from an insurance company? It may provide better value for the older person to make US-style lump sum payments rather than pay amounts to an insurance company to provide a traditional annuity.

I shall now deal with the Government's proposals to encourage investment. I am a little disappointed that they have not been able to go further than they have, although the new incentives for venture capital trusts are indeed welcome.

Dawn Primarolo indicated assent.

Sir John Butterfill: The Paymaster General nods. She knows of my long-term interest in that matter, but I no longer have any declarable interest in that sector. I believe that encouraging venture capital trusts is good for the UK economy.

There are still problems with enterprise investment schemes, and here I must declare an interest. If a young and growing company that benefits from an EIS needs to broaden its base by merging with another company—either taking over a company in the same sector or being absorbed in a reverse takeover—one problem is that the tax status is lost. Very often it is in the interest of a small emerging company to have a merger with a similarly small and emerging company, but the fact that the tax status will be lost if that happens is a matter to which the Treasury should give consideration. The risk to the original investors remains just as apparent.

In respect of other savings and what can be done to create help for the real economy, I am terribly disappointed. There is almost nothing in the Budget to encourage saving in general. There is nothing to encourage more saving in traditional pensions—indeed, at the moment, quite the reverse—and even the limited vehicles that the Government have provided, such as individual savings accounts, are having their limits reduced. The Government say that they want to encourage pensions, so why on earth are they reducing the limits in tax-assisted savings schemes such as ISAs? I find that puzzling.

It is as a result of the Government's general approach to savings in the economy that we now have possibly the lowest savings ratio, which has gone down from 10 per cent. to 5 per cent. That is incredibly sad, because without a vibrant savings regime, the long-term capital for British industry and commerce cannot be available. Everything cannot be done by public investment and I hope that the Government will reflect further on that matter.

I am pleased that the Government have increased the threshold for inheritance tax, though by far too little, given that most inheritance tax today is paid on the value of the property or the family home when people die. The increases in the threshold for inheritance tax have in no way kept up with increases in the value of property. That is true not just in London and the south-east. Of course, that rise is especially apparent in London and the south-east, and in the whole of the south of England. In my constituency of Bournemouth, and in Poole as well, property values are among the highest in the UK. People living in fairly ordinary properties are therefore caught by the inheritance tax regime, but I am not sure that that was the intention when the regime was introduced. It was intended to catch the really rich, who could afford to pay a proportion of their inheritance in tax—although the seriously rich always seem to find ways of avoiding that, and it is the modestly rich who tend to be the ones who have to pay.

I hope that the Government will consider the matter again. It has always seemed to me an anomaly that, once the threshold has been exceeded, inheritance tax is payable on the whole estate and not just on the excess. That seems to go against normal taxation procedures when a threshold is involved.

I turn now to the proposals for the planning gain supplement, about which I am puzzled. How will it interface with capital gains tax? A liability for CGT is normally created when planning permission is given for the development of a piece of land, be it a large acreage or just a small back-garden plot. I seek an assurance that the planning gain supplement will not be a double tax, on top of the CGT that will be payable.

The supplement is not new. I remember that, a long time ago, it was called development land tax and was introduced by Harold Wilson's Government. Its history was not auspicious, as one of its main effects was to discourage substantial landowners from getting planning consent to develop their properties. That was the opposite of what this Government intend, as they want to encourage more land to be developed.

The development land tax was so effective in persuading people not to develop their land that the whole idea was scrapped in the end. I warn the Government that the new proposal will go the same way if they do not structure the planning gain supplement so that it gives landowners the incentive to develop their properties. The development land tax was certainly not lamented, and a lot more land was made available for development after it was abolished.

What will the scope of the new tax be? Will it go right down to Mr. and Mrs. Bloggs when they sell a little piece off the side or back of their garden so that a single property can be built? If so, that would be a huge discouragement: not only would the value of their home be diminished because they had sold off part of their garden, but they might also have to pay both CGT and planning gain supplement. If that happened, I venture to suggest that most people would decide that the project would not be worth considering. That in turn might reduce the possibility that urban areas could be redeveloped to increase urban density, which is something that I think the Government wish to encourage. It may inhibit urban renewal as a whole. Perhaps the Government could think about introducing a de minimis rule for planning gain supplement to ensure that it does not create such a burden that people are discouraged from making land available for development.

I conclude by repeating that although the Budget contains some proposals that have merit, its overall economic strategy means that the Government are embarking on an extremely dangerous course. I therefore worry about the future of our economy, and in particular about the possibility that large and unforeseen tax increases will follow in the not-too-distant future.

5.29 pm

Chris Ruane (Vale of Clwyd) (Lab): I apologise, Mr. Deputy Speaker, for arriving late. I have been working on my Adjournment debate for six o'clock.

I should like to talk about the Budget's impact on Wales and specifically my constituency. The announcements made yesterday will help us to build on the achievements made in my constituency in the past seven years. The Chancellor was right to spend the first 20 minutes of his speech yesterday outlining what the Government have brought about in the past seven years. We have had the longest period of sustained growth for 200 years, the lowest interest rates for the past 40 years and the lowest unemployment for the past 30 years. In the early 1990s, there were 4,500 people unemployed in my constituency; now we are down to 900. Unemployment has almost disappeared in the 32 council wards of Denbighshire. It is concentrated in two wards—the south-west and the west ward of Rhyl—which account for 40 per cent. of the overall unemployment. The Chancellor is right to target funding on specific wards so that we can tackle unemployment and poverty in those wards that have not gained as much as others in the past seven years.

Some 270,000 households in Wales include pensioners over 70. In my constituency, 17,000 pensioners will benefit from the additional £100 to help with council tax rises. That builds on the £200 that we have already allocated for winter fuel payments—£300 for those over 80. That is in marked contrast to the attitude of the former Conservative Minister who, when there was a cold snap and pensioners froze to death in their own homes, recommended that pensioners go to the second-hand shop and buy some extra woollens to keep themselves warm through the winter. That shows the contrast between the philosophies of the two parties. The extra help comes on top of the help that we have given in the past: the free bus service for pensioners in Wales; free television licences for those over 75; and free eye tests, dental tests and prescriptions for pensioners.

I believe that the allocation for higher and further education in Wales for 2006–07 will be £99 million and for 2007–08 will be £219 million. Tomorrow at 10 o'clock, I shall have a meeting at Rhyl FE college in my constituency to discuss finance. Finance is tight, but we have built on our successes in the past seven years and established colleges in my constituency—Rhyl college was established in 1998 and Denbigh college was established in 2000. They are outposts of the main Llandrillo college, which has 23,000 students and is one of the biggest FE colleges in the UK.

[Chris Ruane]

The colleges provide courses for people without proper literacy and for young people on the skill build programme, women's enterprise courses and a range of apprenticeships, such as in gas fitting. They are extending the ladder of opportunity into geographical areas where it has never existed. People are being given opportunities to improve their skills and make the most of the colleges in their communities.

The £8.5 billion increase in the education budget is most welcome. I was a primary school teacher for 15 years, in which time I only once taught a class of fewer than 30; that was a class of 26. The largest number of pupils I taught was 39. One knows the difference between 26 and 39. The extra funding for education will allow us to build on the successes in reducing class sizes in infant and junior schools over the past seven years.

I am also pleased that an extra £650 million will go into Sure Start. I had an Adjournment debate six weeks ago on the importance of education from nought to three. I am pleased that the budget for that has increased from £198 million in 1998 to £500 million now—it was due to increase to £1.5 billion. With the £600 million in the Budget, it will increase even further. That is money well spent. Fifty per cent. of what a child learns is learned before the age of five, and virtually 100 per cent. of linguistic ability is developed before the age of three.

In a long-term study in America, children were taped talking with their parents for one hour a week over a three-year period. The study included children from both professional and working-class families, and from families on benefit. The children from professional families had 50 million words spoken to them over the three-year period, while the children from families on benefit had only 12 million words spoken to them. The children from professional families received 700,000 encouragements during that period, with only 120,000 negative comments. However, the figures for the children from families on benefits were 120,000 negatives and only 60,000 positives.

As children develop and become adults, such factors have a fantastic impact on their self-perception and their ability to learn. We need to expand Sure Start to give fragile families in our communities the support that they need. That will benefit them as individuals and families and it will benefit us as a society. The expansion of Sure Start is most welcome and we should build on it.

I am especially interested in research and development. Again, I can report success in my constituency: the St. Asaph business park lay empty for seven years while the previous Conservative Government were in office—although I have to give them credit for building that £11 million project—but now there are 2,500 jobs at the park. The pièce de résistance is the £15 million objective 1 project for a research and incubation centre: OpTIC—the Optronics Technology and Incubation Centre—will be opened in two months' time. There will be 24 units at the centre and it will work on our existing optoelectronics strength in north Wales, where there are 35 optoelectronic companies, with 2,500 workers. We shall create ties between those companies and universities around the UK and the world, so that anybody with a good idea—whether from a university or the workplace—can find support at the incubation centre. The ideas can be checked out and finance arranged, with help available for two years. Every two years, an extra 24 high-tech companies will contribute to the north Walian economy. The research and grants that we have made available will allow us to expand.

As well as OpTIC, we have CAST—the Centre for Advanced Software Technology—a software project in the Bangor area. I should like the Welsh Development Agency and companies in Wales to look into developing more such techniums—research and incubation centres. We could thus draw on our existing strengths in north Wales, in sectors such as aerospace—at Broughton, we have the biggest aerospace factory in Europe—renewable energy and packaging. Those are the ideas that I want to take back to the WDA. The Chancellor has given us the tools and we should finish the job.

I am pleased that there were no cuts in the policing budget and that we shall be allowed to build on our strengths. Since 1997, an extra 200 officers have been appointed to the North Wales police force; the number has increased from 1,300 to 1,500. One hundred of those officers were financed from grants and funding from the Government, and 100 were financed from internal savings. The North Wales force is one of the most efficient in the UK and its savings have gone into front-line policing.

Only six community support officers are currently based in north Wales, all in the west ward of Rhyl—the poorest ward in Wales. I should like the number of CSOs to be expanded and I hope that the available finance can be used to do that.

All in all, the Budget was excellent. It will help my constituency to build on its strengths and I look forward to the money being spent wisely to benefit individuals, families and society in north Wales.

5.38 pm

Mr. Stephen O'Brien (Eddisbury) (Con): We have had an interesting, informative and stimulating debate, although it has not been over-attended by Members from either side of the House, due to the nature of the parliamentary diary. The debate was opened expertly with a great speech from my hon. Friend the Member for Westmorland and Lonsdale (Mr. Collins). As the hon. Member for Vale of Clwyd (Chris Ruane) finished his speech slightly earlier than anticipated, my hon. Friend has not yet returned to the Chamber, but no doubt he will enjoy reading these comments.

My hon. Friend raised serious issues about education that had been left unanswered by the Budget. The enormous strengths of the approach and policies proposed by the Opposition were proved both by the list of our policies that my hon. Friend gave the House and by the fact that the Secretary of State for Education and Skills did not contest them. Indeed, the Government are adopting some of our policies, which, of course, we welcome—even if half of them have been re-branded by the Government, who are particularly good at re-branding and spin.

The Secretary of State followed the excellent speech by my hon. Friend the Member for Westmorland and Lonsdale, and he has done me the courtesy of explaining that he cannot be here for the winding-up speeches. Speaking of notable absences, he will not be at the NUT conference on Easter Sunday, unlike the shadow Secretary of State for Public Services, Health and Education, my hon. Friend the Member for South Suffolk (Mr. Yeo), who will attend. As a result of the Secretary of State's response to my hon. Friend the Member for Westmorland and Lonsdale, my hon. Friend the Member for South Suffolk will have an opportunity to discuss Labour cuts to the schools budget, which became apparent during the debate, with the NUT. Those cuts contrast with the Conservative commitments detailed by my hon. Friend the Member for Westmorland and Lonsdale and, indeed, my right hon. Friend the shadow Chancellor.

When the Secretary of State was invited to attend the NUT conference, he said that he had something better to do on Easter Sunday, although he does not know what it is yet—when one digs a hole for oneself, how deep can one get? If that were not bad enough, he spent just seven minutes trying to justify his policies and 23 minutes discussing ours—proof, if proof were needed, that we are setting the education agenda with our policies to give control and choice to parents through pupil passports, which will give good schools the freedom and ability to expand. The Government want to choke off that choice and control.

The hon. Member for Newbury (Mr. Rendel) spoke for the Liberal Democrats. He stood in for the hon. Member for Harrogate and Knaresborough (Mr. Willis), who has unfortunately lost his voice. I am sure that all Labour and Conservative Members wish him well in recovering his voice, which, every time he uses it, tends to remind us why we are not Liberal Democrats.

We heard from the Chairman of the Education and Skills Committee, the hon. Member for Huddersfield (Mr. Sheerman), who is not in his place. He forcefully asserted his right as Chairman of the Committee to be political if he wants to be. His contribution was characteristically partisan—having served on that Committee under his chairmanship, I did not doubt that it would be.

My hon. Friend the Member for West Worcestershire (Sir Michael Spicer) made a clear speech on the genuine worry and concern within our economy about the severe decline in productivity rates since 1997. He also made an important point about the difficulty of holding the Government to account and of seeing a full picture of the economy when the Government will not publish the relevant tables of productivity rates.

Mr. Todd: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. O'Brien: Given the time, I must decline. The hon. Gentleman had a lot longer than I have to make his contribution.

I dispute the claim by the hon. Member for Warrington, North (Helen Jones) that the whole world of Warrington began in 1997—I remember often being in Warrington, which is near where I live, before that year. However, I share her absolute determination that the west coast main line must be improved, because it is fundamental for both her constituents and mine up in the north-west.

In a characteristically well-crafted and wide-ranging speech, my hon. Friend the Member for Epsom and Ewell (Chris Grayling) discussed the genuine burden of cumulative regulation. When the Government are charged with over-regulating and imposing burdens on business, they often use the defence of asking which regulations should be repealed. Of course, there are several candidates, but given the precedent that the Government have set of waiting for our proposals and then rebranding and using our good ideas, I am sure that we will reveal our candidates sufficiently close to the date of the next election—whenever that is—so that the Government do not have time to do that. The Government should look at the cumulative effect, and we will continue to hold them to account on that issue.

The hon. Member for South Derbyshire (Mr. Todd) focused on early years education. I listened carefully to what I thought was a good speech about the culture of organisational change, an area in which we have both been involved. It was a helpful contribution, as was the speech from my hon. Friend the Member for Cities of London and Westminster (Mr. Field), who stood up ably for his constituents, especially those in the City of London. He was followed by my hon. Friend the Member for Bournemouth, West (Mr. Butterfill), whose authoritative survey enabled the hon. Member for Vale of Clwyd to refer to the particular interests of Wales.

It is all too easy to lapse into considering only the broad sweep of the Budget, and the Chancellor is especially keen on doing so. However, we have to look at the detail and how it affects people's daily lives. It is an essential doctrine of democracy that there should be no taxation without representation. However, the Government appear to think—and more and more people feel the effect—that everybody is a crook or potentially a crook and has a duty to pay tax unless they can demonstrate that they do not owe it. Indeed, the Paymaster General and I discussed that issue in proceedings on last year's Finance Bill. That has meant a change in the burden of proof in terms of the payment of tax, as a result of the Government's desperation to levy money from the populace. The Government have moved away from the old and proven position that they have to prove that an individual owes a tax before they can seek to collect it.

One example is the 33,000 van drivers who will face a huge increase in their tax liabilities if they use their vans out of work time. Basic rate taxpayers will suffer an increase from £100 to £600. Higher rate taxpayers will see an increase from £500 to £3,000. The Paymaster General will doubtless seek to justify that increase, but the big question is, who will police it? The Government have already asked accountants and lawyers to act as snoopers. Will they now ask schoolteachers and school bus drivers to report parents who take their children to school in a van? The increasing tendency towards a snooper society is a grave danger.

It is a similar situation for small companies. More than 100,000 of them will now pay 19 per cent. tax on distributed dividends. Those sole traders and micro-businesses were encouraged by the Chancellor to incorporate, through his 2002 policy of nil rate corporation tax for the first £10,000 of profits. Thousands went to the expense and effort of doing just that. We debated the issue considerably in proceedings on the last Finance Bill and the year before, but the Government have decided to backtrack on their position. Those individuals and small businesses will have to pay for the Government's mistakes and miscalculations, and that should not be allowed to happen. There will be opportunities later in the debate on the Budget and in Committee for many of the details to be considered, but despite the rhetoric the Budget fails when it comes to small businesses.

The Government's borrowing is causing grave concern, not least because everybody recognises, with sheer common sense, that if the Government now put up the amount borrowed—effectively on each household's credit card—to £6,300, that has to be repaid. If the Government, in making any efficiency savings that they can deliver, then spend further on public services, that will have to come out of tax rises if there were to be a Labour third term. We have explained how that can be avoided without affecting the front-line public services that people deserve. I hope and very much wish that the Government will now listen to the much more sensible alternatives that would avoid Labour's third-term tax rises.

5.50 pm

The Paymaster General (Dawn Primarolo): We have now had two days of debate on the Budget and more than 25 Members on both sides have contributed. It has been an interesting debate and many interesting points have been raised, as they have been this afternoon.

The key themes of Budget 2004, as announced yesterday by my right hon. Friend the Chancellor, is to lock in the economic stability of this country to ensure that this stability endures and to enable Britain to rise to the challenges of the future global economy. The hon. Member for Cities of London and Westminster (Mr. Field) touched on that issue several times, as did other hon. Members, and I shall return to it.

We have to enable Britain to become a world economic leader in this new global age. We need to make the long-term commitments to invest in the drivers of future prosperity—education, science and enterprise. There is general agreement on both sides of the Chamber that that should be our objective. We are able to do this as a Government because of the existing strengths of our economy.

Since 1997, Britain has had sustained growth and, since 2000, our growth has outperformed the European Union area, Japan and even the United States. In the last year, the economy grew by 2.3 per cent., meeting all Treasury expectations and despite the reckoning of Opposition Members who are at it again today by trying to undermine those forecasts.

In addition, this sustained growth has been combined with the lowest inflation for 30 years. New employment figures show that, since 1997, more than 1.8 million jobs have been created, and the majority of them are in the private sector. Every working day, another 600 businesses start up. World trade is now strengthening and manufacturing—the industry worst hit by the global downturn—has grown for four successive quarters. The Treasury expects the British economy to continue to strengthen throughout 2004. It is fair to conclude that the United Kingdom has successfully weathered the global economic downturn. Now is the time to lock in this economic stability so that it endures and to focus on the priorities that will make the UK a global economic leader in the future.

The challenge is to combine that stability—and our new-found confidence in the future—with the resolve to make the right long-term choices and to initiate the reforms that will enable Britain to excel in education, science and enterprise. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Education and Skills reinforced that point strongly in his opening remarks.

Yesterday, the Chancellor announced that we have met our fiscal rules. Debt this year is just 33 per cent. of national income, net borrowing is just 2.4 per cent. this year and our deficit is lower than that in all the major competitors of the industrialised world. Because of that, we are able to afford all our existing commitments abroad and at home and yet release extra resources for the nation's priorities in the years leading up to 2008.

Let me reiterate to the House those priorities. The first is to entrench the stability and growth that we have already achieved. The second is to ensure our security and to support our armed forces and police in these troubled times and to meet our commitments. The hon. Member for Cities of London and Westminster touched on that vital point. The third and most important, in the context of the debate opened by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Education and Skills, is the need to invest in skills and education to enable the British population to meet the challenges of a science, education and enterprise-based economy. My hon. Friend the Member for Warrington, North (Helen Jones) graphically demonstrated that point in terms of the benefits achieved by her constituents, and those still to be achieved. The hon. Member for Cities of London and Westminster set the debate firmly in the dialogue of global challenges and emerging economies. We have to equip our citizens with the best of skills.

Several things that were said in the debate were simply not true, so let us make sure that we put those to one side. It was suggested that compared with other EU countries, the UK did not have a low-tax economy, but a high-tax economy. That is simply not true. Organisation for Economic Co-operation and Development figures show that the total tax take in Britain is lower than the European average, and lower than that in 10 member states.

The hon. Member for Epsom and Ewell (Chris Grayling) derided this country as a place to do business and said that the Government were not meeting the challenges required to take competitiveness forward. Let me give him two quotes. First, Digby Jones, the director general of the CBI, said:

> "I would much rather be doing business in Britain than anywhere else in Europe ... we are still the most successful economy in Europe."

Although I accept from Opposition Members that we should not be complacent, I will not take their persistent running down of the achievements of the British economy under this Government, who are undertaking the policies that their Government failed to implement.

Indeed, an International Monetary Fund article from March 2004 said:

"The UK economy has weathered the global slowdown well, supported by an appropriately countercyclical monetary policy and an expansionary fiscal stance ... Crucial to this performance, macroeconomic policies have been expansionary without undermining confidence—owing to well established and transparent monetary and fiscal policy frameworks with a distinct medium-term orientation."

Gregory Barker (Bexhill and Battle) (Con): Will the right hon. Lady give way?

Dawn Primarolo: I am afraid that the shortage of time means that I cannot give way to the hon. Gentleman, but I know that I will have many opportunities to discuss such matters with him.

The hon. Members for Bournemouth, West (Sir John Butterfill), for Cities of London and Westminster and for Newbury (Mr. Rendel) touched on housing reform and the way in which the Government need to take that forward following the Barker report. The hon. Member for Bournemouth, West also mentioned property investment funds and pointed out how successful they have been elsewhere. He said that it was important to consult on all such matters, including the Barker proposals, so that we get the right mix of development to release land.

My hon. Friend the Member for South Derbyshire (Mr. Todd) referred to the Gershon report and also the announced amalgamation of the Inland Revenue and Customs and Excise under the O'Donnell review. Like him, many hon. Members have commented on the formation of the new department over the past two days. It will be to the advantage of business to have one contact point, and it will be to the advantage of the Government to have one department so that we are able to achieve the very things that the hon. Member for Epsom and Ewell suggested on regulations. My hon. Friend the Member for South Derbyshire is absolutely right that we must have clear, accountable leadership rather than complex accountabilities that undermine where responsibility lies. We must ensure that the accountability is clear to Parliament. We need quantifiable goals, clarity of communication and ongoing analysis, and I believe that all those measures are in place.

As my right hon. Friend the Chancellor said yesterday,

"we cannot be a strong economy if we are weak in education and science."—[Official Report, 17 March 2004; Vol. 419, c. 333.]

Despite everything that Conservative Members said about education, my hon. Friend the Member for South Derbyshire highlighted the importance of child care, Sure Start, the development and expansion of nursery places and investment in our children to ensure that they make the best start.

I am unable to respond to many of the points made in the debate in my short winding-up speech. However, the Government intend to publish the Finance Bill on 8 April and that will clarify many of the issues that hon. Members raised, so we will then be able to move forward with our debates and ensure that Britain achieves economic excellence and leads the world in science and technology.

Debate adjourned.—[Charlotte Atkins.]

Debate to be resumed Monday 22 March.

PETITION

Sub-Post Office Closures

6 pm

Mr. Fabian Hamilton (Leeds, North-East) (Lab): I am grateful for the opportunity to present this petition from my constituents who object to the closure of two sub-post offices in my constituency.

This is the humble petition of Councillor Ronald Feldman and others of like disposition. They are concerned "That proposals to close our local post offices., Alwoodley Park and Sandhill Parade, would cause a vital part of our community to break down; that these post offices provide a good postal service and social role in our community.

Wherefore your Petitioners pray that your honourable House shall urge the Post Office Ltd to reconsider its decision to close local branches and make sure that this vital link to the Community is not lost.

And your Petitioners, as in duty bound, will ever pray, etc."

To lie upon the Table.

Climate Change

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Charlotte Atkins.]

6.1 pm

Chris Ruane (Vale of Clwyd): I should like to open my debate today by asking the Minister to consider the following scenario: in five years' time the populations of the Scandinavian countries flood south into northern Germany and the Netherlands, five years later those populations themselves are forced to flee further south to southern France, Italy and Spain, and by 2025, those populations flee to the north coast of Africa, the EU collapses and war breaks out.

Those are not the thoughts of an "end is nigh" board-carrying ranter. It is the scenario put together by Peter Schwarz and Doug Randell for the Pentagon in October 2003. The report was commissioned by Andrew Marshall, the founding director of the Pentagon office of net assessment. Marshall was asked by President Bush to lead the Pentagon military review, part of which involved an assessment of climate change. The report stated that "the real threat to national security is from global warming triggering an abrupt climate change event".

The fact that Marshall, a trusted and discreet adviser to many Administrations, chose to speak out on such a sensitive issue in the US presidential election year, shows how seriously this loyal adviser took the threat.

The report was highlighted by The Observer, which managed to get hold of a copy, and it has been further highlighted by an "Horizon" programme in November 2003.

The main reason for the scenario that I have just outlined is the collapse of the Atlantic conveyer, or the north Atlantic drift, as it sometimes referred to. The Atlantic conveyor is a vast warm current with 16 times more volume than all of the rivers of the earth combined. The current carries the heat of a million power stations. It allows Britain to have a warm temperate climate, despite the fact that it is as far north as Alaska or Newfoundland, where polar bears live. Warm water is carried on the surface from the Caribbean up to the north Atlantic. When it reaches the north Atlantic it cools and becomes denser. It also increases in salinity, which helps the water to sink to the bottom of the ocean and then return on the final leg of the journey back to the Caribbean, thus creating a continuous conveyor belt effect.

The conveyor belt is in danger of being switched off because of global warming. There are two main reasons for that. One comes from the melting of the ice of the North Pole, which is 1,000 miles long, 400 miles wide and 2 miles thick at its centre. It is one of the biggest blocks of frozen water in the world, and if it were to melt completely, it would raise water levels by 6 to 7 m, drowning most of the major cities in the world.

Air surveys have been carried out over the Arctic at regular five-year intervals, and they show that warming is already taking place. Certain glaciers in Greenland have doubled their speed in recent years, sending massive amounts of frozen fresh water into the Arctic ocean, thereby altering its salinity. Much of that fresh water is heading for the sinking zone of the Atlantic conveyor.

The other sources of fresh water are the mighty rivers that straddle northern Russia—the Ob, Enesai and Elena—which are increasing in volume and disgorging huge volumes of fresh water into the Arctic ocean. It is predicted that global warming will lead to a much wetter world. The major northern Russian rivers already disgorge 20 times more fresh water into the sinking zone of the Arctic than comes from the glaciers of Greenland. Some scientists claim that there will be a 50 per cent. increase in discharge from those Russian rivers into the Arctic ocean in the next 100 years. The influx of that fresh water is altering the salinity of sea water in the north Atlantic, which is in turn is altering the ability of the water to sink to the bottom of the sea and may cause a breakdown of the Atlantic conveyor.

When many people in Britain think of global warming, they think of the UK reaching temperatures like those of the south of France; some even say that they look forward to it. However, that is not what will happen in the scenario envisaged by Schwarz and Randell. The pace of change could be very rapid. Within a decade, the Atlantic conveyor could be switched off, leading to the nightmare scenario that I outlined in my opening remarks. Temperatures could fall by as much as 20°F. Temperatures in London could be as low as those in Spitzbergen, which is 600 miles north of the Arctic circle.

The BBC's "Horizon" programme of November last year interviewed a number of eminent scientists about the effect of rapid climate change on the UK. Professor Bill McGuire said:

"I can only describe it as catastrophic. It's clearly going to influence every single one of us every day of our lives."

Dr. Richard Brook said:

"You could expect to see sea ice off the coast of South East England, probably several miles offshore."

In its worst case scenario, the Met Office says that ice storms will lead to a complete breakdown in the national grid as power lines collapse under the weight of frozen ice. Some people ask, "Could we not still exist if it is as cold as Alaska, Iceland and the Arctic circle, because people live in cities there?" The answer is yes, they do, but they have had 200 or 300 years to build up the necessary infrastructure. We are talking about change possibly taking place over 10 to 20 years. That could be the end of the British way of life as we know it.

The effects would not be limited to Europe. The Atlantic conveyor is just one part of a continuous loop of interconnected underwater currents that affect the climate patterns of the whole world. Those complex interconnected ocean currents transport heat and moisture around the planet. When the conveyor has altered direction and shut down in the past, that has caused global temperature changes within decades. Those past changes can be measured in ice cores, ocean bed sediments, pollen and seed deposits. Much more research needs to be conducted on those valuable sources of information. An understanding of the way in which climate patterns have worked in the past will help us to gain a greater understanding of present and future changes and dangers.

The problem of global warming is not one to be tackled by future Governments or populations, but must be tackled here and now. If we do not take action, we risk the collapse of the whole fabric of our infrastructure. There is strong evidence that the first stirrings are making themselves felt. Around the Arctic circle, Inuit peoples have witnessed the retreat of ice fields. Animals that they rely on for food are migrating to other areas. In the late 1980s, a Russian nuclear-powered ice breaker became the first surface ship to reach the geographic north pole. Last year, India and France recorded their highest temperatures ever, and thousands of people died of heatstroke. Since 1995, there have been more than 35 hurricanes, and they are increasing in ferocity. A few years ago, hurricane Mitch killed 10,000 people in the Caribbean. In May 2003, there were 562 tornadoes in the United States.

Schwarz and Randell say that several actions should be taken immediately. They call for improved predictive climate change and for a deeper understanding of the relationship between ocean patterns and climate change.

Yesterday, I spoke to one of the top British scientists working on British research on ocean currents and climate change. The Government have invested £20m in research in this area. We must give them credit for that, because it is the biggest science research grant that has ever been given. The scientists will put in place 22 underwater buoys across the 26th parallel, from the west coast of Africa to Florida. Two of them will provide a satellite link, which will give continuous information for a four-year period, while the rest will store information to be examined on a yearly basis. That research is welcome, and the grant is one of the largest ever given; but is it enough?

What research is being conducted on the conveyor belt in other oceans? Is sufficient research being conducted into freshwater flows in the northern Russian rivers? In January this year, our chief scientific adviser agreed with the Pentagon assessment, saying:

"Climate change is the most severe problem that we are facing today, more serious than the threat from terrorism."

The total amount spent globally combating terrorism dwarfs the total amount spent globally monitoring climate change. I support the measures that our and other Governments have taken to combat terrorism, and their continued spending of resources on that, but I feel that the threat posed by rapid climate change warrants a huge increase in UK funding for research.

It is not just research on the monitoring of climate change that needs additional funding. A key aim should be research into renewable energies to allow the growth of CO_2 emissions to be curbed. Since the advent of privatisation of the utilities, the excellent research facilities of the Central Electricity Generating Board have been shut. That decline now needs to be reversed. We should be investing in research and development in respect of renewables in this country. We need to be leading the world on that.

Is there enough co-ordination between countries as regards that research? The United States and Norway are donating additional amounts of $7 million and €2.5 million to that project. What measures is the Minister's Department taking to co-ordinate and enhance international research to help us to understand the threat? Have the Government placed that item on the agenda of all multinational organisations that could have a bearing on research, such as the EU, the G8 and the United Nations? Are we pressing the case at the top table?

Our Government have done more than most to promote the issue of global climate change. The Deputy Prime Minister led the way in Kyoto, but have we done enough to maintain the momentum, especially in the light of the most recent information? It states that the UK and European countries could be the first to suffer from rapid climate change if the Atlantic conveyor were slowed or stopped.

Schwarz and Randell call for comprehensive predictive models of climate change impacts, to redress potential sources of conflict between and within countries where there is competition for limited food, water and energy supplies. To achieve that, detailed research on the potential ecological, economic, social and political impact would be needed. Certain countries that are homogeneous, and enjoy social cohesion, such as Japan, will fare better in attempts to change the behaviour of their population peacefully than other countries that already have racial, social and religious divisions, such as South Africa, Indonesia and India. Such countries will have difficulty maintaining order.

A matrix of vulnerability could be produced for those countries likely to suffer most. That would help to predict the impact of rapid climate change on agriculture, water and mineral resources, as well as the technical capability to adapt and change, and would include such issues as social cohesion and the adaptability of the population.

Schwarz and Randell suggest that adaptive response teams be established to address and prepare for events such as mass migration. That migration, even just in Europe, would be 100 or 200 times greater than the one seen at the time of the Irish potato famine. All such scenarios could be planned for in advance to mitigate their impact.

Particular attention should be paid to the areas of the world that supply food. The impact of drought and pests on those areas should be studied, and contingency plans drawn up in advance.

Ann Winterton (Congleton) (Ind Con): I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for giving way in this very interesting debate. May I congratulate him on securing it and on the material that he has produced for it? Does he agree that changes in climate, affecting temperature and the salinity of seas, have been taking place for some time? He has just mentioned food, and those changes affect the location of fish. For example, we have seen cod leaving waters in Newfoundland because of the conveyor that he is discussing, and a change in the salinity of the water and the water temperature. All that must be taken into consideration in planning for the future.

Chris Ruane: I agree entirely with the hon. Lady. One scenario that Schwartz and Randell have outlined is the occurrence of wars over fishing rights, especially on the Iberian peninsula between Spain and Portugal—like the cod wars that we saw back in the '70s.

Schwarz and Randell also suggest research into geo-engineering—that is, the releasing of hydrofluorocarbons that will heat up the atmosphere and compensate for the drop in temperatures. That needs to be approached very carefully, however, because there is no way of knowing exactly what impact such releases would have, and we could end up doing more harm than good.

The research that Schwarz and Randell undertook was for the Pentagon and the US Government, and was supposed to influence US strategy and thinking on climate change. I doubt that it will change the policies of the current US Administration. President Bush has shown his contempt for a number of international agreements and initiatives, including the Kyoto protocol. He has imposed steel sanctions that have hit steel communities in UK, and created subsidies to US farmers that undercut farmers in the developing world and allow for dumping. He has also refused to join the International Criminal Court.

President Bush's father, George Bush senior, commissioned the international panel on climate change. George Bush junior set up a panel of the National Academy of Sciences to study global warming. George Bush junior dismissed the findings of both. He has now called for additional research to prove what the vast majority of climate change scientists already know: that the earth is getting warmer. This was described in The New York Times as a "redundant examination of issues that had largely been settled, bereft of vision, executable goals and timetables—in short little more than a cover up for inaction".

I mentioned earlier the brave efforts of Andrew Marshall to bring this issue to public attention. It is interesting to note that the journal he used was a business journal called Fortune. I hope that this issue becomes a live issue in the presidential election campaign. Three quarters of Americans believe that there should be mandatory controls on CO_2 emissions. In the run-up to the presidential elections, the interests of the coal, oil and automobile industries should be weighed against the damage that climate change is doing to the environment.

I summary, I call on the Minister dramatically to increase research budgets for research on the workings of the Atlantic conveyor, on developing renewable energy sources, and on improvements to developing cleaner fuels. I call on him to work collaboratively with other Departments to ensure that the UK is prepared for all eventualities, and I ask that the issue be raised at all international forums. I call upon the Minister, and indeed the Prime Minister, to do all that they can by making direct approaches to President Bush to end US inaction. I also urge the Minister and his colleagues to work in strong collaboration with Governments around the world to commission research on past and present climate change, and to draw up contingency plans for the rapid climate change that could end life as we know it in the UK and beyond.

6.17 pm

The Minister for the Environment (Mr. Elliot Morley): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Vale of Clwyd (Chris Ruane) on securing this debate and on raising some very serious issues. He has demonstrated his clear knowledge of, and interest in, them and I listened to what he had to say with great interest. I agree with his points and acknowledge their seriousness. I shall certainly try to address them.

I saw the press coverage of the Pentagon report, and I read it with considerable interest. Like my hon. Friend, I saw the assessment of the implications for national security in the United States and for a range of other matters. I take encouragement from the fact that such reports have been commissioned, which demonstrates that the United States recognises that there is a serious issue in relation to climate change. I also found it interesting that the Pentagon report recognised that no country will escape the effects of climate change, whether it is rich, poor, large or small. The implications are severe for us all, and they are global. That places a responsibility on those of us from the developed world and the industrial countries, which have of course been the biggest contributors to climate change, to understand what is happening in relation to the research and the science and take measures to tackle the problem.

My hon. Friend rightly addressed the question of what could happen if the north Atlantic drift, or the gulf stream as it is commonly known in our country, switched off. That is a possibility, and the work that has been done on the subject means that there is no denying it. Our best scientific assessments tell us that we can expect a slow-down rather than a complete shut-off of the gulf stream over this century. Up to 2050 at least, there will still be a net warming over the UK, as the cooling effect of the gulf stream's slow-down will not cancel out the warming effect of climate change due to increasing atmospheric concentrations of greenhouse gases, although there will be an effect.

We know that the gulf stream has switched off in the past, so there is a sound basis for speculation about it slowing down or halting. We should be clear that further research and assessment are required. We also know that if it does switch off, scenarios of the kind that my hon. Friend painted are a possibility.

There are lessons there, particularly for that dwindling group of people who are sceptics on climate change. They are becoming increasingly isolated and clutch at straws, saying that there is no evidence for it. They are becoming the flat-earthers in the debate, given the overwhelming evidence being accumulated on what is happening.

My hon. Friend is right that the UK is a world leader in research on the issue. I refer in particular to research funded by my Department at the Hadley centre in Exeter, which is recognised as a world-leading institution in predicting the effects of climate change; the Centre for Environment, Fisheries and Aquaculture Science, which is based in Lowestoft; and the Natural Environment Research Council, which funded the rapid research programme to provide state-of-the-art analysis in simulation modelling and ocean monitoring. A great deal of work is going on and the UK will continue to lead on research on this important topic. We will use further evidence as it emerges in our ongoing planning for adaptation for climate change, as we have to consider the implications as well.

There have been some excellent presentations from the Hadley centre and the Tyndall centre, and I was privileged to present some of their findings to an international audience at the climate change conference in Milan recently. They have made observations on weather patterns going back almost 1,000 years from what can be ascertained from ice core, peat and soil samples. Their research shows that there is a cycle of weather patterns over the centuries.

Temperatures vary within a range from decade to decade and century to century, but the latest figure, which is taken not from sampling but from the weather patterns that we have been able to observe for the last few hundred years, shows that the range—the curve—increases dramatically. That curve completely changes from the cycles we have seen over many centuries. Something distinctive, radical and worrying is happening to our climate, and we cannot ignore that.

As a matter of interest, yesterday I was at a maritime research exhibition to launch the WaveNet programme, which has been developed by CEFAS. It involves a series of remote buoys around our coast that take real-time temperature, current and wave height samples. That excellent project can be accessed on the internet, and people can click on to individual buoys around the coast and be given a real-time reading of temperature and wave patterns. It is a fantastic facility that is available internationally and globally. Anyone who has access to the internet can access that data, which is a real step forward in sharing information and in understanding our knowledge.

I also saw work involving a satellite programme, in collaboration with the Met Office, the Department for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs, the Ministry of Defence and a range of other institutions. Remote sensors are dropped internationally, all around the seas, and they sink, take temperature readings, resurface and transmit the data to the satellite, which transmits it back to our scientific research stations. That is world-class science at the cutting edge of our understanding.

We are keen to co-operate, and are working with a range of international bodies. I recently met American representatives to discuss climate monitoring, and they were keen to co-operate with us, as we are to work with them. The Hadley centre has developed a computer model based on its global predictions, which can apply to regions around the world. I have met Indian scientists who have taken the PRECIS—Providing Regional Climates for Impacts Studies—computer model and are applying it to the Indian subcontinent. The program predicts climate change implications, which are severe and include: flooding in Bangladesh and low-lying areas; drought, as my hon. Friend said; crop failure; and increase in disease, as disease-carrying mosquitoes spread into new areas because of changing temperatures. That is modelled by PRECIS, which is a useful tool and particularly helpful for developing countries that do not have the capacity to develop such sophisticated computer models themselves but can take computer programs and apply them. They are doing a great deal of invaluable scientific work in their regions in helping us understand what is happening.

I assure my hon. Friend that that work will continue. He will have heard the Chancellor's comments about the importance of science in his recent Budget announcement, and about how we need to continue the investment in our science and education base, because it is crucial. He will be aware of the Government's commitment to reducing CO_2 and greenhouse gas emissions. We are recognised as world leaders both in what we are doing and in relation to our energy White Paper, which made clear our strategy for achieving those reductions. We are also the first country in the European Union to publish the national allocation plan for the European emissions trading scheme. We are well advanced in dealing with this issue.

We have set up the climate change impact programme to examine the potential effect on this country and ways in which we need to prepare for that, not just in reducing CO_2 but through more research and development on environmental technologies, which includes renewable energy—as my hon. Friend said—clean transportation and clean fuel technology. All that work is ongoing, and we are collaborating with Japan, for example, on issues such as hydrogen fuel cell technology and transportation, and with many other countries.

I recently held a joint meeting with Sweden on environmental technologies, at which we called together a range of academics and companies to discuss how to develop new technologies for reducing energy and energy saving. We also set up REEEP—the renewable energy and energy efficiency programme—which is designed to be a global forum for sharing information on energy efficiency. The secretariat of REEEP, although it was set up by the UK, has now moved to Austria, where it is developing as an international organisation, with contributions from countries all over the world.

We have done a great deal on climate change, which is a real and serious threat to this country and all the countries of the world. Even if temperatures increase by the relatively small number of degrees projected, the impact will be considerable.

The hon. Member for Congleton (Ann Winterton) mentioned fish stocks. She is right that water temperature and the productivity of species such as cod are clearly linked. Although over-fishing has played a part in some declines, climate is certainly a factor.

This is a serious issue. My hon. Friend was right to raise it and has done the House a service. I hope that I have reassured him that we in the Government share his views and are prepared to act to combat what is one of the most serious global threats that we face.

Question put and agreed to.

Adjourned accordingly at half-past Six o'clock.

Oral Answers to Questions

HOME DEPARTMENT

The Secretary of State was asked—

Bogus Traders

1. Mr. Andrew Robathan (Blaby) (Con): How many arrests have been made for (a) fraud and (b) intimidation by bogus traders in the last 12 months. [162518]

The Minister for Crime Reduction, Policing and Community Safety (Ms Hazel Blears): There is no specific offence of fraud or intimidation by bogus traders. However, the latest figures for fraud and forgery in 2002–03 show that 38,600 people were arrested, and 284,000 people were arrested for violence against the person.

Mr. Robathan: Is the Minister aware that people are particularly concerned about bogus traders who, for instance, offer to pave a drive, do a couple of hours' work and charge substantial sums—often of £5,000 or £6,000? Does she agree that that is in fact a form of criminal activity and has nothing to do with trading? People are making a criminal living out of bogus trading. Will she speak to her hon. Friend the Minister for Employment Relations, Competition and Consumers at the Department of Trade and Industry, who has said that the Government will introduce legislation to tackle such bogus trading, which currently allows criminals to prey on the most elderly and vulnerable people in our country?

Ms Blears: The hon. Gentleman is clearly aware of the extensive work that is being carried out by my colleagues in the DTI in response to the work of the Office of Fair Trading, which was itself a response to a super complaint by the National Association of Citizens Advice Bureaux. The OFT has set out a position paper that includes a number of options, ranging from creating a new offence of fraud—also recommended by the Law Commission—and a new offence of fraudulent trading to creating a criminal offence in the circumstances that the hon. Gentleman set out. I can certainly undertake that I and Ministers from the DTI will seriously consider those propositions. Clearly, we will need to consult stakeholders, but I assure him that not only are our officials in dialogue, but we intend to have inter-ministerial dialogue as well.

David Cairns (Greenock and Inverclyde) (Lab): Is my hon. Friend aware that among the worst offenders in this regard are those sales agents who go door to door, hoodwinking elderly and vulnerable people into changing their gas and electricity supply, based on an entirely bogus assessment of the benefits? Will she consider supporting my private Member's Bill, which would tighten the regulations and allow compensation for those, very often elderly, people who have been hoodwinked in that manner?

Ms Blears: I am, of course, very aware of the elderly and vulnerable people who have been taken advantage of in those circumstances. That is why I am delighted not only that my hon. Friend is promoting his Bill, but that many of the respectable energy companies now have schemes whereby callers have not only to prove their identity, but to show householders a telephone number that they can ring to confirm the caller's identity. Such schemes are excellent, and I want to promote them.

Asylum Seekers

2. Sir Teddy Taylor (Rochford and Southend, East) (Con): How many persons in the UK are awaiting decisions on asylum applications; and what the average waiting time was for such decisions in the last 12 months. [162520]

The Minister for Citizenship and Immigration (Beverley Hughes): At the end of December 2003, the number of asylum applications awaiting an initial decision had fallen to 24,500—the lowest level for a decade. Of those applications, 7,100 were normal work in progress cases, where the application had been outstanding for six months or less. We are determined to reduce the number of applications outstanding to normal work in progress levels and, at current intake and output levels, we expect to do so during the course of this year.

The average time between application and initial decision was 10 months for initial decisions made in 2003, reflecting the fact that we are now working through proportionately more of the longer-standing cases, but that still compares favourably with the average of 20 months in April 1997. Some 80 per cent. of asylum applications received in the period April to September 2003 had initial decisions reached and served within two months.

Sir Teddy Taylor: I thank the Minister for that detailed reply, but is she aware of the concern about the time taken to remove asylum seekers after all their appeals have been rejected? Can she give us any assurance that progress is being made in that direction?

Beverley Hughes: I thank the hon. Gentleman for his question because he is right to say that removing people at the end of the process is not only important in its own right, but deters people from coming in and making unfounded applications. We saw that with the non-suspensive appeals process, which involved a dramatic reduction in intake as a result of being able to remove people very quickly. Removals are up this year at 17,000—an increase of 23 per cent. on the previous year—but we need to do more. We need to unlock some of the existing barriers, particularly around redocumentation and preventing people from delaying the final stage of the process with successive appeals. I hope that he will be able to persuade some of his Opposition colleagues to support the measures that we have included in the Asylum and Immigration (Treatment of Claimants, etc.) Bill because they are essential if we are to do what he rightly suggests, which is to remove those barriers and remove more people.

Mr. Gwyn Prosser (Dover) (Lab): Is it not the case that the pressure on decision making will reduce as the number of new applicants reduces? Is my right hon. Friend aware that the number of new applicants coming through Dover, for instance, and the south-east has reduced by two thirds or more in the past 12 months, to the extent that the asylum estate has reduced significantly just in the past month, but is she also aware that section 55 still causes some problems on the margin? Will she look again at that problem?

Beverley Hughes: I am pleased that my hon. Friend has seen the impact in Dover of the measures that we have successfully taken to reduce the number of unfounded claims. The monthly reduction in intake is now getting on for 60 per cent. That allows us to use the resources that previously had to be invested on large numbers of initial claims on taking decisions on long-standing claims and on dealing with other elements of the system.

I am aware of my hon. Friend's concern about section 55. He will know that, towards the end of last year, the Home Secretary announced a new approach to the section. As a result, the number of grants of support is increasing. However, it is also important that Members accept that we have to take a reasonably tough stance when we think that people are coming here and claiming asylum when they are not genuine refugees and that one of the reasons behind that is that they can be supported through the process.

Mr. David Cameron (Witney) (Con): Can the Minister tell us whether the BRACE procedures for clearing backlogs were applied to any areas other than people setting up businesses from the accession countries? If so, was the House of Commons informed on each and every occasion?

Beverley Hughes: I made it clear in my statement of 12 March that I have asked the investigating officer to widen his investigation to include any existing arrangements for clearing backlogs and any previous arrangements going back 10 years. The hon. Gentleman may wish to look at some of the arrangements that took place under the previous Conservative Government before he decides how he will respond to the findings of this report.

James Purnell (Stalybridge and Hyde) (Lab): Did my right hon. Friend really say that the average waiting time has fallen from 20 months to two months—a 10-times reduction? Can she tell me who the Home Secretary was in April 1997, and does she agree that everyone on both sides of the House who now supports fighting racist parties and the British National party should put the asylum debate in context and present a balanced case based on the evidence and information rather than scare stories and gimmicks?

Beverley Hughes: In reporting the average time now, I could not give total credence to the progress that we have made. In fact, last year when we were concentrating on newer cases, the average time was six months. It has gone up to 10 months this year because, as I said, we can now invest more resources in going through the longer-standing cases. Therefore, the average has risen temporarily. However, my hon. Friend is right. In April 1997, the number of outstanding cases was 54,500 compared with 24,500 now, and the average waiting time was 20 months, which is getting on for two years, for an initial decision. The Home Secretary at that time was the leader of the Conservative party, the right hon. and learned Member for Folkestone and Hythe (Mr. Howard).

Leaving aside the debate about such issues, my hon. Friend is right in his broader point. Unless we are able both within and between our parties to have a sensible debate about migration and unless political parties and politicians do not use this issue as a covert screen for racism and fuelling people's fear about foreign nationals, we will not be able to identify properly for people the enormous benefits that migrants bring to our economy and the social fabric of this society.

Mr. Humfrey Malins (Woking) (Con): Last week, Lord Falconer was forced to admit that, after seven years of this Labour Government, the average time lapse between a Home Office initial decision on asylum and an appeal hearing before an adjudicator is 17 weeks. Who is to blame for that extraordinary delay? Is it not one more example of this Government's sheer inefficiency in managing the asylum system?

Beverley Hughes: Although we want to go further, that 17 weeks has come down considerably from the time that it took under the Conservative Administration. In fact, we have put a great deal more resources into appeals. We can now send 3,500 asylum appeals, 3,000 entry clearance appeals and 600 non-asylum appeals to the adjudicators every single month. That is not only bringing down the number of outstanding cases that the adjudicators need to consider, but bringing down the waiting time, month on month. We will get to the point at which the whole process will take six months or less from the initial claim to the final outcome. That will happen if the Conservative party supports the Government in their efforts to reduce abuse of the appeal system and the way in which people can go back time after time after time to frustrate their removal.

Amphetamines

3. John Mann (Bassetlaw) (Lab): When his Department last recommended that the Advisory Council on the Misuse of Drugs consider the reclassification of amphetamines; and what plans he has to do so again. [162521]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Home Department (Caroline Flint): The Advisory Council on the Misuse of Drugs last reviewed the classification of amphetamines in 1995 when it agreed that class B was still the most appropriate class. There are no plans to request the ACMD to consider the classification of amphetamines, although it keeps the classification of all drugs under constant review.

John Mann: Since 1995, we have had a tenfold increase in the volume of police raids involving amphetamines. Australia and New Zealand have found in that time span that amphetamines have become their largest single drug problem. As the drug can be made in the back of a van—it is a home-produced synthetic drug—is it not time that we upgraded it to a class A drug in exactly the same way as Australia and New Zealand have had to do in the past few years?

Caroline Flint: There are different types of amphetamines: there is amphetamine, which is a class B drug, and methyl-amphetamine, which is also a class B drug. Methyl-amphetamine is especially a problem in the USA, the far east, Australia and New Zealand. Indeed, its use among the Maori tribes has led the New Zealand Government to consider reclassifying it as a class A drug. Estimates from the British crime survey for 2002–03 show that amphetamine use in the 16 to 59 age group has reduced by 50 per cent. since 1996. Of course we have to consider all drugs, but we also have to look at the families of drugs and at how they operate. I think that my hon. Friend is referring to methyl-amphetamine rather than amphetamine itself.

Linda Gilroy (Plymouth, Sutton) (Lab/Co-op): I am sure that my hon. Friend agrees that although the classification of drugs and the messages that we get across about them are important, there are nevertheless many other things that we need to do to convey effectively the fact that drug abuse is bad not only for individuals, but for our communities. Will she say something about the Department's priorities for clamping down on drug abuse?

Caroline Flint: My hon. Friend is right. It is about extending knowledge and information about the different harms of drugs and how they affect our communities. I am pleased that the powers in the Anti-social Behaviour Act 2003 to shut down crack houses—houses for the use and supply of class A drugs—are already beginning to take hold, and I commend that action to police forces throughout the country, working with local authorities. If a crack house takes root, it can have a devastating impact. We must consider the matter alongside better police enforcement and better use of intelligence to crack down on middle markets. With the serious organised crime agency, I hope that we will tackle the problem nationally and internationally even better than we are doing already.

Internal Security

4. Mr. David Heath (Somerton and Frome) (LD): What assessment he has made of the implications of events in Madrid for security arrangements in London and other major British cities. [162522]

The Secretary of State for the Home Department (Mr. David Blunkett): We have been on a heightened state of alert for some considerable time and remain so. A month ago, I confirmed that there was a substantial increase of 50 per cent. in the surveillance capacity of the Security Service. Last Friday, I announced £15 million extra for the special branch, £12 million of which is going into the counter-terrorism surveillance unit of the Met police. Last Friday, I attended the meeting of Justice and Home Affairs Ministers in Brussels and pressed hard for action rather than simply words and for genuine co-operation on the key areas with which we have been dealing domestically. I say to all those who are pronouncing publicly that, although it is understandable that people are raising issues that have been raised previously in the aftermath of the tragedy in Madrid—we all send our condolences personally and through our political parties to all those affected—it is absolutely crucial that people recognise that security and intelligence capacity and the work of special branch have not changed following the incident a week last Thursday. Although people are extremely worried, they need to know that every possible step is being taken to secure the interests of the United Kingdom.

Mr. Heath: I recognise the difficult job that the Home Secretary has to do, but he must be aware of people's concerns when they hear, for example, the head of the local government emergency planners saying that we are "very, very badly prepared" for a Madrid-scale attack. The head of the Fire Brigades Union says:

"As of now, we are not a lot better than we were on September 11th 2001".

The chief constable of the British Transport police says that the infrastructure of his force is "crumbling" due to a lack of funding. If those on whom we rely for our defence are not confident that they have the resources or officers required to do the job effectively, how can the public have that confidence?

Mr. Blunkett: On the British Transport police, the hon. Gentleman will be aware that that it is funded through the operators. It behoves not simply the Government, but all those engaged in maintaining the economic, social, political and humanitarian life of this country, to make a contribution. A substantial amount of the £330 million expansion in civil contingencies that we announced a year ago has been spent on things not affected by the particular society that the individual concerned chaired.

I understand the aggravation. Despite the 35 per cent. increase in the civil contingencies grant in 2001, it has been agreed and announced—although the Emergency Planning Society does not agree with this—that it would be integrated into the normal local-government grant system. There is an ongoing conflict, but it should not hide the fact that £56 million extra has been put into the fire service, £85 million has already been spent by the NHS, and there has been a massive expansion in the training of police, fire and ambulance men, all of which has been spelt out to the House at least three times by me in statements over the past year. In addition, the massive expansion in the capacity of those who can use training suits and the exercises that we have undertaken, including the one last September, have all been designed to ensure that robust resilience is in place. I repeat, however, that it is not resilience in picking up the pieces after an attack that will save this country, but the security and intelligence to prevent an attack from occurring.

David Winnick (Walsall, North) (Lab): While recognising the importance of trying to protect all our people from international terrorism and that my right hon. Friend is doing precisely that, does he nevertheless accept that compulsory identity cards in Spain in no way stopped the terrible slaughter there? In view of some of the press reports that appeared yesterday and today, would he not be over-hasty in trying to bring the cards to this country? I do not believe that they are a deterrent to terrorism.

Mr. Blunkett: I am familiar with my hon. Friend's views on the subject. A question on identity cards has been tabled and, with your permission, Mr. Speaker, I shall answer further questions then. Suffice it to say that the system that we have in process is nothing like the Spanish ID card. I have spelt out to the House that I would not recommend a system on the European model. It is not based on biometrics and does not have a clean database, so it cannot prevent people from having multiple identities. The security services are clear—anyone who has watched television or read the papers over the past few days will be familiar with what has been said—that multiple identity is the stock in trade of international terrorism. Terrorists use it effectively and we have to take steps to stop them.

David Davis (Haltemprice and Howden) (Con): We should recognise that credit is due to MI5, MI6 and the police on their success so far in preventing and deterring the threat that we have faced from al-Qaeda in the past decade. Nevertheless, the comments of the Home Secretary, the Prime Minister, the head of MI5 and Sir John Stevens, the head of the Met, have led people to believe that an attack is inevitable in this country at some point. That makes the comments of Patrick Cunningham that the hon. Member for Somerton and Frome (Mr. Heath) raised very important. Mr. Cunningham was not just talking about resources. He went on to say that Britain was gripped by "a culture of complacency", and that local authority planners, who are supposed to play a vital role in the aftermath of disaster, are unlikely to be able to "offer anything other than a token gesture of support".

He is the leader 500 emergency planners. Are they all completely wrong?

Mr. Blunkett: No, they are not all completely wrong, but I put out a challenge to the emergency planning officers and those who purport to speak on their behalf. If an emergency planning officer believes that something is inadequate, that he does not have the resources, that his local authority, which employs him in this case, is not doing its job and that the new regional structures that we have put in place and invested in, with back-up from the Ministry of Defence, are inadequate, why not do something about it? What is the point in being an emergency planning officer if one is not doing the job at local level? If those officers do not have the resources, they can raise the issue.

Has any Member of the House been approached by their local emergency planning officer? Has any of those officers written to me? Has any of them written to the Minister for the Cabinet Office, who is responsible for civil contingencies, or to the Minister for Local and Regional Government? How many of those officers have raised their concerns? We know of those concerns because we read them in the papers yesterday, we saw those people on the television and we heard them on the radio, and we will happily take them seriously when they propose their own plan and suggestions for improvement. That is what is called a civil society linking up with a political society, so that not everything is the responsibility of those sitting in Westminster.

David Davis: With the greatest respect to the right hon. Gentleman, he is the Home Secretary and has overall responsibility for this area. He has to pay attention to those people. They are, after all, the people in the front line who will carry out his work in the event of a disaster. However, it is not only the people in the front line who are critical of what he is doing. Britain's emergency preparations have been criticised by the Defence Committee, the National Audit Office and the Prime Minister's strategy unit, as well as the Emergency Planning Society. Are they all wrong too, or should they all do things for themselves as well?

Mr. Blunkett: No, all of them have made sensible, practical suggestions that we have taken on board. That includes suggestions made by members of the joint Home Affairs and Defence Committee, which I attended just two weeks ago. Those proceedings are on the record; they lasted two hours—that is called democracy.

When people have sensible, practical suggestions, we will implement them, but I repeat what the chairman of the Conservative party, the hon. Member for Woodspring (Dr. Fox), said last night on Radio 4 when asked where the resources are to come from: we will have to take them from some other area. That is the balance that we have to strike—judging how much money in the NHS goes towards emergency planning rather than towards normal treatment. The same is equally true of local government resources and of the allocation of resources from my own budget. Paying for training, decontamination, protective suits and the exercises that we have undertaken, as well as for the fire and ambulance services, which I have already mentioned, has to be put together with maintaining the basic service, which is, after all, the lifeblood that we are trying to protect.

Mr. Dennis Skinner (Bolsover) (Lab): Will my right hon. Friend confirm that money has been allocated for an extra 100 British Transport police on the London underground? Will he also confirm, as he has done previously, that there are now more police in Britain than there were even in 1984 during the miners' strike, when the police were supplemented by the Army? Is he aware that there is no such thing as a perfect society in which we can control all those forces that are acting against the interests of the population? If there was a way to combat the suicide bombers and all the rest, my guess is that the answer would have been found in Israel, where they have suffered such problems for many years. The truth is that an answer is not on offer, but it makes an easy shot for the Tories, the Liberals, the media and the BBC, which is riddled with Gilligans.

Mr. Blunkett: I think that I will pass on the last point. Yes, British Transport police have been allocated on the underground as my hon. Friend described. Yes, there are 11,000 more police, compared with a drop of 1,100 that we inherited in 1997, and they are available to do the job.

Let me make it clear that there are two separate issues here. One is the resources allocated to security and intelligence and to protecting us from attack in the first place. I do not think that anyone can dispute that we have done the job there, and I welcome what the shadow Home Secretary said about MI5, which is doing a first-rate job, as is the counter-terrorism branch. The separate issue is how we deal with an incident when it occurs, and I just say to everybody that this is not new. There are Members on both sides of the House who remember the 30 years before the Good Friday agreement, when incidents took place. There have been civil incidents such as the terrible tragedy in 1989 at the Hillsborough football ground. I remember attending the hospital where all those who were injured and the 95 who died had been taken. We are familiar with dealing with both civil and military contingencies—we have dealt with them for years. We are stepping up that aspect of resilience, so that we will be even better at it should a tragedy occur, but our primary task is to prevent it from happening in the first place.

Stephen Lawrence Inquiry

5. Ms Oona King (Bethnal Green and Bow) (Lab): What progress the Government have made in implementing the recommendations of the Lawrence inquiry; and what further steps are being taken to promote race equality. [162523]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Home Department (Fiona Mactaggart): The Stephen Lawrence inquiry report was published on 24 February 1999 and made 70 recommendations. I am pleased to say that the vast majority of the recommendations have now been either completely or partially implemented. I have commissioned research by the London School of Economics to evaluate the overall impact of the recommendations on the police. That report is due in the summer. Following recommendation 11 of the Macpherson report, the Race Relations (Amendment) Act 2000 introduced a duty on specified public authorities to promote equality of opportunity and good relations between persons of different racial groups.

Ms King: I thank my hon. Friend for her reply. Does she agree that promoting community cohesion is one of the most important aspects of her Department's work? I hope that she is aware of the progress that Tower Hamlets has made and the national recognition that it has received for that. Will she argue for more resources to be devoted to community cohesion and promoting race equality? The issue affects all of us—as many white constituents come to see me following race attacks as black and Asian constituents. Although ethnic minorities face specific problems of institutionalised racism, which the Lawrence inquiry examined, I hope that the Government recognise that Britain must invest in promoting race equality for all the citizens of this country.

Fiona Mactaggart: My hon. Friend is right to draw the House's attention to the fact that delivering race equality and community cohesion is good for every citizen of this country, whether white or black. It is important that we all recognise that. She is also right to draw our attention to the excellent work on community cohesion being done in her constituency. Our ambition is to embed the lessons learned from the pathfinders on community cohesion in the mainstream operations of central and local government, because only by making that a normal part of doing business will we build genuinely cohesive communities throughout our country.

Mr. Mark Oaten (Winchester) (LD): While I support the need for the police to challenge suspicious behaviour, especially if it involves terrorism, will the Minister explain why there is no ethnic monitoring of stop-and-search operations conducted under Terrorism Act 2000 powers? Does she accept that that goes against the recommendations of the Macpherson report and is at odds with good community relations, which are especially important if we are to fight terrorism and gain intelligence from members of such groups?

Fiona Mactaggart: People who are stopped under anti-terrorism powers are not stopped because of their ethnicity but because there is a specific need for the investigating officer to ensure that we are safe and protected from terrorism. We are introducing into general stop-and-search procedures much more robust monitoring and connecting whether the initial stop leads to a justifying outcome. It is important to have that information, so that we can determine whether the disparity in our current stop-and-search arrangements is justified, or whether we must take robust action to end that disparity.

Mr. John Wilkinson (Ruislip-Northwood) (Con): Is it not the case that in many inner-London boroughs, a proactive, intelligence-led approach by the police is crucial to tackling endemic crime such as street crime and drug dealing? Without stop-and-search powers, would not the police be seriously handicapped in their work, to the severe detriment of Londoners in those areas?

Fiona Mactaggart: The answer to the hon. Gentleman is, of course, yes. We need to ensure that stop-and-search powers are intelligence-led and produce effective results. Intelligence-led use of the powers has disrupted gun crime, for example, but we need evidence to ensure that stop-and-search powers are being used sensibly to reduce crime. Stop-and-search is an important tool when well used, but we need to ensure that it is always well used.

Reoffending Rates

6. Mr. David Rendel (Newbury) (LD): How he intends that the national offender management service will achieve lower rates of reconviction. [162524]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Home Department (Paul Goggins): Reducing reoffending is the central objective of the national offender management service.

This will be achieved through more effective management of offenders as well as better targeting and co-ordination of custodial and community sentences.

Mr. Rendel: The Department's figures show that 55 per cent. of those who are imprisoned are reconvicted within two years, whereas only 45 per cent. of those who are given community sentences are reconvicted within the same period. If the national offender management service is to be evidence-based, should we not be giving preference wherever possible to community service sentences, particularly for non-violent offenders?

Paul Goggins: The thrust of the reforms under the NOMS system is to rebalance our correctional services so that those in prison are those who need and deserve to be there and from whom we need protection. Those who are non-dangerous and commit less serious offences should be dealt with effectively in the community. The reoffending rates of those who complete sentences in the community are encouraging. It is an important message that effective work and tough sentences can be carried out in the community where that is appropriate for particular offenders.

Mr. Keith Bradley (Manchester, Withington) (Lab): Will my hon. Friend tell the House when the national rehabilitation action plan will be published? When it is published, will it include the key recommendation of the social exclusion unit report on reducing reoffending—a going straight contract?

Paul Goggins: I cannot confirm the contents or the precise date of the national rehabilitation action plan. However, I can confirm that work continues apace to draw up that plan. In the Prison Service, much greater emphasis is being placed on housing advice, advice from Jobcentre Plus staff and advice on drug treatment and education. All those ingredients need to be joined together much more effectively with what happens in the community after release from prison. That will be the focus of the national rehabilitation action plan.

Andrew Selous (South-West Bedfordshire) (Con): Does the Minister accept that reconviction rates would be lower if the recommendations of the Carter report were agreed to, which would see prisoners placed in prisons nearer to their families?

Paul Goggins: One of the considerations of the Prison Service when allocating prisoners to prisons is closeness to home. It is somewhat regrettable that a third of all prisoners are more than 50 miles away from home. However, other considerations have to be taken into account. It is essential that contact is maintained with families throughout the prison sentence, and we do everything we can to encourage visits by families to prisoners, but the pressures on our prisons sometimes make it unavoidable that prisoners are further away from home than would ideally be the case.

Prison Overcrowding

7. Mrs. Annette L. Brooke (Mid Dorset and North Poole) (LD): What action he is taking to tackle prison overcrowding. [162525]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Home Department (Paul Goggins): We are taking immediate action to increase the number of prison places, with an extra 2,500 places to be available by the end of 2004.

We will continue to press sentencers to use community sentences rather than short-term prison sentences for non-dangerous, less serious offenders.

Mrs. Brooke: The Minister will be aware that the Home Office projection suggests that it is highly likely that the prison population will reach 80,000 this year. Furthermore, the Carter report recommended that the population of those in custody should be stabilised at about 80,000. Does the Minister accept that recommendation? Will he set clear targets that will address slowing down and reversing the trend of an ever-increasing prison population?

Paul Goggins: Patrick Carter predicted in his report that if we did nothing to rebalance the correctional services, the prison population would be about 93,000 by the end of the decade. With the reforms that he recommended, it is possible to maintain a stable prison population at about 80,000, and that is what we intend to do. In the short term, we shall certainly make available the additional prison places that I mentioned in my initial reply—about 2,500 by the end of the year. It is important that the message goes out to sentencers that wherever possible community penalties should be used instead.

In his report, Patrick Carter emphasised the increasing severity of sentences. Someone is five times more likely now to be given a custodial sentence for shoplifting than was the case 10 years ago. That is hardly justifiable. Community sentences should be used wherever appropriate.

Vera Baird (Redcar) (Lab): My hon. Friend may be aware that the Fawcett commission on women and the criminal justice system, in which I have been involved, is about to report. One of its findings is that two thirds of women in prison, who are contributing to the overcrowding problem, are there for dishonesty. Does he agree that society pays a price if people are put into prison unnecessarily, as the result may be family break-up, home break-up and loss of jobs? Is it not time to evolve the principle that carers, whether male or female, ought to be the last people to be put in prison, and that that principle should start to emerge in sentencing policy, unless, of course, those people are dangerous and violent?

Paul Goggins: As my hon. and learned Friend will recognise, the nature of the offence is crucial when sentence is passed, but she is quite right to point to the additional dimension for women who are put in custody—namely, their child care responsibilities. She will know that just over a week ago I published the women's offending reduction programme, which highlighted various actions that we are taking, such as improving bail information systems in prisons for women and improving mental health care for women offenders outside prison. I am also looking closely at our use of bail hostels to make sure that we are making maximum use of them as an alternative to prison. The issue of women in prison is high on my agenda, and I intend to continue pressing forward and making sure that wherever possible low-risk women offenders who have not committed particularly serious offences are dealt with outside prison.

Mrs. Cheryl Gillan (Chesham and Amersham) (Con): The Minister is incredibly complacent when he says that a couple of thousand prison places are coming on-stream at the end of the year, because we need prison places now. The operational capacity of our prisons has dropped this week from 75,191 to 75,073, so he has just eight places left before the system is completely and dangerously full. Does he agree with the general secretary of the Prisoner Governors Association, who said this morning that the Prison Service is now taking more chances with the prisoners that they are sending out of the system? What assurances can he give us that, despite the crisis that he has created, he will not permit the premature release of unsuitable prisoners?

Paul Goggins: I assure the House that I am not complacent about my responsibilities—nor do I hide away from the pressures. May I correct the hon. Lady's figure on the operational capacity of our prisons, which today stands at 75,291? It is important to put on record an accurate picture.

We have provided 14,700 additional prison places since 1997. Before the end of this year, we will add a further 2,500. We are not complacent, and will not release people into the community if there is a risk. However, if they are low-risk offenders and if it is appropriate to deal with them in court via a community sentence, that is what sentencers should be doing.

Rob Marris (Wolverhampton, South-West) (Lab): May I point out to my hon. Friend that one effect of overcrowding is an increased rate of recidivism? Young people in particular in the secure estate do not get the education that they deserve in prison, and have disproportionately high rates of illiteracy. That problem is not addressed properly in prison. Will my hon. Friend explain to the House why spending per capita in 2002 on education in the secure estate was only two thirds of the equivalent figure in secondary schools, when those are some of the most vulnerable people?

Paul Goggins: We continue to increase investment in education in our prisons. In the current year, we expect 50,000 basic skills qualifications to be gained in our prisons. If we are to tackle recidivism and create the opportunity for people to stay free from crime, it is essential that they are better educated and have a better chance of gaining employment. I assure my hon. Friend and the House that I regard that as a high priority.

Police Finance

8. Mr. David Amess (Southend, West) (Con): What meetings he has held with representatives of police authorities regarding the proposed 2004–05 funding settlement. [162526]

The Minister for Crime Reduction, Policing and Community Safety (Ms Hazel Blears): I met police authority representatives or Members of Parliament from six force areas during the consultation period about next year's settlement. Full account was also taken of 63 written representations covering 32 police authority areas, including those from Essex Members of Parliament. The funding settlement was finalised on 5 February.

Mr. Amess: May I note that there seems to be a peculiar noise in the Chamber, Mr. Speaker?

Is the Minister aware that the Association of Chief Police Officers has calculated that following the Home Office settlement, there is a funding shortfall of £250 million? In the debate in Westminster Hall last week, I shared with her my concern about police in Southend being stretched. With reference to Essex in particular, other than high council tax increases and cutting police numbers, can she think of any other way of addressing the serious shortfall in funding?

Ms Blears: The hon. Gentleman mentions that we had a useful debate in Westminster Hall last week. I promised to reflect on what he said, provided that he got things into perspective. I said to him that Essex had had a very generous settlement this time in comparison with other forces. If we had applied the formula, Essex would have received £15 million less than it did. Because we had a flat-rate settlement of 3.25 per cent. for every force, it received an extra £15 million. It has also had 149 extra police officers since 1997, and an extra 483 police staff and 91 community support officers to patrol local areas. The increase in the county's precept was the second lowest in the country, and it was an extra 12p a week for excellent policing services in Essex.

Mrs. Ann Cryer (Keighley) (Lab): Is my hon. Friend aware that when she meets representatives of police authorities, she will receive a positive response from West Yorkshire police authority? With Mr. Speaker's permission, I shall quote a letter from Councillor Mark Burns-Williamson, chair of West Yorkshire police authority, who said:

"You will be pleased to learn that the Home Office is making an additional special grant of £1 million to the Police Authority in respect of the Bradford riots of July 2001.

I have written to . . . the Minister of State . . . expressing our appreciation for this support from the Home Office."

Ms Blears: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for highlighting the appreciation of her police force for the action taken by the Home Office. I am sure she knows that over the past three years there has been a 30 per cent. increase in funding for the police service—a 17 per cent. increase in real terms. That is a tremendous record of investment in the police service, because we know how much it is valued by local communities such as my hon. Friend's. Right across the country, policing is crucial to building safer communities on which our people depend.

Mr. Speaker: Order. There seems to be a faulty air conditioning unit, which is causing excessive noise. Will the Officers of the House see that it is turned off?

Bob Spink (Castle Point) (Con): I am grateful to the Minister for her detailed response on funding for the police in Essex. Is she aware that one of the results of the lack of funding for police in Essex is that the Rochford and Castle Point division of that constabulary is currently running at 27.7 per cent. below police establishment, which is causing enormous problems of street disorder and crime? What does she intend to do to make sure that she gets the Castle Point and Rochford division back up to its full establishment on the street?

Ms Blears: Despite the noise, we still get a lot of hot air in the Chamber, Mr. Speaker.

I know that the hon. Gentleman has a question later on the Order Paper, so I took the trouble to make inquiries of his police service this morning. I can tell him that he has a special operation there consisting of a sergeant and 10 extra officers dedicated to tackling antisocial behaviour. They are doing a tremendous amount of work in his local area to tackle the problems of youth nuisance, intimidation and harassment, and I am sure he will be glad to have that extra force in his constituency.

9. Hugh Bayley (City of York) (Lab): What proposals he has to improve the accountability of police authorities in England for the council tax precepts they impose. [162527]

The Secretary of State for the Home Department (Mr. David Blunkett): Follow that from my hon. Friend the Minister of State.

My hon. Friend the Member for City of York (Hugh Bayley) knows that the decision rests with the police authority, but in our consultation paper, "Policing: Building Safer Communities Together", which we published on 4 November, we challenged everyone to come forward with ideas about improving accountability at neighbourhood level, at command unit level and for police forces as a whole, taking into account both the nature and the make-up of those forces.

Hugh Bayley: The police precept in North Yorkshire has more than doubled in the past three years, but not all the extra money is being spent on front-line policing, which is what the public want. Although we now have the largest ever number of police officers in North Yorkshire, people in the central area, which includes the city of York and suffers from half the crime in the county, have less than half the police resources. People would like to see a police authority that represents their views and ensures that resources are placed where they are most needed in the county.

Mr. Blunkett: I understand that minority political representation is not available from the city, and I think that that is a great shame, as the strength of any reform of the police service will be to maintain the consistency and continuity that come from drawing together people of good intent, whatever their politics, to form a consensus behind political priorities and investment. I hope that the North Yorkshire force will take note of my hon. Friend's plea and recognise that, where there have been additional strains in North Yorkshire, such as in the policing of Menwith Hill, the Home Office has been prepared to put in extra resources to ensure that policing is not damaged, including in places such as York.

Mr. Andrew Mitchell (Sutton Coldfield) (Con): The Home Secretary will be aware that it has been extremely difficult to reach a settlement this year in the west midlands, where there has been a 12.5 per cent. precept and the force has had to dip into reserves to the tune of £5 million. Does he accept that, unless he looks carefully at the arrangement for next year, it will not be possible to reach a settlement in the west midlands without either a massive increase in the precept or a diminution in the police service?

Mr. Blunkett: There has been a particular challenge for major urban and metropolitan forces, not least because, after massive representations, we agreed to a flat-rate increase in the police grant. [Interruption.] [HON. MEMBERS: "Bravo."] Bravo indeed. Obviously, there have been very substantial additions to the police grant in the west midlands through the crime fighting fund, Airwave and other activities, but I accept entirely the cry from the west midlands, which has a good police force that has done a great deal of imaginative work and made a substantial difference to policing at a local level.

Mr. Bill O'Brien (Normanton) (Lab): Does my right hon. Friend accept that it is important that the police should be accountable to people who are paying the police precept? One way of doing that is through the community police forums. In West Yorkshire, the police authority is reducing the number of police forums. I consider that a move in the wrong direction in terms of trying to secure police accountability. Does he accept that there has to be more accountability and not less, as there appears to be in West Yorkshire?

Mr. Blunkett: Following the consultation, we will produce a further document with more positive proposals on which we will consult in relation to accountability, responsiveness and availability at local level. We believe not only that it is good that the police themselves should be accountable at each level of the service, but that engaging the public is a very positive way of ensuring that they can reduce crime. In areas where such positive engagement has occurred, there is a material difference in terms of collaboration with the community, the preparedness of witnesses to come forward and the success of the police in reducing not only antisocial behaviour, but the volume of crime.

Mr. James Paice (South-East Cambridgeshire) (Con): The Home Secretary and his police Minister claim credit for all sorts of achievements—they recite figures about extra police officers in every constituency—yet at the same time, they criticise the police authorities for raising their precepts by considerably more than the amount of extra money that they received from the Home Office. Now the Home Secretary is talking about the principle of accountability. Is he talking about the accountability of the same police authorities that have to submit their annual policing plan to him, after which he has the power to send it back, a bit like a child's homework, over and over again until they get it right? Are these the same police authorities whose control over expenditure has shrunk over the years as their budgets have been held back while centrally determined ring-fenced budgets have increased by anything up to 50 per cent. a year, as has happened in some cases? How can he really talk about increasing accountability if he is not going to give the authorities some responsibility for what actually goes on in their area so that they can take the credit or, if necessary, the blame? Will he tell us what powers he is going to give back to police authorities?

Mr. Blunkett: I was not aware that I had taken any powers away from police authorities. The hon. Gentleman did not list a single responsibility that I have taken away from police authorities or any changes that I have made to their ability to hold chief constables to account. Police authorities often grumble that they are not responsible for holding the police chief and his senior officers to account, and the hon. Gentleman cannot have it one way but not the other.

I shall quickly deal with the individual issues. First, we have not held down precepts. Secondly, we have not criticised police authorities about precepts—the final precepts have not even been announced yet, so even if we wanted to criticise police authorities, we could not do so. Thirdly, we have been working with police forces. Fourthly, I did not claim credit for what has happened in the west midlands or north or west Yorkshire; I commended West Midlands police on its actions and said that police on the ground working with local people made the difference. We have made a difference by putting resources in. Yes, the ring-fenced crime fighting fund has led to an additional 11,000 police officers, 3,500 community support officers and 10,000 extra civilian staff compared with the loss of 1,100 police, no community support officers and no proposals for investment in civilianisation that occurred in the years leading up to 1997, which is precisely why the Conservative party lost.

Mr. Peter Pike (Burnley) (Lab): My right hon. Friend knows that I welcome the Government's improvements to policing in this country since 1997. However, a blueprint for policing in Lancashire was published last October, and this year the precept has increased by 15 per cent., which will not meet the demands and expectations of Lancashire police. Lancashire police believed that with a Labour Government it would get better policing, which it could not get under a Tory Government.

Mr. Blunkett: I agree entirely with my hon. Friend. I am pleased by the way in which the chair of Lancashire police authority has led the reform agenda and made changes at a local level, including measures to increase social cohesion, which is so important in my hon. Friend's constituency.

Immigration and Nationality Directorate

10. Angela Watkinson (Upminster) (Con): If he will make a statement on the relaxation of clearance standards in the immigration and nationality directorate. [162528]

The Minister for Citizenship and Immigration (Beverley Hughes): The hon. Lady is aware that an investigation is under way and a further statement will be made as soon as possible after it has been completed.

Angela Watkinson: Will the Minister comment on the accuracy of newspaper reports last week that, in dealing with a backlog of 29,000 citizenship applications, caseworkers were instructed to accept what people told them about their absences from this country and to dispense with checks on travel documents and passports? If so, is she concerned that there may be one person among those 29,000 people whose reasons for absence from this country may be more sinister than the explanation that they have given?

Beverley Hughes: We must all accept, that, under any Government, past or present, most Departments must take sensible measures to deal with backlogs. The important point is that those decisions must be based on a clear assessment of risk, proper research and clear information. The change to citizenship procedure is entirely different from the issue that occurred in Sheffield and is the kind of sensible measure that any Department would take. Staff suggested the change, which was risk assessed. They examined what people had written on their applications about holidays and business trips taken abroad in 100 randomly selected cases and found that in all those cases that information could be reconciled with those people's passports. It was clear that it was entirely safe to take at face value what was written on the application forms for that particular group of applications. That decision did not affect character checks, police crime checks, national security checks—where appropriate—or the examination of the full immigration history on all those cases. The measure is sensible and proportionate, and it is right to support it.

Dr. Vincent Cable (Twickenham) (LD): Following the revelations that the whistleblower from the immigration and nationality directorate was a political activist who had openly advocated the use of nuclear weapons against Muslim radicals, what steps is the Minister taking to ensure that in future her Department conforms to the standards of impartiality that one would expect of the civil service?

Beverley Hughes: The hon. Gentleman makes a valid point. No matter how rigorous one's recruitment and selection procedures, when one is appointing large numbers of people, it is possible that people who have not declared particular points of view or allegiances will sometimes get through. I understand that Conservative Members in particular will want to exploit the issue, but it is regrettable that the leader of the Conservative party aligned himself very publicly with this individual without making the necessary checks as to whether he was a worthy person. It was no surprise when he had rapidly to distance himself the following day.

Deployment of British Forces (Kosovo)

3.30 pm

Mr. Tam Dalyell (Linlithgow) (Lab) (Urgent Question): To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement on the deployment of British forces in Kosovo.

The Minister of State, Ministry of Defence (Mr. Adam Ingram): Last week, there was an upsurge in violence in Kosovo that resulted in deaths in the ethnic Albanian and Serb communities, as well as hundreds injured, including some KFOR troops. Although Kosovo is now calmer, the potential for renewed violence remains. The troops who were already in Kosovo were heavily committed in dealing with the situation. Commander KFOR therefore took the decision to authorise the deployment of his in-theatre tactical reserves to assist with the situation. In addition, NATO issued instructions to reinforce KFOR with additional SFOR troops from Bosnia, including a UK company of 1st Royal Gurkha Rifles, a US company and a company from the Italian multinational support unit, the carabinieri.

In the early hours of Thursday 18 March, NATO called forward the operational reserve force ready battalion. The ready battalion role is one for which the UK has responsibility during the first six months of this year. The lead elements of the operational reserve force ready battalion—approximately 150 men—left RAF Brize Norton on Thursday afternoon and landed in Kosovo late that evening. The vast majority of the operational reserve force ready battalion of around 660 men has now deployed, with the 1st Battalion the Royal Gloucestershire Berkshire and Wiltshire Regiment providing the core of the battalion group. Around 1,100 UK armed forces personnel are now deployed in Kosovo.

The purpose of the deployment is to restore calm to the province and to prevent unrest spreading to areas outside Kosovo—the type of task for which the operational reserve was designed. UK troops will, as tasked by Commander KFOR, conduct routine patrolling, the guarding of sites such as the UN mission, and public order duties. To call upon the in-theatre tactical reserve, followed by the operational reserve, then the strategic reserve, is the correct, graduated and planned response to such a situation. The fact that Kosovo has been calmer over the weekend shows that that was the correct decision.

Further to the deployment of the UK battalion, NATO has requested that an element of the NATO strategic reserve force, provided by a French battalion, should also be deployed to Kosovo. NATO has also requested the deployment of the three standby battalions that make up the full operational reserve force. Those battalions are provided by the US, Germany and Italy. The German battalion will, in the first instance, be deployed to Skopje, Macedonia. It is for NATO to determine for how long reserves will be required, but in terms of an initial estimate, and with the situation changing, we believe that a sensible course of action is to plan initially for a deployment period of about 30 days. The situation in Kosovo now appears calmer, although it is still tense.

With permission, Mr. Speaker, I should also inform the House that we have received preliminary reports of an incident involving British troops in Basra this morning. Right hon. and hon. Members will understand that the information remains incomplete. Initial reports indicate that two explosions took place. We have reports of injury to 13 British soldiers, although none is believed to be life-threatening. The process of informing next of kin is under way. It would be inappropriate to make any further comment at this stage.

Mr. Dalyell: I accept that it would be inappropriate to say anything about events in Basra.

As one who was the guest for four days during their deployment in Kosovo of my national service regiment, the Scots Dragoon Guards, may I ask the Minister to say something about the horrendous difficulty of the task that faces NATO troops, who are often the proverbial piggy-in-the-middle in the searing bitterness between Serb and Albanian? What can be done to prevent the ethnic cleansing of the Serbs? We do not have to give in—do we?—to the aspirations of those who want a Greater Albania.

My right hon. Friend referred to the holy sites. What can be done about the burning of the churches, which are genuinely important to European heritage? Is it sensible to talk in terms of imposing a corridor to the unique monastery at Gracanica, which is so important to Serbs anywhere in the world? What can be done to protect the nickel factory, which is the engine of Kosovo production, and help it to recover from the American bombing? Those who have been there know its importance in generating any sort of meaningful employment. It is a genuinely urgent matter.

Mr. Ingram: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for recognising the difficulty of the task. Any peacekeeping mission has attendant risks and Kosovo clearly ranks high in that. That is why the decision was made to deploy at short notice.

My hon. Friend asked about the future for Kosovo. Of course, that is matter for the discussions, which are at a very early stage. The Foreign and Commonwealth Office takes a lead in that and it is working on the best way to deal with the continuing process of trying to establish a stable set of relationships in the Balkans.

On sensitive sites and their protection, it is a matter for the commander of KFOR to make the best use of his troops; the judgment call rests with him. However, from my experience and that of my hon. Friend, there is an awareness of the sensitivity of specific sites and the way in which any attacks on them, whether people are present or not, can impact on the environment.

My hon. Friend made a point about the economy, although he particularised it by mentioning one factory. Kosovo's economy is in difficulties—I believe that unemployment is around 70 per cent.—but economic stability can be developed only on the back of a secure environment. They must go hand in hand. The more we can stabilise security, the greater the prospects for economic rejuvenation and regeneration in Kosovo.

Mr. Nicholas Soames (Mid-Sussex) (Con): I thank the Minister for bringing us the anxious news from Basra. I am sure that he will keep the House informed as matters develop.

[Mr. Nicholas Soames]

Nobody should be under any illusions that we are considering the most serious crisis in the Balkans since the end of the Kosovo war. Last week's violence between the Kosovo Serb minority and the dominant ethnic Albanians was surprisingly swift and widespread. There is no doubt that it represents a major setback for the Kosovo peace process and the international community's efforts in the province. It was probably inflamed by extremists of what used to be the Kosovo Liberation Army. The importance of the quick and robust deployment should not be underestimated.

The stakes are high. The destabilisation of Kosovo would result in further and more serious bloodshed in the province and further instability in south-eastern Europe. We cannot afford that. The work done and the progress achieved must not be undermined. Will the Minister confirm that the NATO Secretary-General is visiting the province?

Will the Minister answer the following questions? I understand that 1st Battalion the Royal Gloucestershire, Berkshire and Wiltshire Regiment is providing the core of the operational reserve force battalion group. What is the length of that commitment likely to be? Who will replace the RGBW as the core spearhead battalion? Will he confirm that the deployed troops have been issued with a full complement of personal equipment, including enhanced combat body armour?

According to the Serbia and Montenegro army chief of the general staff's interpretation of the Kumanovo agreement between NATO and the then Federal Republic of Yugoslavia in 1999, the Serbia and Montenegro army could be allowed to return to Kosovo in exceptional circumstances. Can the Minister clarify whether that is really the case? Under what circumstances will that be allowed to happen?

What representations did NATO receive from the Serbia and Montenegro Defence Minister in Belgrade? How many NATO troops have been sent from Bosnia to Kosovo? Is the Minister confident that the security situation in Bosnia is stable enough to allow this temporary reduction in troop numbers? Furthermore, and importantly, what is his assessment of the effect that that will have on the EU takeover of the NATO SFOR operation in Bosnia and Herzegovina?

We are entirely confident that British troops will play a full and, as always, distinguished part in getting Kosovo back to normality. We wish them every success and a safe and prompt return.

Mr. Ingram: In response to the hon. Gentleman's first point, of course I will keep the House informed of developments regarding the incident in Basra, and I hope that the information that I gave—that the injuries do not appear to be life-threatening—remains correct.

The hon. Gentleman is right that this is a significant issue. He is familiar, because of his time doing my job and his time in Northern Ireland, with the fact that any peace process in relation to major conflict between ethnic groups has the capacity to spill over. That must be planned for at all times. The rapid deployment of these reserve forces is a good indication of that knowledge being immediately to the fore of all planning considerations, so that we could deploy back to the area if required.

The hon. Gentleman asked about the length of time of the deployment. I stated earlier that 30 days is what is anticipated, but that will be dependent on NATO's request. In relation to the lead battalion, the UK was designated for the first six months of 2004, to be followed by the US, so we are halfway through that six-month period. The initial commitment, however, is anticipated to be for 30 days. If the situation can be stabilised, we can withdraw, and if there is a need for extension, of course, that judgment will have to be made following NATO's request. In relation to who then fills that lead role, 1 Para will step into that readiness role.

The hon. Gentleman asked about a full complement of equipment. I can tell him that the troops deployed have been given a full complement of equipment. He also asked about the deployment of Serbian forces. I know of no plans for that to happen. It seems to me that there would have to be a mature set of relationships between Kosovo and Serbia for such a development at this stage. As to the deployment of troops from Bosnia, as I indicated in my opening statement, three companies were moved initially from Bosnia, and the reserve, to be followed by the strategic reserve, will make up the numbers that the NATO commander requires.

Mrs. Alice Mahon (Halifax) (Lab): May I put it to the Minister that in 1999, 200,000 Serbs, Roma, Gorani and other ethnic groups either left out of fear or were driven out by the KLA—almost certainly the same people who organised a very effective burning and looting of 3,500 homes, churches and so on in the last few days? The UN spokesman has confirmed that. Has the Minister or the Prime Minister any plans to visit some of the people who have been ethnically cleansed for five years now, and who are living in miserable conditions in camps in Serbia and Montenegro? Will he do something about ensuring that they return safely and are protected? We hear reports that French troops and the police stood by while houses and churches were burned. Surely, if he supported the action to drive the Serbs out of Kosovo, as he did, it cannot be the case that one set of ethnic cleansing is right and the other is wrong.

Mr. Ingram: I do not think that NATO, the European Union, the United Nations or, indeed, the United Kingdom Government would say that one form of ethnic cleansing is wrong and another is right. Our aim in deploying troops into this troubled region is to bring back peace, separate the warring factions—if that is how they should be described—and find a way of establishing stability, so that we can make progress on the other agenda.

My hon. Friend is right: there are many tragic stories to be told about the Balkans. I think that we as a nation can hold our head high in view of the way in which we have contributed to the effort to find a solution. Many thought we should not engage in the Balkans, as they think we should not engage in other trouble spots; but if we have to face up to harsh realities and deal with big issues, it will mean a commitment of British troops.

Of course we shall do all we can to ensure that those who have been displaced across the region have a calm, peaceful future, but that will take time. It cannot simply be asked for. It must be delivered on the back of what we do in this country, through Europe and through the United Nations, and we must also build on any good will that may reside within these troubled communities.

Tom Brake (Carshalton and Wallington) (LD): I, too, thank the Minister for agreeing to keep the House informed about the incident in Basra.

We entirely agree with what the Secretary of State said in his written statement about the need not to lose the gains made in Kosovo so far, and the need for our forces to bring stability to Kosovo and make it clear that ethnic cleansing is unacceptable. Can the Minister tell us what impact, if any, there will be on any existing UK commitments or responsibilities if the operational reserve force has to stay for more than 30 days, and what additional UK reserves are available for deployment if additional forces are required to bring stability to Kosovo?

It is early days for the ORF, but has any preliminary assessment been made of whether it is likely to have to stay beyond the 30 days, or whether it might be able to return before they have elapsed? What will be the impact if it is required to stay beyond June 2004?

Mr. Ingram: There will be no impact on other UK commitments. The ready battalion was designed specifically as an over-the-horizon force. As I explained in response to an earlier question, when it moves out others will move in to replace that capability. Plans have been made to cover predicted eventualities, although no one can say what else may be on the horizon. We must plan for such things, in one sense, but we must also stand ready for what may be unexpected. I cannot give answers about the future, because I do not have the capacity to predict with any certainty what else may happen internationally. What I do know is that the British armed forces have shown time and again that when there is a requirement for them to deliver they will do so, in a very professional and committed way.

The reserve force represents a multinational rather than just a UK response. A good many nations are very committed: there are some 42 in the Balkans, 25 of them European. We must show that international resolve and international strength can be used to deal with the emerging problems—quickly, we hope. Although the situation is calmer now, there is still tension. We have specified 30 days initially, but if the troops are required to stay longer and if the NATO commander wants them to do so, that is what they have been designated for. The questions must be answered at the time, however, because we do not know quite what the demand will be so far into the future.

David Winnick (Walsall, North) (Lab): To keep the matter in perspective, is it not the case that the NATO intervention five years ago stopped state organised ethnic cleansing and massacres, some of which were reported to the House, which led to the House concluding that such an intervention was absolutely necessary? Have not allied troops done a very good job in the past five years in trying to keep the two hostile communities apart, until the very sad situation last week? By and large, has not the intervention of 1999 shown itself to be absolutely justified?

Mr. Ingram: I agree with my hon. Friend. I visited Kosovo in 1999 to look at the police presence. At that time, I was the Minister responsible for security in Northern Ireland. We put in a sizeable contingent of officers from the Royal Ulster Constabulary, as it was called then. Together with other police, they made a major contribution alongside the military in Kosovo. There is no question that what we did then was correct. Although some had doubts about it then and may still have doubts about it now, it was correct. Our recent deployment shows the strength of our resolve to try to work this through to a positive conclusion.

Hugh Robertson (Faversham and Mid-Kent) (Con): I associate myself entirely with the expression of good wishes to our armed forces as they deploy, but is not the lesson elsewhere in the Balkans, particularly in Bosnia, that enclaves on their own, such as we saw in Jepa, Srebrenica and Gorazde, are not viable in the longer term? What impact will that have for the long-term future of Kosovo?

Mr. Ingram: In a sense, that is going into territory for which I do not have direct responsibility. Trying to manage the process and to get people reintegrated to stop enclaves of people, as they can be described, clearly has big attendant risks but, as I said earlier, the process must develop with the good will of the people. It cannot be an imposed solution, so we have to marry up those two very difficult, conflicting problems. Some ethnic concentrations can put other minority ethnic concentrations at risk. That must be taken into account in seeking to establish any long-term structure for the Balkans, Kosovo and Serbia and for the various ethnic groupings in those areas. However, I do not think that what we are doing now is about trying to resolve the specific problem that the hon. Gentleman raised.

Hugh Bayley (City of York) (Lab): When I visited Kosovo with the NATO Parliamentary Assembly, I was encouraged to see the progress that was being made in the Kosovo police service and at the Kosovo police training college to bring in people from all ethnic groups to train them together and to ensure they slept in the same dormitories, attended classes together and learned each other's languages. Does my right hon. Friend agree that it is important to continue to provide resources that bring the communities together for training on issues such as policing, and that there is a general lesson that after conflict we have to continue to invest in post-conflict reconstruction if we are to provide a viable future for a country emerging from civil war?

Mr. Ingram: I agree entirely with my hon. Friend. It is important to continue all our efforts. The eight standards that have been set—and that will be subject to review in the middle of next year to see what progress has been made—take into account the normalisation of that society, for which the overall security profile becomes important in terms of civil administration, policing and the judiciary. At present those are proving difficult, but that is what we must all strive towards. Important steps have been made. We have achieved some measure of progress, but there is a long way still to go in all this. My hon. Friend is right that, in terms of post-conflict reconstruction, we need to be there for a considerable period because, again, as the old phrase goes, peace is not an event but a process. It will take time—both in the initial phase that we are now in and in later stages—to get it right.

Mr. Andrew Mackay (Bracknell) (Con): As someone who strongly supports the deployment, may I gently put it to the Minister that it was unfortunate, to say the least, that it was the Father of the House, through an urgent question, who brought a Minister to the Dispatch Box? In future, when there is a major deployment, can we guarantee that the Secretary of State or, if he is absent, the Minister, comes to the Dispatch Box? That is what the House needs and deserves.

Mr. Ingram: In terms of the timing, the call was made in the early hours of Thursday morning, as I explained, and it is a normal deployment; it is what that force stands ready for. The judgment was made, and we would have thought that the House understood that, as it was a normal deployment—[Interruption.] Clearly, some Members do not think so, which is why the Father of the House, my hon. Friend the Member for Linlithgow (Mr. Dalyell), requested an urgent question and was granted one. Clearly, we will take lessons from that if lessons need to be taken. We will take such things into consideration in any future deployment, but should this apply to withdrawals as well? Should justification be given for every decision? [Interruption.] Well, I am only posing the question because I am sure that some would think that they always have the right to ask such questions. If a withdrawal took place, they would ask about the basis of the withdrawal. The right hon. Gentleman says that the deployment is significant. It involves a battalion that stood ready for the purpose, and I explained the reasoning behind that in my opening statement.

Mr. John Wilkinson (Ruislip-Northwood) (Con): As a company of Gurkhas from the stabilisation force in Bosnia and Herzegovina, next door, was promptly on the scene, will the Minister respond to the pertinent question asked by my hon. Friend the Member for Mid-Sussex (Mr. Soames) from the Front Bench? Will such an intervention by a reserve—a back-up—from the stabilisation force in Bosnia and Herzegovina always be available from that country once the stabilisation role is taken over by the European Union? NATO is responsible for that now, so there is inherently no problem—but, if the forces are under EU control, there could be a fatal interval before a deployment takes place.

Mr. Ingram: Those are the very issues that must be bottomed out in considering the future presence in Bosnia. We have not reached a final conclusion, but NATO is comfortable with the development of those talks. We are quite far down the road of working out what the force package should be in Bosnia and how it should be structured and utilised. The hon. Gentleman will be aware that we consider the Balkans as, in a sense, one region because each country impacts on the other, and the force strength there should be best utilised to deal with the problems as they arise. Sometimes that will be straightforward; sometimes it will be difficult, depending on the circumstances. That is why we need such a significant international commitment to the force; it cannot be delivered by the UK and the US alone. We need many allies to participate. Of course, the Italians, the French and the Germans are heavily committed, along with other European nations, to deliver the very mission that we are seeking to deal with at present.

Mr. Crispin Blunt (Reigate) (Con): The Minister should be aware that when the Defence Committee visited our troops in Kosovo last month, a clear majority of them did not think that a deployment in Kosovo was a worthwhile use of their time. The Government have been warned repeatedly that the political strategy that NATO is following, which our troops are being asked to support, would end in their being attacked by the very people whom they went there ostensibly to help. As the Serbian Government, who after all hold the sovereignty of Kosovo, now appear to be talking about the partition of various parts of Kosovo, I urge the Minister to get hold of the Foreign Office and get it to support any strategy that will bring political closure to the issue and enable us to get our soldiers and the rest of the international community out of Kosovo, there having been a political settlement.

Mr. Ingram: I will not respond to the hon. Gentleman's first comments, where he seeks to speak for all the British forces in Kosovo, as though he is some great guru of knowledge because of a visit there. He suggests that the troops have one clear, focused view of their deployment. I hear what he says, but there is no point in entering into that territory.

I indicated in an earlier answer that the Foreign and Commonwealth Office is, of course, very active in trying to work through solutions and in considering how the process can be moved forward. That is not easy. Competing, conflicting ethnic demands are involved. It is big scale and cannot be resolved at the flick of a switch. It is not a case of the FCO putting in another set of resources, thus resolving the situation. It has to be worked through with the international community and with the countries and ethnic groupings in that area. As I indicated, the eight strands of development are subject to review in the middle of next year, and I understand that the FCO has three teams working on developing the best way forward. The Government are committed to finding a solution, and I should have hoped that the hon. Gentleman would support us in that.

Mr. Michael Weir (Angus) (SNP): The Minister said that the UK troops were the ready battalion for the first six months of this year. Do I take it that he anticipates a reduction in the number of British troops at the end of that six-month period should the situation in Kosovo continue to be fluid? If not, is he satisfied that, given the commitments in other parts of the world, he has sufficient reserves to rotate troops out of the trouble spots?

Mr. Ingram: I am conscious that the leader of the hon. Gentleman's party said that it was an unpardonable folly to get involved in Kosovo in the first place, so I do not know whether the hon. Gentleman is now supporting what we are seeking to do in Kosovo and understands that the scale of what we seek to achieve is important not just for the people of that region but for Europe and beyond. I explained that the lead battalion stands ready for a six-month period and that we were given that task for the first six months of this year and were to be followed by the United States. We alternate on that basis.

Our commitment as lead battalion will be for six months, and that period will end in the middle of this year. The current deployment is initially for 30 days, but that will depend on circumstances on the ground and the request then made by the commander of KFOR. As I said in an earlier answer, I cannot predict far into the future. We have to deal with each situation as it arises and we have clearly been able to deliver when we have been called upon. However, I am conscious of the fact that the hon. Gentleman and his party have opposed probably every important international mission that we have sought to get engaged in. I do know what their motivation is in all that.

Mr. John Randall (Uxbridge) (Con): Does the Minister agree with the assessment of many people, including the spokesmen for United Nations Mission in Kosovo—UNMIK—and for NATO, that the violence was not spontaneous but was, in fact, co-ordinated? Does that have any implications for our troops?

Mr. Ingram: We do not yet have a mature understanding of what precipitated the violence, but the best information that I have is that it looked as though it was spontaneous and was built on the back of a particular grievance, but that it then became organised. That would not be unsurprising, but it does not mean that it is necessarily the case. Extremists can exploit any point of unrest and they are very quick to move in to maximise the potential for what they seek to achieve. We therefore have to get the best information on the ground and, importantly, to analyse it to make sure that we make the best response.

Bob Russell (Colchester) (LD): Can the Minister confirm that the British Army is between 3,000 and 4,000 soldiers under strength. With that in mind and given all the existing commitments, does he agree that overstretch is getting worse and that the additional commitments now being imposed on the Army are adding to the stresses and strains? Although he mentioned the European nations that have supported peacekeeping in Kosovo, does he agree that more effort should be made to encourage greater European support for what the British Army is doing?

The Minister will also be aware that 500 troops from Colchester garrison are serving in southern Iraq. Will he please keep me posted on the desperate situation reported in Basra today?

Mr. Ingram: I gave the information that the hon. Gentleman referred to in his final point, but I hope that he realises why I gave it. It is breaking news and I thought it important to impart it. I have given the best information that we have and I shall, of course, keep the House informed as the situation develops.

The hon. Gentleman asked about the strength of the British Army. We have had the best recruiting year for the past 20 years. There are now 2,000 more in the Army than there were at this time last year. That is a significant achievement. He will be aware that we are continuing to move towards full manning strength, although it takes a lot of effort by, and commitment from, those in the training regime and the recruitment environment. We have worked hard to eat into the under-strength that exists, and we are making some progress.

On greater European support, the involvement of 25 European nations indicates a measure of commitment, although clearly it is of varying degrees. Given the type of initiatives that have taken place in the EU, there is no question of trying to make the Balkans an EU-led issue, and I would expect the hon. Gentleman to support that. The approach must be consistent with what we have been able to achieve through NATO and we must be able to match NATO's capabilities. I shall keep him up to speed with what is happening in Basra and Iraq at present.

Mr. David Cameron (Witney) (Con): Clearly, anything that happens in Kosovo has important knock-on effects next door in Macedonia. Does the right hon. Gentleman agree that it would be highly desirable to give that small country as many reassurances as possible before making a statement about the future status of Kosovo itself? Does he agree that those reassurances should include encouragement about future NATO and EU membership, and perhaps even calling the country by its proper name rather than a bizarre set of initials?

Mr. Ingram: We are some way away from the final status for Kosovo. As I have indicated, we are only in the foothills of several of the developments that have taken place there. I also pointed out in my earlier answers that there is a need to ensure that every party is taken along with the process. It would be wrong to develop and impose an answer that would create greater ethnic conflict. Having said that, I do not have the capacity to say at this stage that that will be delivered any more easily than the hon. Gentleman could deliver a profile for the future of the region. There is a lot of work to be done and the presence of our troops is required to maintain stability there. We shall do what we have to do to bring about the peaceful future that I know he wants not only for Macedonia, but for the rest of the Balkans.

Points of Order

4.7 pm

Mr. Oliver Heald (North-East Hertfordshire) (Con): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, of which I have given you notice. You will know that I tabled an urgent question this morning about the serious incident here on Saturday, when demonstrators were able to climb St. Stephen's Tower. I have voluntarily withdrawn it because I recognise the difficulties in examining detailed security matters on the Floor of the House. However, would you agree that it was highly irresponsible of the people involved to take such action and that it was worrying that the response was so slow? Last week, I wrote to you setting out in confidence a range of issues on how to protect the Palace of Westminster. Can you assure the House that all aspects of security, including those set out in my letter, are now under the fullest possible review, and that even if security measures cause inconvenience to hon. Members and their staff, they will be fully considered with action taken as appropriate? What assurances are you able to give to the House, Mr. Speaker?

Several hon. Members rose—

Mr. Speaker: Let me reply to the hon. Gentleman.

I do not intend to discuss the details of our security measures on the Floor of the House, but I assure the House that I take the incident at the weekend extremely seriously. I have received a full report from the Head of Security and have inspected the area where the breach took place. An urgent review is being undertaken, both of the security precautions in that particular area and of our security arrangements as a whole. The House should be aware that any significant tightening of security in this building is likely to give rise to some inconvenience for Members, staff and visitors. I look to Members to set a good example in this respect and not to make the job of our security staff any more difficult than it already is.

Mr. Eric Forth (Bromley and Chislehurst) (Con): Further to that point of order, Mr. Speaker. We are most reassured that you are taking a close interest in this matter, but can you assure us that those who are responsible for advising you and, indeed, for the security of the building and the premises generally are taking an equally serious view of the matter? You cannot be expected to supervise the process personally, so I hope that we can have your reassurance that they are taking it seriously and that you have had their reassurances that everything will be done to ensure that the situation cannot be repeated.

Mr. Speaker: When I heard of the situation on Saturday, I was, of course, in my constituency in Glasgow. I told the senior Officers of the House responsible for security to be at a meeting this morning, and told them not to meet in my study but to get their overcoats on because we were going outside to see exactly where the breach of security took place. Every senior Officer is well aware of the fact that I want better security in this building. I reiterate that that will mean inconvenience for hon. Members. If they are taking guests on to the Terrace and are stopped by security staff, I do not expect them to give any security officer who is acting under my instructions any difficulty whatever. I say that because that has happened time and time again in this House of ours.

Mr. Andrew Mackay (Bracknell) (Con): Further to that point of order, Mr. Speaker. I very much welcome what you just said and your personal involvement in the security case. Will you confirm that the very people who failed to secure the House properly and allowed the breach of security to take place are the same people who are advising you and the House—in my view, quite wrongly—that we should have a security screen in the Public Gallery?

Mr. Speaker: Let me preface my remarks by saying that I do not wish to go into serious detail about security matters on the Floor of the House. My predecessors always felt strongly about that, and so do I.

Mr. Peter Lilley (Hitchin and Harpenden) (Con): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. You will know that it is almost unprecedented for a Minister to disclaim responsibility for the policies pursued by his or her Department. In those circumstances, it behoves the whole House to seize every opportunity to hold that Minister to account. There seemed every possibility that we would have an opportunity to question a Home Office Minister on the apparent lack of control on the crucial issue of immigration, which concerns all our constituents, when we reached question 10, tabled by my hon. Friend the Member for Upminster (Angela Watkinson). Yet you will have observed, Mr. Speaker, that because of an organised attempt at filibustering, with long and unhelpful answers to previous questions, we only just got to question 10 at the end of Question Time. The Minister concerned then gave what was, in effect, a statement rather than an ordinary answer, thereby depriving us of the opportunity of holding her to account for her denial of responsibility for the policies pursued by her Department. Can you make it clear to Ministers that an irresponsible Minister is worth as much as a three-pound note?

Mr. Speaker: I will not be drawn into that matter.

Mrs. Cheryl Gillan (Chesham and Amersham) (Con): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. Our prisons are full to bursting, in crisis and only a small number of places away from being at full operational capacity. At Home Office questions, I asked the Minister about operational capacity and said that the number of people in prison was 75,073—only eight places away from being full. The Minister replied that that was incorrect. I left the Chamber and checked the statistics for the Prison Service on the Home Office website. Indeed, the website confirms that the operational capacity is 75,073 and that there are only eight places left.

Can you advise me, Mr. Speaker? Either the Minister or the official Home Office website is wrong. In dealing with such a sensitive matter, how are hon. Members supposed to get their information? Should not the Minister come to the House and apologise either for the inaccuracy of Home Office information or for his response in Question Time?

Mr. Speaker: The hon. Lady well knows that Home Office questions last an hour. It seems that she is trying to go beyond the hour. She can always seek a meeting to take up the matter directly with the Minister concerned.

BILL PRESENTED

SOVEREIGNTY OF PARLIAMENT (EUROPEAN COMMUNITIES)

Mr. William Cash, supported by Mr. Richard Shepherd, Mr. Eric Forth, Sir Nicholas Winterton, Mr. Edward Leigh, Sir Teddy Taylor, Mr. Richard Bacon, Mr. David Heathcoat-Amory, Denzil Davies, Mr. John Redwood and Sir Peter Tapsell, presented a Bill to provide that Community treaties, Community instruments and Community obligations shall only be binding in legal proceedings in the United Kingdom insofar as they do not conflict with a subsequent, expressly inconsistent, enactment of the Parliament of the United Kingdom: And the same was read the First time; and ordered to be read a Second time on Friday 14 May, and to be printed. [Bill 76].

Food Labelling

4.14 pm

Mr. Richard Bacon (South Norfolk) (Con): I beg to move,

That leave be given to bring in a Bill to make further provision for relevant information about food, including information about the country of origin, contents and standards of production of that food, to be made available to consumers by labelling, marking or in other ways; and for connected purposes.

I am pleased to invite the House to give leave for the introduction of a Bill to promote the clearer labelling of food. My proposal has support from Members on both sides of the House, and the aim is quite simple: to provide clearer, more accurate and more honest information to consumers about the food they buy than is currently required.

There are good reasons for seeking greater clarity in the labelling of our food. The first relates to the standards of animal welfare. Consumers make buying decisions according to various criteria, including quality and value for money, and also according to knowledge about the standards of animal welfare under which livestock is reared. Consumers are rightly concerned to know that the food that they buy in the shops is produced using the best animal welfare practices. Farmers in the United Kingdom must observe some of the highest animal welfare standards in the world, and that has the wide support of consumers. Accordingly, consumers should be able to use their buying decisions to support the production of food that meets high animal welfare standards. However, British farmers who adhere to those high standards often face unfair competition from imported food that is produced to inferior standards and is thus cheaper to produce.

The second reason for clearer labelling relates to animal disease. After the outbreaks of foot and mouth disease and classical swine fever, animal health risks have taken on a new importance in the public mind. The risks of animal disease in relation to imported food are beyond the control of individual farmers, but there is a role for the Government in ensuring that the provenance of all food is clear to consumers through clear labelling. The commission set up by the Government to review the future of farming under the chairmanship of Sir Don Curry stated that the controls that are considered necessary for food safety in this country should also be enforced on imported food. In particular, it is for the Government to ensure that there are the strictest controls, meeting the highest international standards, on illegal meat imports.

The third reason that we need clearer food labelling is that, at present, consumers are being misled. For example, it is possible to import lambs to the UK from France, slaughter them in the UK and label the result "Product of Britain". Pork that has been imported from Denmark and then packaged in the UK may also be called "Product of Britain". Butter churned in England using milk imported from Belgium should not, supposedly, be labelled "English", but it can lawfully be described as "produced in England from milk". Norwegian salmon that has been smoked in Scotland should not, supposedly, be called "Scottish", but it can lawfully be described as "salmon smoked in Scotland". At present, producers of imported meat can lawfully use the Union flag on packaging to imply that the product is British when it is not. In addition to the Union flag, phrases such as "Great British recipes" may be used on the packaging—for example, on imported pork—again implying that the meat is British when it is imported.

The fourth reason for clearer labelling is the position of British farmers and farming. In recent years, the farming sector in this country has seen the worst crisis for perhaps two generations. When the Curry commission was first set up by the Government to examine the future of farming, its remit included advising the Government on how to ensure that the farming and food sector contributes to a thriving and sustainable rural economy, as well as advancing environmental, economic, health and animal welfare goals. One of the key links in achieving those goals is the role of consumers, and in its final report the commission stated:

"The key objective of public policy should be to reconnect our food and farming industry: to reconnect farming with its market and the rest of the food chain; to reconnect the food chain and the countryside; and to reconnect consumers with what they eat and how it is produced."

At the heart of my Bill is the aim of empowering consumers. There is an intimate relationship between the buying decisions of consumers on the one hand and our continuing to have a farmed landscape that the public can enjoy on the other. However, no consumer can make a proactive decision to support domestic production without clear information.

Consumers may wish to exercise their choice in various ways. Their choices might reflect the desire to purchase food that is produced to our standards of production and animal welfare, or, by buying local food, to reduce fossil fuel emissions by reducing the long-distance transportation of food. Consumers may wish to buy imported food from specific countries, or to avoid doing so. Whatever consumers' desires, they cannot make informed choices without accurate information at the point of sale, and that requires clear food labelling. My Bill will require clear labelling of the country of origin. If food has been processed or packaged in a country other than the country of origin, details of the country of origin will be marked on the label in no less prominent a manner than the details of where the food has been processed or packaged. Where animal welfare standards for the production of food are lower than in this country, a reference to that fact should appear on the label.

I should make it clear that my Bill contains no proposals to restrict the legal import of foodstuffs, or in any other way to restrict competition. Such measures would be likely to infringe international trading agreements and European Union law. Under existing EU arrangements, the labelling of the country of origin is already required for fresh fruit and vegetables and, in the light of the BSE crisis, for beef. Under EU law, the so-called "promotion" of food from a particular country is not permitted, but the relevant EU directive itself requires an indication of the place of origin of a good if failure to give such an indication might mislead a purchaser to a material degree about its true origin. The clear labelling of the country of origin for all food, as my Bill proposes, offers equal treatment to all producers. In fact, it is logically impossible to suppose that providing greater transparency to consumers in a given marketplace can be said to favour one product over another. Providing more accurate information to potential buyers and sellers simply improves the operation of that market. None the less, if the happy consequence of greater transparency and more accurate information is that more consumers choose to buy food produced in Britain, I shall be very pleased, as will many farmers and food producers in this country. That is not the same as promotion, which is a matter for individuals and businesses.

In that respect, I pay special tribute to the Budgen's supermarket group. While I was visiting the Budgen's store in Harleston in my constituency, the chief executive, Mr. Martin Hyson, explained to me the company's policy of stocking only British meat. I also pay tribute to Waitrose, which has a policy of selling only British beef, pork and chicken. Sadly, not all supermarkets follow those excellent examples. Many habitually use their near-monopoly power to screw down on suppliers in a way that I believe is against the public interest. A food manufacturer recently told me about another company he knows of that supplies major supermarkets in the UK. One division of that company had a turnover of £400 million, yet made a profit of only £150,000. In other words, for every £2,666 of turnover, the company made a profit of £1—a profit margin of just three-eightieths of 1 per cent. When it is scarcely viable to be a food producer for the major supermarkets, the temptation to cut corners grows, which may lead directly to food scares and other problems. The ruthless behaviour of many supermarkets forces suppliers to search out, at all costs, the cheapest possible source of every ingredient, almost regardless of the long-term consequences for animal welfare, the environment, food safety, and the future of British farming.

Restraining the excessive power of the supermarkets is outside the scope of my Bill, but I believe that providing consumers with the accurate information that they need to make informed choices is a step in the right direction. There are some signs of progress. The National Pig Association promotes the quality standard mark for British pork, which is useful to consumers. The little red tractor mark, which the National Farmers Union originally developed in conjunction with the Government, is another useful measure, although it could do more. In fact, the mark does not indicate definitively that food is British produced, but shows only that the food complies with British standards. My Bill would take matters a step further. I very much hope that British consumers, armed with better information from clearer food labels, will choose to support domestic production and thereby to support higher animal welfare standards, British farmers and the sustaining of a farmed landscape in this country.

Question put and agreed to.

Bill ordered to be brought in by Mr. Richard Bacon, Mr. Frank Roy, Mr. Kevan Jones, Mr. Keith Simpson, Mr. A. J. Beith, Angus Robertson, Mr. Alan Williams, Alistair Burt, Mr. Stephen Pound, Ms Candy Atherton, Mr. David Ruffley and Sir Nicholas Winterton.

FOOD LABELLING

Mr. Richard Bacon accordingly presented a Bill to make further provision for relevant information about food, including information about the country of origin, contents and standards of production of that food, to be made available to consumers by labelling, marking or in other ways; and for connected purposes: And the same was read the First time; and ordered to be read a Second time on Friday 16 July, and to be printed [Bill 77].

ROYAL ASSENT

Mr. Speaker: I have to notify the House, in accordance with the Royal Assent Act 1967, that the Queen has signified her Royal Assent to the following Act:

Consolidated Fund Act 2004

Orders of the Day

WAYS AND MEANS

Order read for resuming adjourned debate on Question [17 March].

AMENDMENT OF THE LAW

Motion made, and Question proposed,

(1) That it is expedient to amend the law with respect to the National Debt and the public revenue and to make further provision in connection with finance.

(2) This Resolution does not extend to the making of any amendment with respect to value added tax so as to provide—

(a) for zero-rating or exempting a supply, acquisition or importation;

(b) for refunding an amount of tax;

(c) for any relief, other than a relief that—

(i) so far as it is applicable to goods, applies to goods of every description, and

(ii) so far as it is applicable to services, applies to services of every description—[Mr. Gordon Brown.]

Question again proposed.

Budget Resolutions and Economic Situation

4.25 pm

The Secretary of State for Health (Dr. John Reid): We on the Labour Benches are immensely proud of our national health service and of those who work in it. We say that not because NHS staff never make mistakes; they do. Any organisation that has to treat 1 million patients every 36 hours is obviously fallible. We do not express our support because the system is perfect. No human organisation that depends on the endeavours of 1.3 million people could possibly amount to perfection. However, we express support and our pride in the NHS because it brings more relief to people from pain, distress, anguish and insecurity than any other organisation in the world.

The question that we face, as we consider the implications of the Budget, is not whether the NHS is perfect or whether some imperfections can be elicited from the 1.3 million people who are engaged in their daily and determined work. The question is threefold. First, has the performance of the NHS improved over the past six years, recovering from its two decades and more of under-investment? Secondly, is it continuing to improve, and will the recent Budget contribute towards that continuing improvement? Thirdly, what alternative policies—in particular those of the Conservative party—would underpin or undermine that improvement, which has been taking place for the benefit of the vast majority of people who depend on the NHS? That is what we must consider.

The NHS is based on the principle of equal access to health care, free at the point of need. Its comprehensiveness and fairness is admired the world over, except occasionally, perhaps, on the Opposition Benches. It is paid for out of general taxation, and to date I have seen no convincing evidence that there is a better way of providing equity of access for an entire nation—and the beneficiary of the NHS is this whole nation.

We are proud that the system is British in its origin, British in its originality and British in its basic principle of matching excellence with equity. The Conservative party is proposing policies that would undermine that basic principle. Let us be clear during the debate that we cannot maintain an NHS that provides equal access for all if we subsidise those who can pay to jump the queue to a position above those who cannot afford to do so. Those two aims are incompatible and contradictory. We cannot give everyone the same chance of surviving ill health if we subsidise people who can pay to jump the queue but not those who cannot. We cannot pretend to give everyone a choice if only people who can pay have that choice. Those are simple truths—[Interruption.] We will let the nation decide whether those truths are simple and clear enough, and I look forward to letting it judge support for the national health service at the election.

The Conservative policies of diverting resources away from the many who depend on the NHS, towards the few who can afford to pay for private operations, are based on a cruel and callous deceit that is disguised as a so-called passport out of the national health service. The British people do not want a national health service in which public money subsidises queue jumping, which is why we welcome the fact that the next election will be fought on the principle of equal access to health care and why the Budget underlines that principle. [Interruption.] There appears to be a fashion for becoming ill at the podium when making a speech, but I assure the House that that is not flattery in any form.

Mr. Simon Burns (West Chelmsford) (Con): Have some water for the cough.

Alistair Burt (North-East Bedfordshire) (Con) rose—

Dr. Reid: I will take a drink while the hon. Member for North-East Bedfordshire (Alistair Burt) intervenes.

Alistair Burt: I thought that I would help the right hon. Gentleman by giving him a couple of minutes. It might assist him if, instead of trying to explain Conservative policies, he left that issue to my colleagues on the Front Bench. He could then use the reduced time available to address his own policies and the deficiencies of the service over which he currently presides.

Dr. Reid: I was just trying to be helpful.

When we came to power, we encountered a national health service that had serious capacity constraints—I do not think that any Opposition Member, however critical of the Government, would deny that—and had not received adequate investment for two decades and, indeed, some would say longer. We introduced measures across the system in Budget after Budget to increase capacity, raise quality and decrease variation of quality, which are all based on an increasing number of national service frameworks. We continue to develop those frameworks, which provide clear national standards and identify best practice so that users, managers and professionals alike have information and guidance to improve local services, for which we set a number of targets.

Previous under-investment was chronic and disabling. We made a start in correcting that from the publication of our 10-year plan onwards, but much more was needed, which is why my right hon. Friend the Chancellor announced in his 2002 Budget historic levels of investment in the national health service. For the five years from 2003–04 to 2007–08, NHS funding in England will increase each year by an average of 7.3 per cent. in real terms—the highest increase over the longest sustained period in the history of the national health service. That investment and reform are already producing results, such as increases in capacity. We have more staff delivering health care in the NHS than ever before—over 7,300 more consultants, over 2,300 more general practitioners and over 67,500 more nurses than in 1997. That is a token of our commitment to the national health service. A vast number of people in more than 70 professions are relieving pain—day in, day out.

Mr. Kevan Jones (North Durham) (Lab): Does my right hon. Friend agree that striking examples of that investment in my constituency are the new hospital in Chester-le-Street, a new doctor's surgery in Craghead and a proposed new health centre in Stanley, which would be put at risk if the Opposition implemented their vision of cuts in public services?

Dr. Reid: Yes, indeed. Later in my speech I will deal with the Opposition's plans for a massive diversion of funds away from the national health service. My hon. Friend is correct in pointing out that we have the biggest and most sustained building programme in the history of the NHS, not only in terms of hospitals, but through the refurbishment of some 3,000 general practitioners' premises throughout England.

There have also been real increases in output: 1.7 million more patients were seen for new hospital out-patient appointments last year than in 1997, which is a 15 per cent. increase, and there were 113,000 more cataract operations than in 1997, which is a 70 per cent. increase—all ignored in the so-called productivity figures that are made up by the Opposition. There were 19,000 more knee replacement operations than in 1997, which is a 69 per cent. increase; there were 950,000 more planned hospital admissions last year than in 1997, which is a 22 per cent. increase; and of course the NHS plan target of 6,000 extra heart operations by April 2003 was achieved a year earlier.

Mr. Andrew Lansley (South Cambridgeshire) (Con): Given what the Secretary of State has said, how does he explain the fact that just a few weeks ago the Organisation for Economic Co-operation and Development said of the NHS:

"Productivity seems to have declined as the growth in the number of doctors, nurses, hospital buildings and equipment have (not yet) been fully reflected in a growing number of treatments. In fact, growth in the volume of health care output has slowed down compared to the first half of the 1990s"?

Dr. Reid: The OECD, like the hon. Gentleman, has ignored the new walk-in centres, the new treatment centres, the 6.3 million people dealt with by NHS Direct, and the 400,000 operations. All those are increases in productivity that are ignored by the Opposition, who consider one element only of NHS operations: the full-time equivalent episodes carried out by consultants in hospitals.

Let me give an example. Of the 30 to 40 per cent. increase in investment over the past few years, a substantial amount goes in new drugs—statins. Over six years, they have contributed towards the biggest decrease in deaths from heart-related diseases in any country in the world—23.4 per cent. Statins, which account for about 10 per cent. of that decrease, have therefore led to a huge fall in mortality from circulatory diseases. The Opposition regard that as a fall in productivity; it is a fall in productivity because the people thus saved do not end up in hospital. It is a perverse definition of productivity that has been manufactured by the Conservatives purely to run down the NHS, which is their aim.

Let me deal with some of the increases in quality and access that are also ignored by the Opposition. Nineteen out of 20 people can now see a GP within 48 hours. It was scandalously difficult to see a GP when we inherited the national health service from the Conservatives. Nine out of 10 people can now be seen, diagnosed and treated in accident and emergency departments within four hours—a world-class standard. None of those increases in quality and ease of access has been taken into account by the Opposition. They do not want to concede to the NHS any improvement, because they want to privatise health care in this country.

Linda Gilroy (Plymouth, Sutton) (Lab/Co-op): May I invite my right hon. Friend to visit Plymouth, where he will see our new cardiac unit, which is now treating 1,850 people a year, compared with some 700 people in 1997? Given that heart disease has not increased by that amount in our area since that time, what does he suppose happened to the patients who were unable to get such treatment before we had the welcome investment that is pouring into the south-west?

Dr. Reid: What my hon. Friend says is absolutely true. I will be delighted to come to Plymouth if I can arrange a visit, but I am afraid that I have so many openings of so many establishments throughout the country that it may be some time before I can do so. Some 23 NHS-run and two independent sector treatment centres have now opened; between them, they will treat an additional 50,000 patients this year. There are also 42 NHS walk-in centres; 140 million more items were prescribed last year than six years ago; and there has been a 29 per cent. increase in drugs, which is bringing benefits. All those things are ignored, of course, by the Opposition, but they are bringing substantial improvements in people's lives. Indeed, they save lives.

I have recently given two figures. There have been sustained reductions in death rates from cancer, and a 10 per cent. fall in the rate of premature deaths—that is, among under-75s—from cancer since the 1995 to 97 figures were issued. Furthermore, death rates from heart-related disease among under-75s fell by more than 23,000 in the five years up to 2000 to 2002. That is a substantial saving of lives in this country as a result of the work of the national health service and the investment put into it.

None of those things makes me complacent for one moment and nor do they satisfy Labour Members. We will not rest until we have restored our national health service to where it belongs: at the top of the excellence league as well as the fairness league. There is a long way to go in investment, reform, effort, leadership and endeavour. There is also a long way to go in recognising that another core value of the national health service must be better promoted. Nye Bevan's vision was not simply that the people of this country should have equity of access to medical care free at the point of delivery, although it was that. It was also that people should have access to the best medical care.

That is why we have already started to match our investments with reforms, bringing new ideas and a better range of services to the British public, including new services such as the easily available walk-in centres that I mentioned and the fast-track treatment centres, many of which are inside the national health service. On some occasions, the independent sector treatment service is used and items are purchased in bulk at a reasonable price and delivered free at the point of need to everyone in this country. As to telephone advice, 6.3 million callers spoke to NHS Direct last year.

All this requires the national health service continually to refresh itself by introducing the latest and best innovations, based on the latest and best available research evidence. That is why we established the National Institute for Clinical Excellence to provide patients, health professionals and the public with the authoritative guidance that they need on current best practice and health technologies and clinical management of specific conditions. That is another advance that is recognised as among the best in the world—indeed, it is the best—and it is establishing clinical excellence throughout the national health service.

Rev. Martin Smyth (Belfast, South) (UUP): I welcome the improvements and changes that are taking place in the health service, particularly in dealing with those with hearing problems and in using the independent and private sector. Is the Secretary of State aware, however, that there is some concern about whether, after new hearing aids are provided and adapted, people go back to that sector or to the national health service? Is he prepared to deal with that situation, bearing in mind the fact that people get used to those who provide the service and want the follow-up to be convenient?

Dr. Reid: I thank the hon. Gentleman for his comments. By arranging a plurality of provision, we are giving a better degree of service and a choice. That is being introduced steadily. It is not the illusion of theoretical choice for everyone that is being offered by the Opposition, which depends on how much money one has in one's pocket.

The increased capacity that we are introducing will genuinely extend choice for patients in the NHS. As the hon. Gentleman says, some of that choice is provided by the independent sector, and I assure him that as the years go on we do not intend to limit and narrow the choice available to patients; rather, we intend to preserve that choice and, as far we can, extend information, power and choice for patients.

Mr. Burns: Does the Secretary of State remember his letter to the Health Committee on 5 February this year in which he stated that last year the national health service spent £100 million in the private sector, but that if the work had been done in the NHS it would have cost £70 million, which is a difference of £30 million? That means that the health service spent 43 per cent. more on private care in the private sector for NHS patients. Is the Secretary of State concerned, and what will he do to narrow the gap?

Dr. Reid: The hon. Gentleman is right in every particular. Because we bought operations from the private sector at spot prices, we paid extra premiums of 50 per cent., 60 per cent. and above. He is right to point out that that disturbed me, which is precisely why we no longer do it. Now, we buy in bulk the vast majority of operations that we purchase from the private sector. For example, the most recent purchase that I concluded was for 40,000 cataract operations at the quality and price that we wanted, which was, as it happens, 10 per cent. below the tariff for the national health service. That purchase bought us another 40,000 cataract operations delivered free at the point of need, which dramatically reduced waiting times in several parts of the country for old people waiting for free cataract operations.

Mr. Burns: The Secretary of State says that he thought that those premiums were wrong and that he has taken action. Does that mean that he is criticising the former Secretary of State for Health, the right hon. Member for Darlington (Mr. Milburn), who negotiated the deal?

Dr. Reid: Not at all. As it happens, the negotiations for the cataract operations that I mentioned began under my predecessor, my right hon. Friend the Member for Darlington (Mr. Milburn). I thank him, and commend him on his foresight in heading in that direction.

Our ambition for the national health service demands even greater foresight. All knowledge-based elements of the national health service need a constant supply of evidence from new research, especially in fast-moving fields such as medicine. We have always recognised that, and we began to deal with the most pressing needs in 2000, which is why we have invested in cancer research in particular.

We set up the National Cancer Research Institute, which is a partnership of the 19 largest funders of cancer research in the United Kingdom, including Government, the voluntary sector, industry and patients' representatives, and the national cancer research networks followed on from that. I have no hesitation in saying that the national cancer research networks have been a huge success with both patients and practitioners of medicine in this country.

Mr. Keith Bradley (Manchester, Withington) (Lab): My right hon. Friend is absolutely right that the cancer research network has been a huge success, and Christie hospital in my constituency is at the forefront of that progress. The Wolfson molecular imaging centre is a world-class clinical research centre located at Christie hospital, and it currently receives a small amount of money from central Government. In the light of the Chancellor's announcement of a significant increase in the science research budget, will my right hon. Friend re-examine the funding of the molecular imaging centre at Christie hospital to see whether more central Government money can be allocated to it?

Dr. Reid: I will not give my right hon. Friend a specific answer to that specific question, but in general terms he will not be displeased by the next 15 minutes of my speech. The national cancer research networks are a huge success, and he echoed that point. They have hit the target of doubling the number of patients engaged in trials in only two years. I make the simple point that, just as investment elsewhere saves lives and reduces pain, investment in cancer research saves, and has saved, lives for the national health service.

We recognise the potential of the new genetics to have an impact on health care. The whole field of genetics offers the possibility of much more personalised treatments and prevention strategies. Accordingly, we invested in six genetics knowledge parks—five in England and one in Wales—to develop for us knowledge of how advances in genetics will affect the national health service. In addition, we have just finished commissioning research work on gene therapy for single gene disorders and safety studies. Investment in research on genetics saves lives for the national health service and for the people of this country.

We are as ambitious for the British people as they are for themselves and their families. Since we know that this investment saves lives for the national health service and the country, the Government will now go further and faster in investing in clinical research. Our experience with the National Cancer Research Institute taught us that the real power to solve some of our outstanding health problems comes from the Government's investing in collaboration and in partnership. That is why my right hon. Friend the Chancellor announced last Thursday an increase in funding for medical research.

I can report today that I am making available an additional £25 million in each of the next four years, over and above the inflation-linked increases that have already been agreed, to secure the necessary development of our medical research here in this country. That is an additional £100 million per year by 2007–08, which represents the largest sustained increase in NHS research and development funding ever announced in this House. The hon. Member for South Suffolk (Mr. Yeo) is yawning. I hope that when he rises to his feet he will give a more substantial response to my announcement.

It is anticipated that that investment, together with the additional resources that are expected to be made available to the Medical Research Council, should allow combined Government spending on medical research to rise to £1.2 billion a year by 2007–08—investment in medical research to save lives in this country through and with the national health service.

Rev. Martin Smyth: In announcing that investment in the health service, the Secretary of State will recognise that the Northern Ireland Office has to allocate the funds. Does he agree that the new centre of excellence at the Belfast city hospital, which has international links, is making tremendous advances in research on cancer problems; and will he encourage the Chancellor to ensure that some of the extra money goes there?

Dr. Reid: I will go half way with the hon. Gentleman. Having have seen the prowess of those at that hospital and the developments that have taken place there, I agree that they are significant and worthy of great plaudits. I cannot allocate any of the money that is disbursed in Northern Ireland, since, alas, I moved on from being in a position to do so some two years ago, but I can assure him of two things: first, that under the Barnett formula there will be significant moneys for disbursement on health in Northern Ireland; and secondly, that the Under-Secretary of State for Northern Ireland, my hon. Friend the Member for Basildon (Angela Smith), will judiciously exercise her discretion over that disbursement. I hope that that is to the benefit of the institutions that he mentions.

Linda Gilroy: If the Secretary of State can accept the invitation to Plymouth that I extended to him, he will appreciate the way in which the new Peninsula medical school is helping us to train more doctors for the health service. However, it is one of eight new medical schools that are seriously exercised by the lack of research funding. Will he give his personal consideration to the new medical schools' need for some of the research funding?

Dr. Reid: I shall bear my hon. Friend's comments in mind. She would not expect me to make an instant allocation, although I am attracted by the prospect of a visit to her constituency.

I reiterate that investment in research saves lives. It is not simply a matter of retaining our place at the forefront of research and development in this country—although I am proud of that, too—but of saving the lives of our fellow citizens. The Government therefore wish to make Britain the best place in the world bar none for research, development and innovation. I want to ensure that the NHS contribution to medical research is one of the centrepieces of that ambition.

Alongside investment we shall also introduce reform. Accordingly, the Government have decided to create a new United Kingdom clinical research collaboration involving the NHS, patients, the Medical Research Council, the Wellcome Trust, the medical charities and industry. The purpose is to create a partnership to oversee the effective and efficient translation of scientific advances into patient care. I should like them to promote the following elements in particular: the development of a clinical research infrastructure embedded in the NHS; an expansion of United Kingdom clinical research, including clinical trials; an extensive and sustained increase in the research work force, and the development and spread of best practice for statutory regulations.

We already punch above our weight in health science. The United Kingdom, with 1 per cent. of the world's population, funds 4.5 per cent. of the world's science, produces 8 per cent. of the world's scientific publications and receives 9 per cent. of the citations. Fifteen of the world's top 75 medicines were discovered and developed in Britain. It is a tradition round which this country's reputation and renown have been wreathed with laurels for decades. The Government will ensure that that continues. We shall waste no time in doing that—the inaugural meeting takes place next month.

Mr. Lansley: I share the Secretary of State's appreciation of the quality of clinical research. Many of the organisations to which he referred expressed serious reservations about the proposed structure in the Human Tissue Bill. Will he assure hon. Members that when the Bill returns to the House for Report, he will have made substantive amendments to deal with the anxieties that the Medical Research Council, the Wellcome Trust and others expressed?

Mr. Reid: My hon. Friend the Minister of State has met representatives of those who expressed such anxieties. If she decides to make any changes, she will present them to the House. All hon. Members will have noticed the eager support of the hon. Member for South Cambridgeshire (Mr. Lansley) for the comments about our renown, reputation and investment in scientific research and development. We therefore await with bated breath the Opposition's response to our announcement of investing some £200 million extra in that research to ensure continuing quality in Britain.

Mr. Paul Burstow (Sutton and Cheam) (LD): In explaining the Government's approach on investment in medical research, will the Secretary of State also set out their plans to expand investment in research to preventive health care and public health? Although there is some investment, it is dramatically less than the amount that he has announced so far for medical research.

Dr. Reid: That is the subject of considerable and extensive consultation throughout the country. The appropriate time to comment on that is when we publish the White Paper on public health at the end of the consultation.

As I said, the inaugural meeting will be held next month, and this research will be developed in relation to a number of early priorities. Accordingly, we have been developing a United Kingdom strategy to deliver progress on drugs for use with children. This strategy will network paediatrics research centres and resources to fund the necessary clinical research. I have decided that that should go ahead as quickly as possible, not least because investment in research will save children's lives, which is important to all of us.

We have already made a start on mental health research by creating the first phase of a research network within the National Institute of Mental Health for England. I am now in a position to give extra resources to expand this network and make it more inclusive. That is critical, because up to now mental health research has not properly informed policy and practice, as too many studies have been too small and too local to permit valid general conclusions to be drawn. Investment in research will therefore help to relieve distress for the mentally ill.

The Department of Health has worked closely with a wide range of stakeholders to consider other diseases that involve vulnerable groups. I have mentioned particularly children and those suffering from mental illness, but I also want to mention other diseases that involve vulnerable groups or that have associated with them a high level of underlying health need and potential to bring rapid benefit to patients through research. Consequently, in addition to the research already outlined for children and the mentally ill, some of the additional resources for research will be put into three diseases which result in a disproportionate burden on our elderly population: Alzheimer's disease, stroke and diabetes. Investment in this research will also save lives and ease pain and distress.

We intend that these clinical research networks should use the extra investment to enable research to be conducted across the full spectrum of disease and clinical need. Research that saves the lives of the public costs investment.

Mr. Burstow: In relation to the Secretary of State's reference to strokes, why did it take the Department and the Committee on Safety of Medicines two years, from notification of the relevant authorities in Canada that prescribing anti-psychotic drugs to elderly people in care homes results in a threefold increase in strokes, to withdraw those drugs from being prescribed to older people in this country, thus causing many additional strokes in this country? [Interruption.]

Dr. Reid: No, I will hesitate to blame my predecessor—[Interruption.] No, it is because it is always more accurate and efficacious to blame the preceding Government than my predecessor. In this case, the hon. Gentleman has asked a serious question. If I understood it correctly, the information to which he referred was finally decided only relatively recently—in the past few weeks, I think—and brought to my notice. Within about seven days of its being brought to our notice, as a final conclusion of the relevant committee, we released that information into the public domain. I think that that is what he was addressing. If he was asking about another topic, I will certainly write to him. I assure him, however, that we acted as speedily as possible on receipt of that information, although I know that there was a dispute involving one expert in particular.

I was making the simple proposition that research saves the lives of the public, and research that saves the lives of the public means investment. It costs money. It cannot be done without the Government, who are committed to such research, providing the resources.

That investment is as much an integral part of the NHS as paying the wages of a front-line doctor or a front-line nurse. It provides those front-line staff with the tools with which to do their essential work. Investment in medical research, therefore, is an inherent, integral and vital part of the contribution that the national health service makes to the people of this country. I wait with interest to learn what commitments will be made by the Conservatives in terms of resources for this vital area.

In general, we have funded investment in the NHS during the past few years at an unprecedented level, over an unprecedented and sustained period, to produce an unprecedented increase in capacity which in itself improves the accessibility, quality and degree of power, information and choice for all beneficiaries of the NHS. Let us contrast that with the Conservatives' plans. Let us contrast our ambition and vision for this national health service of ours with a miserable lack of either vision or ambition. That was evident even before the Budget statement: we knew of their plans to divert some £2 billion of taxpayers' money away from the national health service, which benefits everyone, to passports for the few who are privileged and rich enough to buy half the private operations in the private sector. Now, in the face of the Government's belief in the NHS, their plans are even more exposed: we see them in their threadbare entirety.

We will invest in the front-line staff of the NHS. The hon. Member for Mid-Worcestershire (Mr. Luff) laughs. He would not laugh if, like me, he had to meet every week of the year people who have been waiting scandalous amounts of time for operations in the NHS because of 20 years of chronic underfunding by the Conservative party. It is no laughing matter when loved ones must wait in pain for cataract operations or hip replacements. We will take no sneering cynicism from the Conservatives when it comes to running down the health service.

We will invest in front-line staff, but we will also invest in the scientific and research base of the NHS. To us, science and research constitute a front-line service, as they, too, reduce distress and pain and save lives. Members should contrast the Conservatives' ambivalence with our commitment. We believe in the national health service, and just as we have always taken pride in its past, we have faith in its future. We back that confidence with commitment and with investment on behalf of the country. What a pity that the Conservative party cannot bring itself to provide either.

5.8 pm

Mr. Tim Yeo (South Suffolk) (Con): I begin by drawing attention to my entry in the Register of Members' Interests.

The Secretary of State spoke for 42 minutes. I think that Members in all parts of the House, as well as observers outside Parliament, will conclude that his having spent so little of that 42 minutes explaining what is going on in the NHS and what is happening to the nation's health suggests that he realises that the Government's record contains a great deal of which he should be ashamed.

This is a Budget debate, and I am sure that many Members will wish to range widely over all the issues raised in the Budget—including, in particular, the inevitable third-term tax rises that the British people will have to pay if Labour continues in power. I, however, will focus primarily on health.

Let me start with a statement of principle. Like all my colleagues in the shadow health team and like the Conservative party as a whole, I am utterly committed to the national health service and to its founding principle.

Dr. Reid: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Yeo: The Secretary of State had 42 minutes. I have had less than one minute.

We are utterly committed to that founding principle—that care should be available to patients on the basis of need, not on the basis of ability to pay. So there should be equal access for all, free at the point of delivery. That principle has been reiterated by my right hon. and learned Friend the Leader of the Opposition, by my right hon. Friend the Member for West Dorset (Mr. Letwin), the shadow Chancellor of the Exchequer, and by me on many occasions. It lies at the heart of all our health policies.

Dr. Reid: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Yeo: I will in a moment. The Secretary of State must contain himself. He had 42 minutes; when I have had a minute or two to develop this point, I will give way.

Every part of the Conservative party's health policy will reinforce that founding principle. Although the Chancellor of the Exchequer referred in his Budget speech to increases in spending on health, there was no change, either up or down, in the spending plans that he had already announced.

Following the speech by my right hon. Friend the Member for West Dorset last month, I can confirm that, in the first two years of the next Parliament, the newly elected Conservative Government will match the present Government's spending plans for the national health service. That means that we no longer need to waste time arguing about how much money will be spent because, regardless of the outcome of the election, spending on the national health service will increase by broadly the same amount. Instead, we can get on to the more crucial subject of how that money is spent. For the avoidance of doubt, let me make it clear that the aim of extra spending under the Conservative Government will be to benefit national health service users, including patients who are on national health service waiting lists. I can announce that it will not be the policy of the next Conservative Government to offer tax relief to people who take out private medical insurance.

Dr. Reid: Since the hon. Gentleman is so committed to equality of access being granted through public money, will he confirm today that someone who does not have the £9,000 to pay towards a private sector heart bypass operation will nevertheless have equal access to that private sector heart bypass operation, costing £18,000, compared with someone who does have £9,000 in their bank account? Does the hon. Gentleman understand that? I am explaining to him the terms of his own policy—the patients passport. Will he confirm that someone who cannot afford to pay £9,000 to meet half the cost of a heart bypass operation performed in the private sector will nevertheless be entitled, the same as everyone else, to that heart operation in the private sector?

Mr. Yeo: My understanding is that that is exactly what the Secretary of State proposes. If people have been waiting long enough, they will be allowed access to the independent sector. [Interruption.] Is he not allowing that?

Dr. Reid: The Secretary of State—i.e. me—is proposing that anyone who has an operation in the private sector will pay nothing towards it. Therefore, everyone, irrespective of how much money they have, will enjoy equal access to treatment. According to the patients passport, a person has to meet half the cost of a private operation in order for the NHS to pay the other half, so can the hon. Gentleman explain how anyone who does not have that money could possibly have equal access compared with those people who have, say, £9,000 for a heart bypass?

Mr. Yeo: I am interested in the Secretary of State's clarification of the Government's policy. He appears to be proposing that, even if people are willing to pay £9,000 towards the cost, he will pay the whole £18,000. No wonder the Government are in such a spending mess. If they intend to turn down contributions from people who may be willing to pay, their policy will involve an enormous amount of extravagance.

Dr. Reid rose—

Mr. Yeo: If the Secretary of State would like to wait, let me provide the clarification of the patients passport policy that he may be seeking. It is designed to give patients and their doctors more control over how and where people are treated and it will help to reduce waiting times by enabling all patients to have access to the entire national health service, not just to their local hospital or the hospital to which their doctor says they must go. For the first time, and under a Conservative Government, the national health service will become a truly national service. All aspects of NHS provision will be available to every patient.

Like the Government, the Conservative party believes that the private sector has a contribution to make in reducing waiting times. Indeed, I read in The Times this morning that the Government seem to think that the private sector has a rather big contribution to make in reducing waiting times—no matter at what cost. We may be a bit more careful about that. The patients passport will therefore also enable NHS patients to gain access to the private sector, to all those independent providers of treatment to whom they have been previously denied access. That treatment will become available to them under the patients passport, and the precise basis on which that access will be granted is a matter on which we are now consulting.

Dr. Reid: The hon. Gentleman is taking advice. You can take advice from anyone you like, Mr. Deputy Speaker, but you cannot square a circle.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Michael Lord): Order. First, the Secretary of State must use the correct parliamentary language, and I suggest that interventions should be a little briefer.

Dr. Reid: I want to ask the same question that the hon. Gentleman did not answer the last time that I intervened. Will he confirm that, even with the public subsidy of half the price of an operation in the private sector, someone who cannot afford the other half will not be entitled to have that operation in that sector? In other words, there will be no equity of access in the NHS for those without the money.

Mr. Yeo: Just because the Secretary of State did not like my previous answer does not mean that I will try to give him a fresh one. I have explained exactly what our policy aims to do, what it will achieve and the basis on which it will be available to all NHS patients. I am confident that the public will see the merits of our policy, just as some people have already seen the merits of the announcement that was made a few weeks ago about extending the availability of the patients passport to 17 million patients who suffer from chronic conditions—something that the Government have overlooked and neglected. Shortly after we made it clear that the scope of the patients passport would be extended in that way, I found that it received strong third-party endorsements.

Mr. Burstow: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Yeo: I must make a little progress; I will give way in a moment.

Let us consider some of the ways in which progress has been made in improving both the nation's health and the NHS itself. No one welcomes those improvements more than I do. It is excellent news that progress has indeed been made in some respects, and I warmly congratulate all those staff whose hard work has contributed to those achievements—the doctors and nurses, all the other health professionals, the back-up staff and, of course, the managers, too. For example, let me join in welcoming the news, announced by Cancer Research UK, of a significant drop in UK cancer deaths. That progress has been made over the past generation and reflects the work not only of the health staff, to whom I have paid tribute, but of the researchers, cancer charities and fund raisers.

We are also thankful for the reduction in death rates from coronary heart disease, which must largely be attributed to advances in medicine and technology. The Secretary of State referred to the increased use of statins, which have played an important part in helping to manage the disease, and stents have substantially reduced the requirement for coronary heart bypass surgery. Progress has also been made in providing cataract surgery for those who need it and the waiting times for that surgery are finally showing signs of improvement.

I am glad that the Government have recognised the part that treatment centres can play in achieving such goals, but while we join in celebrating those good things—of course, there are others that I do not have time to mention—there is another side to the picture, about which the Secretary of State is more reluctant to speak. The fact that he was at such pains to misinterpret Conservative policy will not prevent me from telling the truth about Labour policy.

Mr. Alan Milburn (Darlington) (Lab): On Conservative policy, the hon. Gentleman is responsible for education policy, as well as health policy, for the Conservative Front-Bench team. Can he explain why it would be permissible, under his patients passport policy, to allow a privately paid top-up for patients to go privately in health, when he would stop that happening under his pupils passport?

Mr. Yeo: The right hon. Gentleman tempts me greatly. I noticed the dismay among Labour Members last Thursday, when my hon. Friend the Member for Westmorland and Lonsdale (Mr. Collins) explained in detail the basis of our pupils passport. Indeed, as the right hon. Gentleman says, we have made it clear what the scope of that passport will be. I have made it clear this afternoon that we are consulting on the detail of how the patients passport will be usable in the independent sector. The dismay that the Secretary of State for Education and Skills showed last Thursday may provide us with some pointers about what the Government are afraid might happen as far as the patients passport is concerned.

Mr. Milburn: Will the hon. Gentleman explain whether consultation is another word for confusion?

Mr. Yeo: In the Government's mind, I am sure that it very frequently is.

Let us look at the facts. Despite an increase in spending of 38 per cent. since 1999, activity levels in hospitals have risen by less than 5 per cent. We have to consider whether the outcomes that are achieved represent real value for money from the point of view of both patients and taxpayers given the huge rise in spending on the NHS that has taken place. The think-tank, Reform, pointed out in January that the increases in both hospital admissions and out-patient appointments have been slower since 1999 than they were in the previous decade. Despite this 38 per cent. increase in spending, the number of GPs has risen by only 4 per cent. over the period and the number of midwives by only 3 per cent. Where is all the money going? It is going to meet the targets that Ministers keep setting to satisfy the control-freak instincts of new Labour. Managers have had to be hired at almost double the rate of nurses.

A chunk of the money went on the Modernisation Agency, a typical new Labour invention that was described by the Health Service Journal as the flagship of the Government's health care reforms. The body was formed just three years ago for the purpose of—I quote from the latest departmental report—

"supporting the NHS and its partner organisations in the task of modernising services and improving experiences and outcomes for patients."

The same report told us as recently as last July that the agency's focus this year would be

"to maintain its innovation and to make modernisation move into the mainstream of the NHS."

Earlier this month, however, we learned that the agency now faces the axe. I wonder just what it has been doing. Was it the Modernisation Agency that decided that student nurses should, as part of their training, have to spend time drawing pictures of how they imagined themselves as pensioners, writing advertisements for themselves as friends, describing how their enemies might view them and looking at the psychology of peasants in Russia? Was it the agency that concluded that outcomes for patients would improve if a student nurse nearing the end of her second year of training had done all the things I have just mentioned but had not been taught how to put up a drip, insert a catheter or administer or take blood? Does modernising the NHS mean that student nurses need only a one-and-a-half-hour group lesson on injections before being let loose on the ward?

The Minister of State, Department of Health (Mr. John Hutton): These issues have nothing to do with the Modernisation Agency.

Mr. Yeo: The Minister suggests that this has nothing to do with the health service, but I hope his Department will not claim that it is not aware of those facts. They were all set out in a letter sent to the Secretary of State by a student nurse in London last month, a copy of which was sent to me.

Mr. Stephen McCabe (Birmingham, Hall Green) (Lab): Given the hon. Gentleman's analysis, can he tell the House, based on his calculations, how much he estimates he could safely remove from the NHS budget without doing any damage to current levels of patient treatment or care?

Mr. Yeo: I am sorry that the hon. Gentleman has clearly not been listening to what I have said. The next Conservative Government will, in the first two years of the next Parliament, match the spending plans left behind by the Labour Government. I am confident that, in that period, we will identify further significant savings because of the extravagance and waste that the policies of the present Government have resulted in. We may then be able to discuss how to use those savings, some, most or perhaps all of which will be available for improved patient care.

To return to the Modernisation Agency, we cannot be sure how much taxpayers' money was spent on this very short-lived exercise, but I have seen a press release that suggests that the figure was well over £500 million. That sounds like an expensive three-year experiment. The Modernisation Agency, however, was a positive veteran when it got the chop compared with the National Care Standards Commission. That body had been going for only 18 days before it was told that it was going to be abolished. With an approach as chaotic as that, it is no wonder that patients despair of seeing the money that they are paying as taxpayers actually reaching the front line.

It is not only the way that incompetent Ministers waste money second-guessing managers and chasing headlines that is the problem. In too many areas, we are simply not making enough progress. Derek Wanless, the man chosen by the Chancellor to report on the state of the nation's health, pointed out some of the harsh realities that Ministers prefer to sweep under the carpet. Death rates in England from respiratory diseases are worse than those in France, Sweden, Denmark, Canada, Australia, Finland, Germany and Holland, which are all countries with similar population structures, health care systems and per capita wealth to those of England. Britain also has the worst infant mortality rate among those countries and the second highest death rate from cancer in women. Incidentally, for 34,000 sufferers from ovarian cancer, the mean waiting time is almost 50 per cent. longer than in 1999.

Deaths from MRSA—the hospital superbug—have more than doubled since 1997. Less than a month ago, the chief medical officer called that "shocking and unacceptable". That is a reflection of the fact that after seven years of a Labour Government, Britain has one of the worst rates of hospital-acquired infections in the western world. People are more likely to catch an infection in a hospital in Britain than in a hospital in France, Germany, Holland, Belgium, Spain, Italy, Sweden, Austria, Denmark or Ireland, as 100,000 people every year find out to their cost. Was that what the Prime Minister had in mind when he told voters seven years ago that there were 24 hours left to save the national health service? Labour promised that the money that it spent would allow it to get the basics right. Its inspection teams have given hospitals the all clear on cleanliness, but as today's edition of The Sun informs us, the truth is a very different story indeed.

Let us take tuberculosis. According to data released this month by the Health Protection Agency, TB in England and Wales has increased by a fifth since 1999. The chief medical officer points out that the rate of TB notifications in the London borough of Newham is worse that those of India and Romania. What has happened to the TB action plan, which we were promised would be in place early last year?

It is not only health outcomes that are worrying. In the last full year, the number of cancelled operations was significantly higher than in 1997. The latest quarterly figures show scarcely any improvement in the current year. Cancelled operations can be the result of a shortage of available beds, and there are 20,000 fewer beds now than there were in 1997. With more than 70,000 care home places lost since 1996, many because of Labour's obsession with over-regulation, it is no wonder that people are now queuing to get out of hospital as well as to get in.

Ministers like to tell us about the fall in the number of patients who have been waiting very long periods to go into hospital, but only last month, the chief executive of the national health service confirmed that average waiting times have actually increased. At the present rate of progress, it will take more than 60 years to clear the waiting lists.

Out in the community, things are not much better. The number of people receiving domiciliary care has fallen by almost 100,000 since 1997, which is a drop of more than one fifth. The number of health visitors is lower than it was under the Conservatives. The number of district nurses is also lower, and the number of people receiving community mental health care has fallen by almost 8 per cent. since 1997.

[Mr. Yeo]

Even when the Prime Minister himself makes a promise, the situation is no better. At Labour's 1999 party conference, he promised that everyone would have the "chance to see their dentist".

Eight months later, the NHS plan said that the Government were "firmly committed to making high quality NHS dentistry available to all who want it by September 2001".

However, like so many of the Prime Minister's promises, that one, too, has been broken. The proportion of English adults registered with an NHS dentist has fallen substantially while Labour has been in power.

Whenever Conservatives start to tell the truth about what is happening to the health of the nation, Ministers accuse us of talking down the NHS, but nothing could be further from the truth. We have the highest admiration for the dedication and professionalism of the thousands of people who work in the national health service, and I know that my views are shared by millions of patients. However, we all know that despite all their hard work and the fact that some progress has been made, the NHS could, and should, be better. Today, after seven years of the Labour Government and vast increases in spending, people whose hopes were raised so high are clearly and understandably disappointed. As an ICM poll showed last September, more than half of those surveyed thought that the NHS had got worse since 1997 and less than a third thought that it had got better.

The biggest obstacle to the further progress for which we all yearn is the attitude of the Secretary of State and his ministerial colleagues. [Interruption.] His meddling ways prevent front-line staff from getting on with the jobs that they have been trained to do. His insistence on targets frequently distorts clinical judgments and often has perverse consequences, like the waiting time target for new out-patient appointments at the Bristol eye hospital, which led to other follow-up appointments being delayed or cancelled, with the result that 25 people went blind. It is no wonder that morale among professionals is so low and frustration is so high. Last month, 500 doctors paid for an advertisement in which they said:

"We once believed the NHS was the finest healthcare system in the world. Today few healthcare professionals would make that claim."

The Secretary of State would like us to believe that he and the rest of the Government are about to mend their ways. [Interruption.] He promises that Ministers will set fewer targets, but in a supplement to the Red Book published last week, a report from the Cabinet Office highlighted—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. Treasury Front-Bench spokesmen must not keep intervening from a sedentary position. Although a certain amount of latitude is allowed, today we are debating not Opposition policies, but the Budget.

Mr. Yeo: I am afraid the fact is that Government Front-Bench spokesmen do not like to hear the facts about how they run the health service and the damage that they cause to the health of the British people.

The report from the Cabinet Office highlighted that "many organisations do face excessive externally set targets, measures and compliance requirements".

It continued:

"the Department of Health has only 12"

public service agreement

"targets across the NHS and Social Care. Front line trusts and PCTs however face more than 4 times as many PSA-related controls . . . with a further 125 non-PSA related controls".

So although the Department of Health claims to have only 12 key targets, the overall number of targets with which those on the front line have to comply is 17 times greater.

The Secretary of State promises that bureaucracy will be reduced and that staff numbers at his Department will be cut. He promises that patients will be given more choice. Those promises, however, are at odds with the Government's instinct for control freakery. Ministers may talk a good game, but the row over foundation hospitals showed just how reluctant the Labour party actually is to allow any genuine freedom to the providers of health care. We are now asked to believe that the very Ministers who presided over a rampant growth in bureaucracy are the best people to tackle the problems that they created. We are asked to believe that the same Ministers who have been obsessed with setting targets, through which they have tried to control every detail of the delivery of health care, will now allow clinicians and managers freedom to do their jobs.

As for patient choice, the improvements that the Government have promised will be available only to patients on a limited scale and after they have endured long waiting times. The danger is that if the Government's preoccupation with acute and emergency care continues, the needs of the 17 million people with long-term medical conditions will again be neglected. Earlier this month, the Secretary of State suddenly woke up to the fact that most of his targets have overlooked the suffering of those people and their families, but it will take more than a speech about "integrating the care landscape" to tackle the problem. That is why my colleagues and I have opened a dialogue with the Long Term Medical Conditions Alliance.

Mental health is another neglected area. More than 18 months after the end of the Government's consultation on the draft mental health Bill, we still await publication of the responses. Meanwhile, services continue to suffer. The NHS plan promised to introduce 335 crisis resolution teams by 2004, but fewer than half are in place. Some 50 early intervention teams were promised to reduce the period of untreated psychosis in young people and to help to improve long-term outcomes. Only 27 have been established.

Public health is another subject of deep and growing concern. I mentioned the rise in TB. Obesity is another problem that is growing worse under this Government. Last month's report from the Royal College of Physicians, the Royal College of Paediatrics and Child Health and the Faculty of Public Health contained a clear warning about where present trends are leading. The British Diabetic Association issued a similar warning.

The Government's response to these worsening trends is chaotic. Faced with growing concern over obesity, Downing street floated the idea of subsidised gym club membership and a tax on fatty foods. Those wheezes succeeded in getting a headline but little else, and perhaps that is all that was intended. The ideas were soon rubbished by the Treasury's public health guru, Derek Wanless, but, having called for a report on public health, the Chancellor made no mention of that in his Budget. Meanwhile, the Department for Culture, Media and Sport has at last discovered that sport in schools is a good idea after all. As for the Secretary of State for Health, he is so confused that the only thing he can think of is to ask the public for their view—another big conversation when what the public need are answers. Who is supposed to be in charge? These issues are far too important to be dealt with in this muddled way. A co-ordinated approach right across Government is needed, and the Secretary of State should take responsibility, but taking responsibility is something that Ministers in this Government are extremely reluctant to do.

Last week, the Chancellor was so busy patting himself on the back, he did not mention that each time he makes a statement to the House the amount of money that he has to borrow to pay for his spendthrift ways increases. He has presided over the biggest trade deficit since records started over 300 years ago, a halving of the rate of productivity growth compared with the last Conservative Government, the destruction of hundreds of thousands of jobs in manufacturing and a collapse in the savings ratio, and he has ruined the expectations of thousands of members of occupational pension schemes. One would search his Budget speech in vain for any reference to those important facts, just as one would search in vain for any admission of the inevitability of tax rises in the next Parliament if Labour wins another term.

I have given credit where it is due, especially to the dedicated and hard-working staff in the NHS. I have acknowledged that progress is being made in some respects, but to make real improvements to the nation's health a different approach is needed. With the founding principle of the NHS as our starting point we will make far-reaching and radical changes to the way that health care is delivered: by giving patients more control and freedom within the system; by giving genuine independence to health care providers; by having a much clearer focus on public health, the one aspect of health policy which should be delivered from the centre; and by launching a vigorous attack on waste at every level. It will not be enough merely to give patients more say in how and where they are treated. We must give more freedom to the providers, too. We want to give professionals, doctors, nurses and others working in health, including managers, freedom to do the jobs that they have been trained to do.

We will abolish the star ratings and most of the Whitehall-set targets through which Ministers have constantly meddled with the NHS, often to the detriment of patients' interests. At the next general election the country will have a clear choice when it comes to health: either continue with Labour's wasteful ways, in which standards in Britain lag behind other countries, an over-centralised system demoralises staff, and patients are denied control because Ministers think that Whitehall knows best, in a system where the state is too large and patients are too small. Or follow the new Conservative path, which will transform the way that health care is delivered, ensure that taxpayers' money reaches the front line, put patients in control and let doctors and nurses do their job. That is the choice that we will offer the people of Britain.

After seven years of tax, waste and spin, the public cannot see where all their money has gone. They know that the Government have not delivered on health, the Labour party knows that the Government have not delivered on health and the Secretary of State knows that the Government have not delivered on health. We relish the opportunity to offer the people of Britain the first-class health care that they have paid for and deserve.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. Before I call the next speaker, I remind the House that there is a 15-minute limit on Back-Bench speeches, and that applies from now.

5.39 pm

Mr. Alan Milburn (Darlington) (Lab): It is a privilege to speak after my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Health, and I welcome his extremely important announcements. Would that I could say the same about the hon. Member for South Suffolk (Mr. Yeo), whose speech almost made me long for the return to the Dispatch Box of the hon. Member for Woodspring (Dr. Fox). I suspect that the reason for concern on the part of Opposition Members, which was perhaps reflected in the hon. Gentleman's speech, is that last week's Budget was one of not only considerable economic acumen but considerable political acumen. Few right hon. and hon. Members who listened to my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer could have doubted that they were hearing the starting pistol being fired for what promises to be an extremely long and interesting general election campaign.

Mr. Peter Luff (Mid-Worcestershire) (Con): On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I think that the right hon. Gentleman will be grateful to me for raising this matter. There is a considerable problem with the sound system in the Chamber today, and I think that I have guessed correctly that the Hansard writers are having some difficulty hearing him. Can you do anything about that?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I think that we shall simply have to carry on and use our voices as they did in days of old.

Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Milburn: I shall shout at the Opposition—I have done a bit of that in my time.

The Opposition's locker, which looked reasonably full only a few weeks ago when the shadow Chancellor published the Conservatives' spending plans, looked decidedly empty once the Chancellor had delivered his Budget. I have to say that it never struck me as credible that the Conservative party, purportedly committed to strong defence and law and order, could go into a general election campaign promising cuts at the Ministry of Defence and the Home Office. The truth is that the Budget has made its position even more painful, because the choice that it faces is whether to enter that campaign promising to take extra resources out of education to pay for tax cuts. The Budget has made the choice for the electorate even more stark: cuts in taxes, or investment in services. It was James I of England who was famously described by Henry IV of France as "the wisest fool in Christendom."

The shadow Chancellor may well have laid claim to that epithet now.

Sixteen years ago almost to the day—in fact, I think the anniversary was yesterday—Lord Lawson, then Chancellor, hailed in this House what he called an "economic miracle". As we now know, his words were to turn to ashes in his mouth within a few short years, as economic mismanagement led inexorably to economic recession. When Lord Lawson spoke, the economy was doing reasonably well, but almost 2.5 million people were none the less unemployed and the inflation rate was just shy of 5 per cent. Today, by comparison, unemployment and inflation are roughly half that. I am not especially religiously inclined, so I do not say that what has been achieved in recent years is miraculous, but it is pretty remarkable. In the midst of a worldwide economic downturn, the British economy has continued to grow year after year, quarter after quarter. Even the most jaundiced economic commentators have been forced to concede that the fundamentals—inflation, interest rates, debt and jobs—are sound. I say that because there is sometimes a temptation to take all the progress for granted, as though it were purely natural. As even a cursory glance at the plight of some of our competitor nations, or at our recent economic history, shows, that is not so: Britain is in a good position because of good economic management.

We cannot hope to compete on pay or prices with the likes of China or Taiwan. Our future is not at the low-tech, low-skills end of the world market; it lies in high-skill, high-tech services and industries. That is why I applaud the Government's decision to invest further resources in education, just as they have in health. The investment being made in public services is not simply about creating more opportunity for better health and better education, important though they are. Nor is a social dividend all we will reap from that investment, as better-educated citizens lead healthier lives. There will be an economic dividend as well. In the short term, it will come from the stimulus that spending provides to the economy. Oxford Economic Forecasting Ltd. estimates that current spending will boost GDP growth by at least 0.8 per cent. this year and, indeed, next year. It is sound long-term economics for low-debt countries such as our own to be able to borrow so as to invest for the longer term. Providing that our expenditure plans are affordable, which I believe them to be, then public spending—far from being always a burden as too many assume, including, tragically, the Conservative party—can be a benefit. The long-term benefits are even more significant.

The primary rationale for investing more in health is to relieve pain and extend life. There are also important economic spin-offs. Many historians have noted that perhaps one third of per capita growth over the past two centuries in this country resulted from improvements in nutrition and health status. In a modern, knowledge-based economy, there is an even bigger premium on good health. When the Institute of Directors, not normally known for its political radicalism, still less for its adherence to Keynesianism, says that sickness is a hidden tax on business, undermining competitiveness and reducing productivity, it really is time to take note. The number of long-term sick and disabled people wanting a job but not presently looking for one has more than doubled in the past decade. In an economy that is moving towards full employment and already reporting labour shortages, such morbidity levels pose a real threat to future growth.

That is why my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Health is right to insist on improvements in NHS responsiveness to reduce waiting times for treatment. That will deliver not only a health benefit, but an economic benefit. It is one of the reasons why I also welcome my right hon. Friend's renewed focus on public health and prevention. In time, too, it will make a positive contribution to the UK's longer-term performance.

If health investment performs an economic function, the same argument can be advanced in spades for education investment. In the United States, it is widely accepted that every dollar invested in early years provision brings a sevenfold payback in lower crime, higher educational attainment and, most importantly, better jobs. Our Government have much to be proud of in that regard, providing extra nursery places and Sure Start projects in constituencies such as mine.

The Budget promised yet more child care centres. That, too, is welcome. However, in a country in which rising economic prosperity means that there are more two-income earners and more families struggling to balance their working lives and family lives—I speak with some experience about that—child care cannot just be centred on institutions. It must be centred on parents' needs. Above all else, working parents say that they need child care that is affordable and flexible. That is why I hope that the Government will go further than the Budget by ensuring that parents have a choice in how they receive help with child care.

For some, that care might be in a nursery or a child care centre. For others, it might be in the home. The point is that a one-size-fits-all approach will not work. Nowadays, people need flexible, personalised services. It is vital that choice is widely extended, not only in respect of child care, but for the wider public services. In that way, we shall get services that are not just more responsive but more fair. When we extend choice in the NHS, as my right hon. Friend is rightly doing, so that it becomes accessible to those without the ability to pay for treatment, as well as to those with that ability, and when we ensure, as I hope we will, greater parental choice over schools for those without wealth as well as for those who have it, we will be redistributing opportunity in our society. Today, people who can afford it buy choice in health and education. Those without do without. That is unfair, and it must be a Government priority to change that.

I suggest one further area where this modern form of redistribution should be taken forward, and that is housing. The promise of more resources in the Budget, alongside the Barker review of housing supply, is welcome and long overdue. Quite simply, our country is short of houses. The result, as Kate Barker rightly points out, is a negative impact on labour mobility. In a modern global economy, such inflexibilities exact a high price, but my principal concern is more social than economic. Over the past four decades, social mobility in our country has slowed markedly. The generation of children born, like me, in 1958, were far less dependent on the economic status of their parents for their eventual economic progress than those born just 12 years later in 1970. Birth, not worth, has become more and more a key determinant of life chances, and sadly, changes in the housing market are opening an ever larger gulf between those with assets and those without.

Rising house prices are making home ownership more unaffordable for more people. Not surprisingly, the number of first-time buyers entering the market has declined. In the longer term, rising house prices threaten to impede social mobility across generations. While the value of housing assets has increased markedly, the number of people with no assets at all has more than doubled in the past 20 years. The principal inequality in our society today is no longer about income but about ownership of assets, whether a pension or a home. In London today, the child of a home owner stands to inherit an average of £230,000 when the parents die, but a classmate whose family rents will inherit nothing. In other words, the housing market is widening inequality.

It must therefore be the Government's explicit objective and priority to increase home ownership. I agree that more social housing is needed, but I do not agree with the orthodoxy that the only future for those without a home lies in social housing. When interest rates are low, it is often cheaper to buy than to rent. Moreover, given a choice, most people prefer to buy rather than rent. Welcome as the Barker report is, we need to do more than simply build more homes; we need to open up more opportunities for people to own their own homes. Helping people on to the housing ladder will not only address issues of labour mobility and economic flexibility, but be a route to greater social justice and fairness in our country. It is a modern means of redistributing wealth in our society. The job of a progressive Government is not just to beat poverty but to help people realise their aspirations so that we are capable of levelling up in society, not levelling down.

New Labour won in 1997 and 2001 as a party of aspiration. Future victories depend on our pursuing policies that promote aspiration and enhance choice. That requires investment, of course, but also reform, whether in health, education or housing. Good foundations have been laid, and the Budget builds on those foundations. Its proposals for extra resources are welcome, as investment, not tax cuts, can best secure the long-term prosperity of our country. A flexible economy and a fluid society, however, cannot be bought simply by increasing resources. With investment rising, it is time to put our foot firmly on the accelerator, not on the brake, for reform as well, and I hope that my right hon. and hon. Friends will do so.

5.53 pm

Mr. Paul Burstow (Sutton and Cheam) (LD): I should like to start by making some comments about the NHS, and then address other issues in the Budget, particularly preventive health.

Liberal Democrats support investment in the national health service. At the last general election, we had the courage and conviction to argue the case for increased taxation. We are delighted that that argument has been won—during this Parliament, the necessary resources have finally been provided and we voted for the increase in national insurance that was approved by the House about a year ago. We wish to place on record our appreciation for the dedication and hard work of NHS staff, both on the front line and in the back office. It is important to stress the commitment of both groups and to register our appreciation, not least because the recent survey by the Commission for Health Improvement found that one in six front-line health care staff are victims of abuse and violence when performing their job of caring, nurturing, supporting and trying to help sick people get better. It is entirely unacceptable that staff should be thrown into that battlefield when they already have more than enough stress and worry in the discharge of their duties.

There was a disappointing if predictable reaction to last week's work force survey, particularly the findings about the increase in the number of managers. Some people have a fixation about what those figures mean, how they are interpreted and what they show, but it is worth bearing it in mind that between 1997–98 and 2002–03, the management costs of the NHS fell from 5 to 3.9 per cent. I do not buy the argument that the NHS has too many managers, and nor do I buy the statistics that are often peddled to justify that argument, because they require a stripping-out of various staff who provide back-up support for front-line staff. However, NHS managers who are trying to do their job have their hands tied by red tape supplied by Whitehall and by the excessive number of targets that determine what goes on at local level to enable people to have choices about initiatives. That undoubtedly stifles the opportunity for innovation in the NHS at local level. It is only by freeing NHS managers and staff from the target and tick-box culture that still drives too much of the NHS from Whitehall that we can hope to get the full value of the investment that is going in. The Commission for Health Improvement commented on that only last week.

Dr. John Reid: May I place on record my gratitude to the hon. Gentleman for giving the lie to the constantly peddled myth that the NHS is over-managed? Does he accept that the percentage of managers in the NHS is, at under 3 per cent., far lower than in the private health care sector or the private sector? Since 1997, 224,000 more staff have been recruited, of whom 13,000 or 5 per cent. are managers. I wish to underline the distinction that he made between the task that managers face and the myth often peddled by the Conservatives, which is merely another way to beat the NHS. Their figures for managers are manufactured and are frankly not true.

Mr. Burstow: I am grateful to the Secretary of State. While I have many disagreements with him about priorities and approach, he is right on that point. It is important to put on record the facts about management, because a myth is being spread about the inappropriate deployment of money, which, it is said, is not reaching the front line. There are, however, some examples of money not reaching the front line, which I shall deal with in a minute.

I mentioned the work force survey, and it is worth looking at one or two of its findings. Last week, there was some premature back-slapping about the progress that has been made. Undoubtedly, additional nurses and doctors have come into the national health service, which is welcome, but there are still grounds for serious concern, not least because of the demographic profile of the nurse population in this country. One in four nurses will be eligible for retirement in the next five years, and recruiting more nurses to replace such large numbers will be a hell of a challenge. Our health care system is increasingly dependent on the recruitment of nurses from overseas. I shall not address the ethics of that now, although there are still concerns about overseas recruitment. We are, however, competing for health care staff in a global market where other players are probably better equipped than we are to compete for our precious health care staff. The United States of America currently has a shortfall of 1 million nurses, and is trying to get UK nurses to work there. Plenty of other countries are likely to do the same thing. Health care recruitment is a global problem, and I do not yet see any international action being taken to ensure that we have an adequate supply to meet the needs of developed countries and to secure the long-term needs of developing countries.

I shall focus on some of the other figures that emerged from the work force survey. For example, the number of midwives continues to be a cause for concern. The continuing shortage is hitting three quarters of maternity units, where vacancy rates have remained stubbornly high or have been rising since 1999. Given the importance of strengthening primary care, it is particularly worrying that the survey recorded a drop in the number of health visitors and district nurses. A report this month from the Commission for Healthcare Audit and Inspection draws our attention to the continuing crisis in the development and delivery of primary care, and the fact that staff shortages are leading to GPs closing lists, low staff morale and high workloads. All those factors jeopardise and slow down the development, expansion and improvement of primary care.

Although we celebrate the investment going into health care, it is worth putting on record the fact that there are a number of areas where taxpayers have every right to question whether they are getting value for money. The first such area is NHS spending on temporary doctors and nurses. Every day, £4 million is spent on agency staffing in the NHS. Last year, £1.4 billion was spent in the NHS in that way. Of course it is sensible to spend on agency staff as part of a strategy that makes the best use of permanent staff, but as the Audit Commission revealed only a couple of years ago, too many NHS trusts have lost control of their agency budgets, have no idea how much they are spending, and have no sense of direction and strategic purpose behind that expenditure. Consequently, they are fighting fires, never getting the budget under control. Year after year under this Government, expenditure on agency staff continues to rise.

There are other areas where there is cause for concern about whether the taxpayer is receiving value for money. The figures for MRSA infections were reported yesterday and today. A few years ago, the National Audit Office reported that hospital-acquired infections were costing £1 billion. At least 100,000 people suffer from such infections, and possibly as many as 5,000 die every year—the Conservative health spokesman referred to those figures. It is fair to say that under the last Conservative Government, there was still a voluntary surveillance system that did not adequately convey to the NHS or anyone else the scale of the problem. It is only in the past few years that we have had a mandatory reporting system, which has provided a true picture of the scale of the problem: it is massive.

The result of the failure to get to grips with the problem of infections over the past decade or more is that people stay in hospital for longer. That has knock-on effects: operations are cancelled because people who have got sicker while in hospital occupy beds. According to figures from the Department of Health, 17,000 patients had operations cancelled this winter. The number of operations cancelled has increased by 43 per cent. since 1997, so capacity is being wasted. It is not just a question of investing in more capacity; we must make sure that we use practices that avoid the wastage of existing capacity. Poor hygiene practice and under-resourced infection control teams make it difficult to overcome the problem.

I shall give a final example of an area where there is waste and room for much improvement, and which is costing the NHS a fortune. Every day, the NHS spends £2 million on treating the consequences of bed sores, which are eminently preventable in about nine out of 10 cases. The annual cost is £750 million and the vast majority of those cases could be prevented by simple practices and good nursing.

We heard an exchange between the Secretary of State and his Conservative opposite number, the hon. Member for South Suffolk (Mr. Yeo), about the Conservatives' plans for a patients passport. I regret that, despite the Secretary of State's best endeavours, we were unable to get any further clarification of what the policy means and, crucially, how the deadweight cost of the policy will be funded. Some 300,000 people already choose to have operations and other procedures in the private sector. They will be the first people banging on the door of a putative Conservative Secretary of State and saying, "Where are my patient passport pounds? I want them now."

The scheme would cost £1 billion, on a reasonable estimate. I understand that when the shadow Chancellor made his presentation, he was asked how it would be paid for. He said that the Conservatives did not yet know how much it would cost or how they would pay for it. I certainly hope that the consultation that the hon. Member for South Suffolk outlined will spell out in detail how they will fund that deadweight cost. A billion pounds will be passported out of the NHS, and not a single extra operation will be performed as a consequence. In their quest for savings, the Conservatives should identify that as a waste of money, as should the Secretary of State.

Dr. Reid: Is the hon. Gentleman telling us that the Conservatives do not know how much the scheme will cost, do not know where the money will come from, do not know whom it will go to and think that it is compatible with equity and equal access, even though it depends on how much money people have?

Mr. Burstow: I had hoped the right hon. Gentleman would direct that question to his Conservative opposite number. Unfortunately, he did not take the opportunity proffered to him. I would not presume to comment further on Conservative policy, except to say that I look forward to the outcome of the consultation and the publication of the details. Since the policy was published 12 months ago or more, we have been told, "The details are coming. The details are there. Look on the website. Look for the background papers. It's already out there." It is not out there. It is a bit like the secret files that we see in television programmes. Perhaps we need to get the FBI in to look for the X-file details.

Another topic that the Government plan to introduce over the next couple of years, and which they are piloting in foundation trusts, is payment by results. I hope that before rolling it out across the NHS, various issues will be addressed. The first is the decision to introduce a fixed-price tariff. The Government want competition on the basis of quality, not price, but the problem with the tariff in its current form is that trusts that for some reason—in some cases purely for historical reasons—have costs that are 20 per cent. below the average tariff will receive a substantial sum for no extra procedures or extra activity—a bonus for them at the taxpayers' expense.

I ask the Government to think again about whether that is the best way to use the extra investment that is going into the NHS, and whether there is some scope even now for a maximum tariff, rather than an average tariff, to allow flexibility and to allow local commissioners to ensure that taxpayers get good value for money, alongside good quality care.

The second concern about the plan is that everything appears to be tied to the tariff, which could undoubtedly trigger some of the problems that arose from the Conservatives' internal market, where trusts find themselves above tariff, unable to make a transition back to the average within a reasonable time and consequently get into serious financial difficulties. There has been talk of transitional arrangements. Will those apply to the entire NHS, rather than just the pilots?

The third concern arises from the way the system focuses on rewarding activity, which is not necessarily the way to measure a system designed to promote good health. The system currently provides an incentive for more procedures and more treatment, rather than rewarding the postponement and prevention of ill-health. That brings me to the Wanless report and prevention, on which the Government and the House should focus more.

I was surprised that in his Budget statement last week, the Chancellor made no reference to the report by Derek Wanless, which, if I read the foreword to the report correctly, was commissioned by the Chancellor, the Secretary of State and the Prime Minister. The first report published by Wanless set out three scenarios. It predicted a gap between the best and the worst-case scenarios of £30 billion by 2022. It said that the NHS would cost £30 billion more if we failed fully to engage people in their own health. His second report sets out with great clarity the fact that the NHS is, by its very nature, focused on treating and curing ill health, rather than on preventing it. Wanless records that we have known for 30 years or more the determinants of ill health—economic, environmental and social factors—and the fact that poverty, poor housing, poor environment, bad diet and lack of exercise are the underlying drivers of much of the ill health that turns up in accident and emergency units and GPs' surgeries.

The inequalities that the right hon. Member for Darlington (Mr. Milburn) mentioned came across very powerfully in some recent work done in Leicester on health inequality. It found that within a distance of only seven miles, life expectancy varied by 20 years. How can such a difference be acceptable in 21st century Britain? Today's debate has so far failed to recognise that we need to move back upstream and tackle the underlying causes of ill health.

Dr. Andrew Murrison (Westbury) (Con): What conclusion does the hon. Gentleman draw from the fact that health inequalities appear to have widened in the past few years, rather than contracted?

Mr. Burstow: The conclusion drawn from the work done by Derek Wanless is that the failure over the past 20 years to make dealing with poverty a priority has driven health inequality, and that poverty is at the core of much of that health inequality. It was an underlying driver of health problems in the past, and it is now. It was a failure by the Conservatives when they were in office—[Interruption.] If there is no objection, I would like to develop the point as I see fit. When the Conservatives came to office in 1979, they inherited the Black report from the previous Labour Government, but they shelved it because they were not prepared to incur the up-front costs of shifting emphasis, doing what was necessary and investing in prevention.

Dr. Murrison: I have a point of information for the hon. Gentleman: the Black report was published in 1980, so we could not possibly have inherited it in 1979.

Mr. Burstow: That is a very pedantic point. The hon. Gentleman knows full well that the report was commissioned under a Labour Government, but came on to the desk of a Conservative Minister, who shelved it. It was not until 1992 that the Conservative Government finally woke up to the needs that existed and published a White Paper. That is the record of the Conservative Government.

In my judgment, the current Government's record is not much better. When they came to office in 1997, they initiated work through Acheson and they published a White Paper the following year, but they ditched most of the targets from the 1992 White Paper that could have made a difference. There seems almost to have been a period of boom and bust in activity on prevention and public health. We need sustained investment and reform of the sort that the Government rhetorically describe in relation to other aspects of health.

When I asked the Secretary of State about investment in research, he gave me the same answer as the Under-Secretary of State for Health, the hon. Member for Welwyn Hatfield (Miss Johnson), who is responsible for public health, gave me in the Select Committee on Health a couple of weeks ago. Effectively, they both said, "You'll have to wait for the White Paper; we are not saying anything just now." Last December, however, the Department of Health announced the establishment of a £3.5 million public health research consortium. My concern is that the scale of the task and the lack of an evidence base, which are documented by the Wanless report, necessitate urgent action. Welcome though the £3.5 million is, it is not enough, and the opportunity should be taken to invest further. I hope that, when the Secretary of State publishes his White Paper, he will give that commitment and roll out a programme of investment.

I want to mention two final issues. The problem with creating a shift from a sickness service to a health service is that the gains are very long term and do not impact on the Government of the day—unless they are so good that they stay in power for 30 years, but that does not happen very often. For example, in respect of cancer deaths, it takes 30 years after giving up smoking before the individual in question has reduced their risk of cancer to the same level as that of somebody who has not smoked in the first place. Welcome though the reported reduction in cancer deaths is, it is the consequence of action taken by Governments over the past 30 years, not only by this Government in the past five years. That is an important and perhaps salutary lesson for us all, and it needs to be borne in mind when we are trying to build a consensus on public health.

I want also to ask the Minister about the four-year delay in taking forward a key measure on smoking. The Health and Safety Commission's draft approved code of practice clarifies the implementation of the Health and Safety at Work, etc. Act 1974 in respect of passive smoking. It is four years since that measure was introduced, but the Government have remained silent. The measure does not go so far as to say that there should be a ban on smoking in enclosed public places, but it puts in place arrangements that could make a difference to the workers in those places, as well as to the public who do not wish to be victims of passive smoking. When will the Government act on that measure? As Wanless says, education will manifestly not change behaviour enough, because as those who have smoked know, addiction means that the habit is very hard to shake.

The timing of the comprehensive spending review is crucial, but the White Paper will be published in the summer. Clearly, the Government have already made quite a few decisions about the additional resources that they might need to earmark in order to roll out a public health agenda. If they have not done that, the White Paper proposals that are published this summer will take a considerable time to implement. I hope that I can be reassured on that point and that things will move forward more rapidly.

My final point concerns chronic disease. The right hon. Member for Darlington was right to focus on long-term morbidity, as the focus must shift not only to preventing ill health, but to the fact that the success of the NHS means that more people are living for longer with disease. The national service framework is in the pipeline and it will do something in that regard. But is it not curious that there has been a failure to commission any work on the prevalence of most of the chronic diseases that the national service framework on long-term medical conditions is attempting to do something about? There has also been a failure to undertake an audit of the work force to find out where the gaps are so that we can start to plug them. As a consequence, the framework will be hamstrung from the day on which it is published in terms of delivering on the very worthy words that I am sure it will contain.

The large proportion of NHS staff coping with long-term medical conditions is an important factor. Some 17 million people have long-term medical conditions, and they account for 60 per cent. of GP consultations and hospital resources, so it is important that the NSF delivers not only resources, but the clarity that is necessary for planning at a local level. We need to move from an episodic view of health care to one where patients are equal partners in respect of their own health and care. Nothing in the Secretary of State's speech gave people the sense that the Government want to reorientate the NHS around the needs of those with long-term health conditions.

We support the investment that is being put in, not so much by this Budget as by the previous one. It is essential, but not sufficient. We need to shift the focus from the treat-and-cure system that we have had since the 1940s to one that is much more about preventing and postponing ill health. We need to lift the burden of the targets and tick boxes that bog down the national health service. Above all, we need to bring health and care closer to home. Accountability must be local, because that is the only way in which we can make the NHS responsive to local needs, rather than to what is dictated by Whitehall.

After seven years of Labour government, this Budget has failed to set a framework to ensure that our constituents have access to a world-class health care system that not only treats them when they are sick, but ensures that they can enjoy opportunities for good health.

Mr. Kelvin Hopkins (Luton, North) (Lab): I congratulate my right hon. Friend the Chancellor on committing the Government once again to increasing real-terms spending on health and education. We still have a long way to go, although much improvement has already become evident.

There has been some debate this afternoon about the efficiency of the national health service. I do not think that there has ever been any question about its efficiency; it is its resourcing that has been the problem. Even in the dark days of Tory government, the national health service's output per unit of resource was remarkable. If one compares the NHS with, for example, the privatised system in America, where they spend twice the proportion of gross domestic product on health but millions of their people do not have proper health care, one sees that the NHS is remarkable but has been under-resourced for many decades.

Some Budgets ago, the Chancellor decided to announce massive increases in spending on health. At that time, France spent 3 per cent. more of its GDP on health than us. Three per cent. of GDP is roughly £50 million per constituency every single year. Let us imagine the effect of that sum of money over a 30-year period. At that time, I said that I wanted the £50 million in my constituency every year, and we are moving in that direction, which is welcome. The Germans spend even more than the French, and it is not surprising that those countries had better health outcomes than ours simply because they were better resourced. As I say, however, we are moving in the right direction.

I congratulate the Chancellor on his renewed emphasis on public borrowing for investment; he is absolutely right. United Kingdom gross public borrowing levels are very low by international and historical standards, and there is scope for substantial increases in public investment based on public borrowing. Low long-term interest rates reflect low inflationary expectations, so there is no problem there—public investment is in fact very cheap.

By contrast, our infrastructure needs are great. The Budget shows that the overall quality of our infrastructure compares badly with that in France and Germany. We must invest heavily in infrastructure for the long term, and we should do so through public borrowing. Private borrowing for investment is expensive, and the Exchequer pays a high premium for private investment, which is one reason why I congratulate my right hon. Friend on his emphasis on public investment in this Budget. If we examine the railways, for example, we see that there has been a shift from public to private investment and that the cost of renewing track is four times greater than it was 10 years ago, which is scandalous. That shows how efficient public investment is and how private investment has almost become corrupt.

I welcome the Chancellor's contrasting the performance of the British economy with that of the eurozone. This year, the forecast for growth in the eurozone is 1.7 per cent., which is not enough to sustain employment levels, and one can expect unemployment to rise still further in the eurozone countries. The forecast for growth in Britain is between 3 and 3.5 per cent. That is an enormous difference between Britain and the eurozone.

I shall quote from the Chancellor's speech, although it is not strictly in context. He referred to

"the flexibility to take the right monetary and fiscal decisions at the right time to sustain stability and growth".—[Official Report, 17 March 2004; Vol. 419, c. 324.]

That sounds like a good old Keynesian view—managing the economy by choosing monetary and fiscal policies to suit current needs. That is not possible in the eurozone, and it is not surprising that eurozone countries struggle to deal with serious unemployment and low growth. If I were the German Finance Minister, I would want to be able to reduce interest rates, induce a little currency depreciation and relax fiscal policy to boost the economy. Eurozone countries cannot do that because they are tied into economic and monetary union, which is a millstone around their necks. I congratulate the Chancellor on his renewed commitment to what appears to be a Keynesian, demand-management approach to economics, which is sensible. I also congratulate him on keeping Britain out of the euro for the past seven years. I hope that he will continue doing that good job and keep the euro where it belongs—in the very long grass.

I have some concerns about the Chancellor's speech, particularly about cuts in civil service jobs. We need more employment rather than less in some areas of the civil service, and particularly in the immigration service. Many of my constituents come to my surgeries with immigration problems. I have certainly not seen evidence of overstaffing in the immigration service; indeed, I have seen the reverse. We have new tax credit schemes that take a lot of administration, so perhaps we need more rather than fewer staff at the Inland Revenue, but I stand to be corrected.

I visited the VAT inspectorate some time ago. It seems that each new VAT inspector can collect six times their salary in tax, and that Inland Revenue inspectors can collect eight times their own salary in tax. More tax inspectors would produce far more money for the Treasury than the cost of their salaries, so there is a case for more rather than fewer tax inspectors. A report published this week states that some 15.7 per cent. of VAT is not collected, and that that figure has increased. That is the equivalent of £12 billion a year, which is a lot of money that the Chancellor could well do with to spend on public services. We also need more benefits officers, because my constituents have problems with the processing of their benefits claims. I am worried about cuts in civil service jobs—no doubt the civil service can become more efficient in certain areas, but I would not want cuts in the services that I have mentioned.

I want to finish by referring to health—this afternoon's debate is essentially about health—and in particular alcohol and taxation. A report published two weeks ago by the Academy of Medical Sciences drew attention to the link between price and alcohol consumption. Over the past 30 years, the cost of alcohol as a proportion of income has fallen by about one half. The Academy of Medical Sciences suggests that a small increase—even a 10 per cent. increase—in the real cost of alcoholic drinks could have enormously beneficial effects. A 10 per cent. increase in price would reduce deaths from cirrhosis of the liver by 5 per cent. in men and 7.1 per cent. in women. It would also lower murder rates and reduce alcohol-related deaths by 28.8 per cent. for men and 37.4 per cent. for women. Those figures are astonishing, and they were obtained by research by the Academy of Medical Sciences. We have a national alcohol problem that must be addressed; we cannot ignore prices or run away from the reality that we must raise them for the consumer to reduce dangerous alcohol consumption.

We should also reduce duty-free allowances and increase the policing of our borders to reduce alcohol smuggling. There is much to be said for restricting the sale of alcohol to the young. I would even suggest minimum retail prices in supermarkets. Pubs and clubs suffer from competition from the cheap alcohol available in supermarkets, and I can see nothing wrong with a health-based minimum price for alcohol in retail outlets, in which case I am sure that we would have better national health, less violent crime, lower death rates, reduced costs to the NHS and would begin to deal with the binge drinking problem.

Mr. Robert Walter (North Dorset) (Con): I am interested in the theory that the hon. Gentleman is expounding, but I wonder whether he will remind the House of what happened in the tobacco market when duties were increased. At one stage, 90 per cent. of the hand-rolled tobacco in this country was illegally imported because duty was so high.

Mr. Hopkins: I take the hon. Gentleman's point, but tobacco is small and easy to smuggle. We must rigorously police tobacco imports, but I appreciate that it is difficult. Alcohol is larger than tobacco and easier to detect. There is a difference, and it would be easier to control the smuggling of alcohol than tobacco.

Alcohol imposes enormous costs on the NHS, and it also imposes a policing cost. Every Saturday night in my town, the police are on the streets dealing with young people who have obviously abused alcohol. Social services must deal with children from families where alcohol abuse has led to domestic violence.

Mr. Burstow: Has the hon. Gentleman considered that it might be worth examining the fact that policing costs do not fall on those who provide alcohol in pubs? Perhaps those costs should be returned to those who provide alcohol and sell it to drunken people.

Mr. Hopkins: I accept the hon. Gentleman's point, which the Home Secretary is considering. A simple increase in the price of alcohol and the maintenance of a minimum price for it would be effective, but we must take other measures. My proposal is not a complete alcohol strategy and relates to price only.

Finally, the policy would bring the Chancellor enormous revenues that he could spend on public services to benefit the whole population. I am sure that the policy would be popular. A small number of people would, no doubt, complain about a 10 per cent. increase in the price of their drinks, but the great majority of the population would see the sense in raising prices to reduce the harmful level of alcohol abuse, which would lead to a much more civilised life for everybody. In particular, it would reduce the damage that is done to children by their parents' drinking. I urge my right hon. Friend the Chancellor and other Ministers seriously to consider raising the real price of alcohol through alcohol taxation.

6.30 pm

Mrs. Gillian Shephard (South-West Norfolk) (Con): I am delighted to be called to speak in this Budget debate. I make no excuse for changing the subject to that of biofuels: that will be no surprise to the Economic Secretary. I am not deterred by the fact that we usefully debated biofuels 10 days ago, on 11 March. That debate, of which I should like to remind the House, allowed hon. Members on both sides to examine with remarkable unanimity the excellent report on biofuels by the Select Committee on Environment, Food and Rural Affairs, which was published last September. During the debate, the hon. Member for Southampton, Test (Dr. Whitehead) said that

"to get the attention of the House for an idea, one has to enunciate it at least six times."—[Official Report, 11 March 2004; Vol. 418, c. 1731.]

He went on to say that he had talked about a bioethanol escalator at least five times. I am aware that I am raising the issue of biofuels for at least the fifth or sixth time; I feel as though I am recycling in person.

The debate on 11 March illustrates the fact that although there is no problem in gaining the attention of the House on this subject, there seems to be a problem—perhaps rather less so since the Budget—in gaining that of the Government. In that debate, the Minister for the Environment said:

"I can honestly say that I have attended few debates during which the case has been made so persuasively, and Members have spoken with such authority . . . All their contributions made a great deal of sense".

He went on to point out—albeit to an audience of Members who had demonstrated that they needed no persuasion—that substitution of biofuels for fossil fuels would save millions of tonnes of carbon per year, and he added:

"The question is: how can the Government support this process?"—[Official Report, 11 March 2004; Vol. 418, c. 1743–45.]

At that moment—I am so glad that he is here—the Economic Secretary entered the Chamber, and there was a frisson of excitement as hon. Members allowed themselves to wonder for a moment whether an announcement was imminent—but no, he had come in to walk the Consolidated Fund (No. 2) Bill, and no pronouncement followed. Perhaps we will have one today.

As the Minister for the Environment said on 11 March, there is enthusiasm and support from both sides of this House, from the other place, and from a huge range of organisations on the need for more Government help for the development of biofuels. Bioethanol and biodiesel offer proven environmental benefits compared with petrol, because they provide air quality benefits, security of fuel supply, and alternative markets for UK agricultural producers.

Over the past year, the House has seen several well supported early-day motions, a number of debates and a unanimous report from the Select Committee. The Government can be in no doubt about the size of the political lobby in favour of more support for biofuels. Ministers, especially the Economic Secretary, have received many delegations. Nationally, there is strong support from the CBI, major manufacturers, Friends of the Earth, British Chambers of Commerce, the agriculture industry and many others. Until the Budget announcement last week, the collective view was that although the duty reduction of 20p per litre announced in last year's Budget was very welcome, it was not enough to stimulate further development of the industry. One witness to the Select Committee described biofuels manufacture in the UK as "an extremely small cottage industry", and on 11 March the hon. Member for Sherwood (Paddy Tipping) described it, rather unflatteringly, as "some chip oil recycling".

The debate on 11 March—it was timely, because it took place before the Budget—revealed enthusiasm and support not only for our cause, but for a variety of solutions to the problem. The Chairman of the Select Committee, my right hon. Friend the Member for Fylde (Mr. Jack), pointed out that in order for the Government to follow EU guidelines targeting 2 per cent. biodiesel by 2005, there would need to be an 80-fold expansion of production, to 32 million litres per month, compared with current production of 400,000 litres per month. He drew the House's attention to an amendment to the Energy Bill tabled in the other place, which would "'require all producers selling road transport fuel in the United Kingdom to show that over the course of a calendar year a specified proportion of such fuel was biofuel.'"—[Official Report, 11 March 2004; Vol. 418, c. 1718.]

He added that such a requirement would be without cost to the Government. The hon. Member for Sherwood supported that proposal and suggested that the Government might consider a further duty derogation and capital grants and allowances. The hon. Member for Southampton, Test spoke of an ethanol escalator, which he has advocated with great knowledge on several occasions.

The Government are not short of support or suggestions on the way forward—nor, indeed, of obligations into which they entered on their own account. Their own policy commission on food and farming recommended in the Curry report that "the Government should reduce duty on biofuels to that charged on other clean fuels."

The Government have committed themselves by introducing the 20p per litre fuel duty reduction that was announced in the previous Budget. They signed up to the requirements of the EU biofuels directive, which will require the UK to notify to the EU Commission by 1 July this year the volume of biofuel that will be used in the UK by the end of 2005—in other words, those decisions will have to be made within the next four months. The Government's own energy White Paper, which was produced a year ago, gave a commitment to produce "an assessment of the overall energy implications of both a hydrogen economy and of large scale biomass based fuels, and to develop road maps of the possible transition to these new fuels and vehicles."

In the light of all that, what does the Budget offer? The 20p per litre duty incentive in favour of biodiesel will be maintained until at least 2007; the same incentive for bioethanol, which was announced last year, will be introduced from 1 January 2005, again with the differential guaranteed until at least 2007; the Government will undertake consultation over the summer to examine in detail the implications of input-based taxation for biofuels; and there will be discussion on the applications of capital allowances to support investment in the most environmentally beneficial biofuels processing plants, with a view to announcing the outcome in the 2004 pre-Budget report.

Those moves are positive in that they announce stability of duty levels for a given period and point to further consideration of the issue—as well as to further delay, of course. However, I am bound to say to the Economic Secretary that the Budget disappointed people in the field. Global Commodities UK Ltd., which is based in Dereham in Norfolk, says that the Government have failed to listen. The company had been hoping to boost the county's agricultural economy by using rapeseed oil for fuel production, but told the Eastern Daily Press on 18 March:

"The Germans have just cut tax on their biofuels to zero. It is just not a level playing field. Farmers in Europe are growing rape seed to produce fuel but ours can't."

British Sugar, which was planning to create a £55 million bioethanol plant at Wissington in my constituency, said:

"Many European governments have already put fiscal support measures in place that are proving sufficient to encourage the development of large-scale industries. Regrettably the level of support announced by the Chancellor today is insufficient to create a similar situation in the UK."

So where do we go from here? The Economic Secretary has said that he has been impressed by the coherence and force of the lobbying for more action to help biofuels. He should know, because he has received, with great courtesy, many delegations and lobby groups on the matter. However, in the House of Commons and the other place, there is perhaps a need to provide a stronger focus at parliamentary level. I am therefore delighted that the hon. Members for Sherwood, for Nottingham, South (Alan Simpson) and for South-East Cornwall (Mr. Breed), all of whom knew that I intended to raise the matter this afternoon, agreed to join me in forming an informal, all-party pressure group to provide such a focus. The Economic Secretary will be hearing more from us.

Earlier, I referred to the variety of approaches that the Government might adopt in encouraging biofuel production. Let me draw hon. Members' attention to another, extremely imaginative approach that was presented as an entry to the East of England Development Agency's Landmark competition, which is now reaching its final stages. The project, which is called Star of the East, is backed by the university of East Anglia in partnership with Powergen. It has attracted wide, cross-party support in Norfolk and Norwich. It proposes a renewables power station, based on a derelict site in Norwich, with a major research and development component, which will burn biomass, develop new ways of processing biofeedstocks and have a biofuels facility. If the Star of the East wins the East of England Development Agency Landmark competition, the Government will get high-level research, a renewables power station, genuine encouragement for biofuels, an outlet for agricultural produce and a world-class site. I shall happily send the details to the Economic Secretary.

I have given the Treasury spokesman rather a battering this afternoon, but the Budget affects all aspects of our lives. Many hon. Members have concentrated on health. Biofuels could affect the health of the nation and, indeed, the international community. We have to reduce carbon emissions and be responsible, for the sake of this generation and the next. If the Government gave more encouragement to the production of biofuels, they could congratulate themselves on their initiative. I hope that they will consider increased encouragement in future.

6.41 pm

Linda Gilroy (Plymouth, Sutton) (Lab/Co-op): It is a pleasure to follow the right hon. Member for South-West Norfolk (Mrs. Shephard) and to have heard her interesting contribution to the debate. It will be of interest to people in Devon and Cornwall, where biofuels offer new diversification potential in farming crops.

[Linda Gilroy]

I welcome the opportunity to make a contribution to the debate on health. Successive Budgets since 1997 have provided sound public finances and the basis for significant increases in resources for all our public services. They have enabled us to tackle the significant under-investment of previous decades, which was perhaps most apparent in the health service.

During the 1997 election campaign, it seemed as though people on every doorstep related a difficult story about employment. My constituency has experienced some of the most dramatic falls in unemployment in the country. I remember when my right hon. Friend the Member for Darlington (Mr. Milburn), who made an interesting contribution to the debate, visited my constituency in 1996. We discussed the way in which solving unemployment could contribute significantly to reducing poverty and the attendant stress and ill health. We have made progress on employment.

In the 2001 election campaign, however, when I knocked on some 4,000 doors, I was struck by the fact that we still had much to do for the health service, even though we had put in place important building blocks on which to base the investment that was announced in the Budget that followed the election. I want to consider what the investment is achieving and what it will and can achieve. I also want to discuss the Government's commitment to spend money, which is matched by their commitment to efficiency. I stress to my hon. Friends on the Front Bench that that is matched by the commitment of our local health authority, primary care trust and acute hospital trust to ensuring that we get value for money. I want to make one or two points, of which my hon. Friend the Minister may be able to take note to help us to do exactly that.

First, I want to consider the scale of investment as it affects Plymouth and what has happened since 1997. Funding for the former South and West Devon health authority increased from £367 million to approximately £500 million. That is a significant investment, which will set us on course for the 10-year plan to double health investment. Successive Budgets provide for that and dedicate so much more money to our health service than in the past.

Primary care trust funding for Plymouth will increase from £230 million to approximately £272 million between 2003–04 and 2005–06. We will get a new diagnostic and treatment centre, the Vanguard project, which is funded with £129 million of private finance initiative money. We have a £39 million extension to the south-west cardiothoracic centre at Derriford hospital. In an intervention on my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State, I mentioned that that enabled us to increase the number of cardio-patients from 700 in the mid-1990s to 1,850 this year.

I will answer the rhetorical question that I posed. Previously, people were referred to Bristol and Brompton, and the unit was built on the premise that some 500 people would be treated locally. We continue to send some 500 people to Bristol and Brompton but we are now treating 1,300 people. I suspect that many of them would have suffered an early death through the previous lack of investment in our health service.

In the primary care trust that now covers the former South and West Devon health authority area, the number of people who wait more than 13 weeks for out-patient treatment has decreased by a substantial 66 per cent. since 1997. That is one indicator of good value for money. Primary care trusts spend 75 per cent. of the money for the health service, thus enabling doctors to be our champions. That is accompanied by the radical new way in which hospital funding operates. The hon. Member for Sutton and Cheam (Mr. Burstow) referred to that method of payment by results. I make a plea to my hon. Friend the Minister to examine the way in which we might refine the tariff systems that are being introduced.

The system has teething problems, which especially affect high cost, low volume services such as those that specialist hospitals like Derriford provide. For example, a cardiac bypass operation has the same hospital reference group and therefore the same tariff as a quadruple bypass operation. Such a system is likely to result in Plymouth hospitals trust losing more than £1 million in cardiothoracics alone, owing to distorting effects in the case mix. My hon. Friend knows that we, like many southern hospital trusts, have an accumulated deficit in hospital funding. I hope that we have the opportunity to discuss that with her before the system is fully rolled out.

Other aspects need to be considered. For example, pay represents 65 per cent. of hospital costs. Derriford has an effective pay review programme to identify savings and ensure that the money is concentrated on front-line services. For example, it runs a locum bank to try to achieve some cost savings. However, the market forces factor that applies to the hospital reference group increases or reduces the tariff. Plymouth hospitals trust has had its tariff reduced by 7 per cent. from the average. Consequently, St. Mary's NHS trust in London, which has the highest market forces factor, will earn 42 per cent. more per patient than Plymouth hospitals trust for performing the same procedure. That cannot merely represent the differences in the cost factors that operate—undoubtedly, things are more expensive in London, but not by that amount. In 2000–01, Plymouth hospitals trust undertook a piece of work that revealed that the average cost per employee was £27,000. If we make a comparison with other trusts that have similar costs per employee, we find that East London and The City Mental Health NHS Trust has a 30 per cent. higher staff market forces factor than that trust, yet London weighting would amount to no more than a difference of 11 per cent. I therefore hope, as the hon. Member for Sutton and Cheam argued, that we will examine that before it is rolled out much further.

The primary care trust is also working hard to deliver our community and mental health services in Plymouth. Against the background of considerable challenges, I am pleased that it achieved a two-star rating in the first such exercise this year. Those challenges arise from the health inequalities that have grown up over several decades. As a result of the doubtful legacy of my Conservative predecessor, I represent the poorest ward in England on the 1995 index of local conditions. Our primary care trust must meet challenges such that a man living in inner-city Plymouth, which I represent, will die 10 years earlier than his counterpart living in the leafy suburbs, which are covered by the same primary care trust.

The trust is committed to meeting those changes, and has some innovative programmes. For instance, it has one of the most successful smoking cessation programmes in the country at present. Were my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Health present, I would have congratulated him on his efforts to take part in his own smoking cessation programme and invited him, as I have done on two occasions already this evening, to visit Plymouth to see the good work being done in that respect. Another programme with which we have had particular success, and which in years to come—although it is not possible to see the immediate payback—will help to reduce social inequalities, is the work to reduce teenage pregnancy, which, of course, is often accompanied by single parenthood and the sort of poverty that leads to a vicious cycle of ill health, unemployment and other problems.

Our primary care trust has also worked hard with the acute hospital to reduce the prescribing budget, without, of course, reducing the quality of prescribing practice to patients. That has been particularly successful, and it has been able to save seven-figure sums by entering into partnership with consultants in the acute hospital to try to get the prescribing regime right for those in hospital. Therefore when they come out of hospital, the PCT is able to ensure that their medication can continue in a value-for-money way.

The trust has been so successful in doing this that I was caught in a double bind earlier this year when I was approached by constituents, Mr. and Mrs. Tomes, on behalf of their son, Ashleigh. In that regard, my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State mentioned in his opening speech the great advances that will come as a result of new gene therapies. Some of those are already on-stream, and some of them address rare diseases, so the medicines being developed are therefore required in small numbers, and their developmental costs are very high. If, as in the case of my constituents and those of some 39 other Members of the House, 40 people in the country can benefit from a particular therapy, the cost of developing it and then delivering it will be very high. Recently, I went with an all-party group and members of the Society of Multipolysaccharide Diseases to discuss with the Minister of State some of the issues in relation to prescribing for such rare diseases, and we were much impressed by his grasp of the human issues associated with parents knowing that a drug is available. In this case, the drug can range in cost between £80,000 and £140,000 per prescription per year, and more and more such drugs will come on-stream. That will be an additional challenge to already hard-pressed primary care trust budgets. We will work with the Minister of State, who is seized of the challenge that faces us in the future.

The Red Book refers to the 10-year framework for science and innovation. I welcome the announcement that the key focus of the Government's commitment to science will be to ensure that clinical research plays its full part in generating health and economic benefits, and that that will be matched by the increase in national health service funding for research and development.

This Government have made serious inroads into the health challenges, with serious money and serious investment. They are serious about delivering a framework to deliver good health outcomes from that investment, and about making sure that there are enough health care staff, with good terms and conditions. Labour Members will know that that has come about by choice not chance, and if choice not chance informs the next election, this and successive Budgets will give the British people confidence to deliver the strong and stable economy that will allow our public services, which are so important to them, to continue to develop.

Alistair Burt (North-East Bedfordshire) (Con): It is a pleasure to follow the hon. Member for Plymouth, Sutton (Linda Gilroy), who made a skilful defence of the Budget in relation to the health needs of her constituents. I hope to match her eloquence, but I will not necessarily agree with all her arguments.

It was quiet in Biggleswade last week. The still waters of the River Ivel were disturbed more by the gathering winds and gales that swept across the country at the weekend than by anything that the Chancellor said. That was not a great surprise—my constituents do not expect all that much from this Chancellor, and they were not disappointed. They recognised, as we all do, in all parts of the House, that it was a highly political Budget, of which my constituents were not the targets. It was a speech all about the Chancellor, and his targets were sitting all around him, rather than across the Chamber or among my constituents.

The Budget included serious political gestures; let me pick out two—one good, and one less good. I am sure that mine is not the only constituency to have a significant number of historic, old churches and, given that, we welcome very much the removal of VAT on church repairs. It will make a difference, and will recognise the position of churches in local communities. Whether or not that is related to their churchgoing and Christian communities, those churches are symbols of what is good and great in our communities. Full marks to the Chancellor for that.

As a political gesture, the council tax bribe was crass and will be ineffective. The whole point of a bribe is that one is not supposed to see it coming or to know that it is there. The more obvious it is, the less effect it has. My constituents are not fools. My pensioner constituents well understand that their council tax bills have been rising in recent years at the Chancellor's behest. They have seen money taken away from their county council as it has been shifted from rural areas to other areas. They have seen extra responsibilities put on the county council, which have not been paid for. To compound that by effectively taking money from their neighbours and children to pay for what the Chancellor has asked leaves a very sour taste. They will not be fooled—it is like a magician explaining to everyone what the trick is, doing the trick, and then expecting applause for the suspension of disbelief that he has just dispelled. The Chancellor gets no marks for such a crass political gesture.

Before I say something about health, let me touch on two themes that are increasingly becoming a hallmark of the present Chancellor, and are perpetuated by the Budget. Notwithstanding all the things that are working well and are encouraging in today's UK economy—and how grateful the Chancellor must continually be to my right hon. and learned Friend the Member for

[Alistair Burt]

Rushcliffe (Mr. Clarke) and my right hon. Friend John Major for the economic legacy that they left him—the Chancellor is steadily taking risks and undermining the very basis of the things of which he can boast so grandly at the Dispatch Box.

I am indebted for an excellent speech last Wednesday by my right hon. Friend the Member for Hitchin and Harpenden (Mr. Lilley), who patiently explained the cumulative and long-term beneficial effects of Conservative reforms on trade unions, taxation, the competitiveness of the economy, the regulatory framework and the nationalised industries. He explained that it would take time for those effects to show in the economy. The flip side, as he also explained, is the damage being done by failure to understand the impact of those changes. A move away from their beneficial effects is inevitable, but it too would take time to feed through.

We are already seeing some signs. There is an obvious decline in the UK's competitiveness, which is recognised throughout the world. There is also the growing voice of business and industry, which observe the damage being done. Nothing in the Budget speech suggested to me that the Chancellor understood the danger of throwing away what he was throwing away. Truly, in the words of Miss Joni Mitchell, you don't know what you've got till it's gone.

The second theme that the Chancellor is increasingly in danger of failing to understand is his inability to restrain his two impulses, towards spending and towards being in complete control. Spending we know all about: it is easy to spend. Whether it does any good, and whether it does the good that it is designed to do, we have already discussed today in relation to health, and we will continue to do so. As for the control issue, the determination to control was illustrated in the Budget by two gestures, one very significant and one throwaway.

The significant gesture was the casually offered snub to the Prime Minister when the Chancellor made it clear that it was he who would decide whether the Government opted to join the euro—a point picked up earlier by the hon. Member for Luton, North (Mr. Hopkins) when he welcomed "the Chancellor's decision" not to join. I did not think it was the Chancellor's decision to make—someone will correct me if I am wrong—but the Chancellor, of course, makes clear that it is.

The throwaway gesture was the Chancellor's statement that he accepted a recommendation in Kate Barker's report on housing, published that morning, without much consideration and with no consultation. The report recommended that in the regions there should be one body responsible for housing and planning—no doubt under significant Whitehall control. So there it is: goodbye local democracy. Goodbye to those who understand the importance of greater development in their area, not at regional level but at local level, to the local communities and authorities that must deal with the consequences.

It is consequences that I want to discuss now. One of the consequences of increasing large-scale development will involve local health services. Bedfordshire will have to accept 54,000 new houses in the next 17 years. Let me give the House an idea of the scale. The two biggest towns in my constituency are Sandy and Biggleswade, which between them have a little under 30,000 inhabitants. It has taken them hundreds of years to reach that size. In less than 17 years, new developments twice that size will come into being.

In such cases, there is always an immediate pressure on health. Services lag behind development. My county is now irrevocably committed to years of catch-up. Bedford primary care trust already has a shortfall of some £19 million, and it was clear from the latest Government figures, released before Christmas, that there were no plans to close the gap in the next 20 years. Now there will be that further development. The proposal to take planning decisions further away from local communities and towards regional bodies, which the Chancellor so casually recommended, is scarcely good news for my constituents or those who plan health matters.

It is not just about money. The Government, and the Secretary of State this afternoon, have made it clear that as far as they are concerned the major indicator in all issues related to health and public services is how much is spent—not how good a system is, how efficient it is, how welcome it is in a particular area or how understanding it is of that area's needs. Not all problems are solved in terms of how much is spent. Let me give two examples.

First, there is the question of how the money is spent. Where in the Budget debate did we sense any confidence in the new GPs' contract and its effects, to which the Secretary of State did not refer? On 1 April, the new contract will come into force. What assurances have been given to primary care trusts, which are taking over its administration, that they will be able to provide a better out-of-hours service for their patients than GPs have been providing?

We already know that the PCTs have been given a certain amount of money with which to handle the contract. We know how much the GPs were charged by those running out-of-hours services, and how much they intend to charge the PCTs; and we know that the two do not balance. What will happen? Here was an opportunity, just two weeks before the introduction of the new contract, to give PCTs some reassurance about what would happen should the money run out. There was no such reassurance. It is not a question of how much is there; it is a question of how it is used, and how it can be ensured that those responsible for services know what is to be done.

The second problem is how to deal with the fact that more and more doctors and nurses are leaving the system. The system can have all the money it requires, but if it is not recruiting or retaining doctors and is losing nurses, it will not be able to deliver the services that it wants to deliver. Six months ago, the magazine Hospital Doctor published the results of a survey that indicated that up to three quarters of all hospital doctors intended to retire early. They cited stress, increased work load, declining clinical autonomy and a lack of support from management as key factors.

Many of the issues are structural. They can be related to an overbearing, over-prescriptive regime in which targets and quotas have played their part. Do the Chancellor and the Government not see that putting money into an inadequately reformed system does nothing to alter those problems? All that happens is that raised expectations are followed by frustration and disappointment as doctors still feel unable to carry out their duties. They leave a poorer service, and patients lose faith as a result. I detected no understanding of that in the Budget debate and the Chancellor's remarks.

Two weeks ago, the New Statesman reporter Glenda Cooper dealt with the issue of nurses in the NHS. She wrote

"the NHS still needs to find 35,000 more nurses during the next five years—while at the same time a quarter of the workforce is due to retire, and up to one in five nurses drops out before the end of training."

She referred to a recent MORI poll which found that one in 10 nurses planned to leave the profession in the next two years, chiefly because of not money but the inadequate shift pattern and the work that they were expected to do. She reported:

"Nursing, they say, has become divorced from caring, sisters have been reduced to ward managers, and degrees and diplomas have become more important than bedpans and bedside manners."

That is nothing to do with the money that goes into the health service; it is all to do with understanding the health service, and making the reforms that are needed to retain those valuable personnel. For all the talk and, I am afraid, all the Secretary of State's bluster today, I sensed no understanding of needs of that kind, or of the importance of retaining key people who make decisions.

Let me end with a short plea. As I said earlier, I welcomed the concession on VAT related to church repairs. Will those at the Treasury have a word with the Minister of State, Department of Health, the right hon. Member for Barrow and Furness (Mr. Hutton) about the charging of VAT on capital projects for the NHS? Where public appeals have been launched to support them, might there be any relief of VAT required for building works resulting from such appeals?

Recently, the Primrose appeal in Bedfordshire raised more than £2 million to support a new cancer unit at Bedford hospital. Donors throughout Bedfordshire were surprised and disappointed to learn that a concession given to the Macmillan charity, enabling the VAT that it would have to pay to be recovered through an internal mechanism in the health service, would not be available for the bulk of the money raised for the building itself.

My hon. Friend the Member for Mid-Bedfordshire (Mr. Sayeed) and the hon. Member for Bedford (Mr. Hall) have visited the right hon. Member for Barrow and Furness, and I think that we have a ready ear there. We may be able to find a local solution to our particular problem, but I ask the right hon. Gentleman to investigate whether, where public appeals have been made on behalf of capital projects that will benefit the NHS, there is a way of ensuring that VAT that would otherwise be chargeable is spent on patient care, so that people raise money for treatment, not tax.

The NHS is a great service, to which I am personally very strongly committed. My father worked all his life as a GP in the health service. My brother is a consultant anaesthetist and neither my wife nor I or any of our children have any private medical insurance. We are members of and wholly dependent on the NHS. Where the Budget has been singularly lacking in terms of response from the Government has been in understanding that money is not the answer, and in the determination of the Secretary of State to continue with partisan and rather tedious arguments and discussion of what we might do. It is not what the debate on the current NHS is all about, and I have offered some examples for consideration. I am perfectly confident that when my hon. Friend the Member for South Cambridgeshire (Mr. Lansley) replies from the Opposition Front Bench today and when he and our colleagues have the opportunity to run the service themselves, the public will finally get not only the Budget debates that they deserve but the NHS care that they have paid for, deserve and are entitled to expect.

7.11 pm

Sir George Young (North-West Hampshire) (Con): It is a pleasure to follow the high-quality speech of my hon. Friend the Member for North-East Bedfordshire (Alistair Burt), who focused on the health service but began with some comments about broader issues in the Budget. It is quite difficult to explain to a 69-year-old who may have modest income and modest capital that they will get none of the Chancellor's munificence, whereas a 70-year-old who may be infinitely better off will get the £100. That bribe, as my hon. Friend called it, says something about the Chancellor. For seven years, he introduced complicated, focused, targeted means-tested benefits. Now, at the end of the seven years, he has cast that aside and is bringing in a universal benefit. That seems to say something about the failure of his strategy. He introduced those highly complicated schemes and is now moving from that towards universalism.

I welcome the increase in resources being devoted to the NHS. The Secretary of State said when he opened the debate that we still have a long way to go, which is indeed the case. I got a fax last week from the Southampton University Hospitals NHS Trust about a constituent waiting for a scan appointment at the Wessex neurological centre. I quote what it said:

"The waiting list for such an examination currently runs at around 52 weeks."

The constituent in question had already been waiting for a scan for over a year. At a time when we are all being told that early detection leading to early treatment dramatically increases the prospects of recovery and survival, long waits of 52 weeks after a referral for examination are simply unacceptable.

I know what the Minister is likely to say in response—that extra resources have been allocated, and that it takes time to procure the scanners and to train the staff. I want to look at the claim on resources. This year, there has been a 9 per cent. increase in cash resources for the NHS in Hampshire. With inflation at around 2 per cent., people might think that that left a healthy margin for real terms growth, but they would be wrong because 7.8 per cent. of the 9 per cent. is accounted for by what in health-speak is called "tariff growth."

Tariff growth is the unavoidable increase in existing costs before one thinks about new commitments. It covers the national insurance increase, the reduction in doctors' hours, wage increases, the increased costs of drugs and so on. In other words, real growth is about 1.2 per cent. However, most of the trusts in Hampshire are running at a deficit. The cumulative total of deficits in Hampshire is £20 million. The trusts have been told to use the growth money to address the deficit and that £20 million is about 1 per cent. of the budget, which almost equates to the growth money.

Also, in Hampshire many trusts have survived by transferring capital to revenue in order to balance the books, but that practice will no longer be possible because the Government have stopped it. That will exaggerate the underlying imbalance between revenue and expenditure. Therefore, in effect, there is precious little growth in Hampshire and consultation is about to start on difficult measures to balance the books.

That leads me to a point that I have made before in these debates about the way in which money is distributed. My constituents get less per capita for health than anywhere else in the country—we are now 21 per cent. under the national average, and it was about 16 per cent. when this Government came to office. Therefore, although the totality of NHS resources is increasing, we are getting a reduced percentage of the total available.

Of course, I accept the argument that resources need to be allocated according to need, and that there are parts of England with more severe health challenges than those that face us in Hampshire. What I do not accept, and what I have never seen justified, is that we can get by with £79 as opposed to £100—the average in England. There are wards of deprivation in Andover. Even people on above average incomes get ill. Indeed, health spend is often linked to longevity. Some of the costs in Hampshire are higher than elsewhere. For example, we spend more on agency nurses because of the difficulty of recruiting full-time nurses in a high-cost housing area such as Hampshire. If the funding we received was 85 per cent. of the national average as opposed to 79 per cent., we could probably cope. I urge the Government to revisit the distribution formula and to abandon the unjustified discrimination against the south-east, which we have seen not just in health but in the revenue support grant.

To echo what my hon. Friend the Member for North-East Bedfordshire said about what the Secretary of State did not mention, a lot of reforms are taking place in the NHS at the moment and the right hon. Gentleman did not touch on any of them. An entirely new national programme for IT is coursing through the NHS. He did not mention the new GP contracts and the new out-of-hours service, which in my constituency looks as though it will mean that people will no longer be able to go to Andover hospital after 11 pm. They will either have to call out a GP or go to Winchester. We have the new contracts, the working-time directive and we are moving towards the national tariff and payment by results under the reforms to NHS financial flows. None of those was touched on by the Secretary of State but they are all vital matters that the NHS is addressing at the moment.

Nor did the Secretary of State say one word about foundation trusts. We know that it is a sensitive subject for the Labour party but that is an issue that many of those who work in the NHS are now addressing. With foundation trusts, the Government are confronted with a dilemma entirely of their own making. They have said that all the capital borrowing by those trusts from the City will score as public expenditure, and will have to come out of the NHS Brown envelope. Therefore, the more successful the foundation trusts are in using that freedom to borrow, the greater the penalty the rest of the hospitals will have to pay in having their capital reduced to accommodate that growth. The NHS under Labour is like a hostage ingeniously tied up by his captors. The more he struggles to release the ropes around his hands, the tighter the noose around his neck.

I have two possible "wave 1a" trusts in my constituency, and the one-off grant of £175,000 in no way covers the transitional costs, many of which will recur. How much will they be able to borrow? In a letter to me dated 11 March, the Minister of State told me:

> "The Independent Regulator sets the prudential borrowing limit for each NHS Foundation Trust on the basis of a prudential borrowing code . . . If you have further questions about the code, you may wish to contact the Regulator".

So the fortunes of the trusts and, dare I say it, of the Government are now in the regulator's hands. What view will he take of the trusts in my constituency that are well run, but that have an excess of expenditure over income for the reasons that I have touched on? The regulator may well say that, because of the accumulated deficit, the imbalance on the revenue account and the backlog of maintenance, the ability to fund debt is very low. They may end up getting less money out of the new system than they would have received, had they remained under the NHS. That would be a severe blow for the Government's health policy.

The message from the regulator is rather stark. I was reading NHS Magazine yesterday. Bill Moyes, the regulator, was quoted as saying:

> "Convince us you can cope as independent entities."

He makes it clear that his function is about managing risk, not performance. He asks:

> "Are applicants financially strong enough? Are they financially stable?"

Well, towards the end of the year, the Government may have some difficult questions to answer if many of the applicant trusts find that they are worse off under the new regime than they would have been under the old one.

Mr. Lansley: My right hon. Friend and I have discussed this matter, but it may be of interest to him—if not to Health Ministers, who are not present—that I have looked at a "wave 1" trust's service development strategy and it is not entirely in the hands of the independent regulator. That trust, at least, anticipates that nearly £50 million of its depreciation charge—its revaluation reserve on its balance sheet—will be replaced by public dividend capital. Of course, as that involves equity, rather than debt, it may increase its borrowing ratio, but a lot of hospitals elsewhere in the NHS might wonder where that money will come from on the Government's balance sheet.

Sir George Young: My hon. Friend makes a good point, and if I were a Health Minister approaching a general election, possibly 12 months away, I would be deeply worried about ending up with egg on my face because of that new policy, under which the trusts that have been encouraged to apply for foundation status may find that they are worse off.

In passing, I mention the senseless cap on private patient income for foundation trusts. Hospitals in my constituency could increase their income and spend more money on treating NHS patients if it were not for the cap on the percentage of the income that they can generate from private patients—a cap that was not there for the first seven years of the Labour Government. The Government managed perfectly well without that cap until now, but they are now introducing that wholly unnecessary restraint on the ability of NHS hospitals to raise money for NHS patients.

I want to end with a final word about a subject that has been raised twice at Prime Minister's questions. I have visited and kept in regular contact with a national charity, the Macular Disease Society, as it is based in my constituency. It is a membership society for people with age-related macular degeneration. Ministers will be well aware of the anxiety about the delay in introducing the treatment, photodynamic therapy, for wet age-related macular degeneration. Up to 7,500 new cases of that aggressive condition occur each year, and patients can go from seeing well to severe sight damage in three months.

The Macular Disease Society is in close touch with patients, who are still being asked to pay £2,000 a time for up to six treatments, and consultants, whose primary care trusts tell them that they are not yet funded to give the treatment on the NHS. Ministers know that some 50 clinics in the country are currently capable of delivering the treatment, yet Ministers insist that training and staffing issues, not cost, are delaying implementation. The truth is that strategic health authorities and PCTs have been given the freedom to delay paying for treatment up to the end of June, and those who have not made provision in their budgets are doing just that. The result is that patients either have to find £2,000 per treatment, to be carried out by the same NHS consultant, or they start to lose their sight. Consultants across the country can deliver the treatment, but they have been refused the funding.

In many letters to Members of Parliament, Ministers have said:

"We will do all we can to ensure that services which have the ability to expand sooner than the nine month period do so and that new services come on stream as soon as they are able."

When he winds up, I should like the Economic Secretary to tell us exactly what those Ministers have done. The treatment was approved in September last year by the National Institute for Clinical Excellence and the Department of Health, but Ministers still have not given direct orders to SHAs and PCTs to start delivering it through existing clinics and treatment centres.

Although more than 100 patients a week are diagnosed and will be treated in the well-managed hospitals that offer the treatment, others will be invited to pay £2,000 for their first treatment or they will lose their sight and suffer appalling distress. We have made many demands of the Government during the debate, but it would be helpful if the Economic Secretary could say that, between now and June, the Government will take the necessary steps to ensure that the people who have that disease will get the treatment that they need, without having to pay £2,000.

Mr. Robert Walter (North Dorset) (Con): The Secretary of State for Health opened the debate with his endless good news story, but some of my constituents would treat his remarks with incredulity. When I first became a Member of Parliament in 1997, I could proudly say that my constituency came top of all lists in respect of health. We had the shortest waiting lists and the shortest waiting times, and so on. There was anecdotal evidence of people moving to Dorset to get treatments that were paid for there—I think of in vitro fertilisation treatment, for example. In those days, I received few complaints from constituents about treatment under the national health service, and those that I did receive were dealt with promptly, with treatment usually almost instantaneous. I am afraid that the story today is very different.

Several of my hon. Friends have referred to out-of-hours services. The chairman and chief executive of the primary care trust in my constituency explained to me the other day how the new out-of-hours contract was envisaged for patients in Dorset. No longer would patients concerned about a child at home with a temperature of 104° at 10 o'clock at night be able to call their general practitioner in the knowledge that he would come around within a hour or so, be somewhat reassuring and deal with the problem.

Now, people will have initially to call NHS Direct. They will then be redirected to a call centre in Dorset where a nurse will speak to them. The nurse will assess the problem and, if necessary, will suggest that the patient should visit a treatment centre, which could be anything up to 40 miles away from where they live. If the patient thinks the problem is serious and says, "I'd really like to see a doctor", the nurse is likely to say, "If it is that serious, we will call an ambulance for you." No longer will doctors be available to visit patients out of hours anywhere in the county of Dorset. When I suggested that that was a serious deterioration in service, I received the reply, "Of course, people have been abusing the service." Well, so be it: that is just one example.

A month ago, a gentleman who had been diagnosed with prostate cancer visited my surgery. The PCT had funded a visit to a specialist centre at the Royal Surrey county hospital, which is some distance away, and he had to make his arrangements to get there. The specialist recommended a certain treatment for my constituent's prostate cancer, and he went home, expecting to be sent details of an appointment for it. Instead, he got a phone call from his doctor, saying that North Dorset PCT would not pay for it. I took up the case with the PCT and got the same answer.

Lo and behold, another man with the same condition came to my surgery last week having been through the same cruel exercise. He had been sent to a centre of excellence for prostate cancer treatment and a treatment was recommended, but his PCT would not provide the money for it. When we told the PCT that a number of patients in Dorset had received the treatment, it said that the first patient had been given it by mistake because the hospital had not realised that the PCT would not pay. In the case of the second patient, we were told, "Ah yes, but he was under a different PCT in Dorset." If that is not postcode prescribing, I do not know what is.

[Mr. Robert Walter]

This morning—to add insult to injury—I received an e-mail from a lady whose family has a record of cancer. She said that she wanted a mammogram so that she could be reassured, but the PCT will not pay for one because she is 64 years old, so she will pay for one herself simply to get that reassurance. If that is what the Secretary of State calls equality of access, it has a very hollow ring to it.

I should also like to take a more global view of the Budget. I listened to the Chancellor and read the Red Book, and it was interesting to compare what they said with what appeared in the report on the British economy produced only this month by the International Monetary Fund. I have somewhat greater confidence in the IMF's assessment of the British economy than in the Chancellor's, and its executive board assessment of the UK said:

"Directors, however, noted that the buoyancy of domestic consumption has also been fuelled by robust increases in house prices and household debt, which has increased uncertainty on future developments . . . Directors stressed that the possibility of a hard landing in house prices and consumption cannot be ruled out particularly given uncertainties about the distribution of household assets and liabilities. To minimize these risks, prudent macroeconomic policies are needed . . . Noting the widening of the fiscal deficit . . . over the last three years, Directors concurred that the fiscal deficit needs to decline in the period ahead in order to observe the fiscal rules, strengthen fiscal fundamentals, and support monetary policy during the cyclical upswing. However, many Directors recommended a somewhat larger decline in the fiscal deficit in the medium term than that projected in the November pre-budget report."

That assessment was written before last week's Budget statement. In order to achieve fiscal balance, the directors believe that fiscal policy and private investment in the future

"should be more consistent with long-term fiscal requirements."

The assessment continues:

"Directors in general called for moderating the growth of spending in areas where current plans involve sharp increases, because this would limit . . . inefficiencies. . . . they recommended that the authorities"— that is the Treasury—

"take further measures to ensure that increased spending is delivering value for money."

The assessment adds:

"In contrast, staff"—

IMF staff—

"saw the deficit declining only modestly over the medium term without new measures, to 2¼ per cent. of GDP, some 1 percentage point above the authorities' projections. Thus, additional measures were likely to be needed. In particular, staff saw a case for moderating the government's ambitious spending plans, as a more gradual increase in public spending would reduce the risks of inefficiencies."

The staff believe

"the case for fiscal adjustment, and specifically for revising the government's ambitious spending plans, was strengthened by the risk that the latter could involve significant inefficiencies . . . .the evidence that increased spending was bearing commensurate fruits was still scarce".

That point has also been stressed in the most recent report on the United Kingdom from the Organisation for Economic Co-operation and Development. With staff views like that, I am not surprised that the Chancellor excluded himself from consideration as the next managing director of the IMF.

I want also to concentrate on overall public spending and the consequent borrowing. The main focus of this year's Budget was public spending and, in particular, the announcement of the Government's overall spending target for the next comprehensive spending review, covering the period to 2007–08. In real terms, total managed expenditure is set to rise by 4 per cent. in the next financial year and by an average of 3¼ per cent. over the following three years. As a result, the share of public spending in GDP terms is projected to increase to 41.9 per cent. in 2005. The allocation of that extra public spending will be settled in the summer comprehensive spending review.

The Treasury's projections suggest that that increase in spending is consistent with the Chancellor's famous golden rule, which says that, across the economic cycle, the Government will borrow only to finance investment. According to the Chancellor, the current Budget deficit is forecast to halve over the next year and to return to balance by 2006–07, with increasing surpluses expected thereafter. The Treasury, however, has already increased its forecast for overall public sector net borrowing in 2004–05 to £33 billion from the £31 billion in the pre-Budget report and the £24 billion in last year's Budget. Let us consider the Treasury's record; we should not forget its forecasts for the current year. The figure was £10 billion in the Budget of 2001, and it went up to £15 billion in the pre-Budget report of that year. In the 2002 Budget, the figure was £13 billion; in the pre-Budget report of 2002, it was £24 billion; in the Budget of 2003, it was £27 billion; in the pre-Budget report of 2003, it was £37.4 billion; and, in this Budget, the figure has reached £37.5 billion. That is above the Maastricht limit with which the Chancellor has proudly boasted compliance in the past. It is almost four times what he said it would be at the last election.

When considered by independent forecasters such as the ITEM Club, it is clear that the outlook is little changed in subsequent years, with net borrowing projected to decline to only £31 billion in 2005–06, £27 billion in 2006–07 and £23 billion by 2008–09. In its view, the Chancellor's borrowing projections remain over-optimistic. He continues to expect a very strong rebound in tax revenues—nearly 8 per cent. in each of the next two years and well ahead of economic growth in subsequent years.

The Government also assume substantial increases in the tax take, particularly from income tax, corporation tax and, to use their words, "other taxes and royalties". Nevertheless, the assumptions of revenue buoyancy continue to appear to me and to most forecasters as too optimistic. They imply a large rise in effective tax rates, which seems implausible in the absence of increases in actual tax rates, which we know will not happen before the election.

The Treasury's detailed forecasts show receipts from income tax and social security contributions rising by 7.3 per cent. in 2004–05. That is well ahead of the likely increase in household income. According to the Treasury, corporation tax receipts are forecast to increase by more than 21 per cent.—about twice as fast as company profits. The ITEM Club's forecasts suggest that overall Government revenues will be about £4 billion below Treasury projections in 2004–05, implying public sector net borrowing of £37 billion. The forecasts expect a revenue shortfall of £7 billion compared with Treasury projections in 2005–06, with net borrowing of £38 billion. That would mean that, even on his definition, the Chancellor would break his golden rule in 2005–06.

The National Institute of Economic and Social Research says that "most people would assess whether the Golden Rule has been met by adding up current surpluses and deficits in each year of the cycle in question".

However, the Government do not do it that way; they have their own way of looking at it. They have presented no justification for the approach that they adopt. As the institute says, they have "merely asserted that it has always done this. Obviously an error is not corrected simply by being of long-standing".

In conclusion, the Government are projected to borrow £37.5 billion this year, and nearly £155 billion over the following five years. All independent commentators say that that is too optimistic. I know that the strategy will be aided by the £15 billion in savings identified by the Government's efficiency expert, Peter Gershon, but the only other way to look at the issue is through further rises in taxes. The Budget confirms that the Chancellor wants further rises in taxes—there have been 60 since he became Chancellor—but that there will not be any further rises in tax rates until after the general election. Without prosperity, the Government will not be able to deliver without increasing taxation after the next election.

Mr. Crispin Blunt (Reigate) (Con): It is always a pleasure to follow my hon. Friend the Member for North Dorset (Mr. Walter), who gave us an elegant explanation of why the Chancellor's curriculum vitae has remained firmly in London rather than being dispatched to Washington. I hope later to pick up on the wider economic themes that he outlined.

First, however, I want to pick up the debate's health theme. I listened to the remarks of my right hon. Friend the Member for North-West Hampshire (Sir George Young) on expenditure in Hampshire. I want to lay claim to his speech and say simply, "Delete Hampshire; insert Surrey." The situation is precisely the same in Surrey, which is why there is a crisis in the public service provision of education and health in Surrey, given the relative expenditure in the south-east.

As I listened to the Secretary of State produce his litany of figures on the numbers of doctors and nurses, it seemed like a flashback to the 1980s when I watched the then Prime Minister—I watched from outside the Chamber—at Question Time reciting statistics in exactly the same fashion about how the health service was improving. Of course, it was improving then, because there was a real increase in health expenditure throughout the time of the Conservative Government. However, a remark made by the hon. Member for Luton, North (Mr. Hopkins) was especially important. He said that the output per unit of resource was quite remarkable during those years. The Conservative party's focus on reform in the health service ensured that the output per unit of resource was sustained throughout its period of government.

If the Government wonder why they have such a trifling increase in output per unit of resource despite throwing such an enormous amount at the health service, perhaps I can give one small explanation by citing an example that a junior doctor in my local hospital gave me. He pointed out that the Government claim that there are 10,000 more doctors than there were in 1997, of whom 5,000 are junior doctors. However, one should examine the number of hours for which those doctors work. Their hours have reduced from 72 hours a week in 1997 to 56 now. When the Government calculate the increased number of doctors, they calculate the number of whole-time equivalents on the basis of doctors working 40 hours a week. If we use the Government's methods to calculate whole-time equivalents by considering hours worked on the ground, we find that there are perhaps 1,447 fewer doctors in terms of hours worked. That explains why output has failed to keep up with the resources devoted. Of course, the figures calculated by the junior doctor are based on an assumption about the reduction in the number of hours worked by doctors, but it makes a fairly convincing case for why the Government face enormous difficulties in achieving a rise in output that will begin to measure up to the resources provided to the health service.

It was a huge treat to hear the eloquent testament of the former Secretary of State, the right hon. Member for Darlington (Mr. Milburn), to the property-owning democracy. A friend of mine, Mr. Peter Scrope, was the right hon. Gentleman's opponent in Darlington in 1997, and he would have enjoyed the philosophical journey that the right hon. Gentleman has undertaken over the past six or seven years.

Mr. David Ruffley (Bury St. Edmunds) (Con): A bit late.

Mr. Blunt: Better late than never. The right hon. Gentleman's eloquent testament to the need for reform and a property-owning democracy was extremely welcome, even though it came from the other side of the House.

I would have been more impressed by the statistics cited by the Secretary of State, and, indeed, the case presented by the right hon. Member for Darlington when he was Secretary of State, if the figures had not been subject to the most shocking manipulation. Targets themselves manipulate. They manipulate the behaviour of the health service as clinicians' priorities become secondary to the political priority of delivering targets.

Of course, the measurement of achievement of those targets is manipulated. We are all aware of waiting lists for waiting lists and of the redefinition of parts of accident and emergency departments as observation wards so that it can be claimed that people have been moved out of those departments. A deeply unhappy story from my constituency shows political manipulation in the health service through the amalgamation of Crawley and East Surrey hospitals into a single trust. Simply disgraceful decisions were made to serve political interests in the marginal Labour seat of Crawley. I have made this case many times, and I shall continue to remind the Government of it. The exercise not only put patients in the area served by the trust in danger by twisting clinical priorities to fit the political necessities of the hon. Member for Crawley (Laura Moffatt), but had a financial cost: some £50,000 a month of health money was taken away from the people of the United Kingdom because the subsidy to pay for the exercise came directly from the Department of Health. Additionally, there was a £200,000 study to investigate the possibility of building a new hospital at Pease Pottage, although it found that that would be economically impossible unless one wanted to bankrupt the entire health economy in east Surrey and north-west Sussex.

The right hon. Member for Darlington was correct about the Budget's political astuteness. In many ways, it did virtually nothing, and I suppose Conservative Members should be grateful when a Labour Chancellor does virtually nothing because that is usually much better than his doing anything at all. However, my hon. Friend the Member for North-East Bedfordshire (Alistair Burt) pointed out the totally non-Budget elements of the Budget—the acceptance of the Barker report and the appalling proposal that planning should take place at regional level. That represents a total demolition of local democracy because it will avoid responsibility being exercised by people on the ground who are closest to where planning decisions should be taken. They will not be able to decide, in the interests of people whom they represent, whether they want a liberal or restrictive planning process.

My hon. Friend the Member for North-East Bedfordshire referred to the excellent speech on Wednesday by our right hon. Friend the Member for Hitchin and Harpenden (Mr. Lilley). He talked about the length of the economic fuse in the hands of any Chancellor. The Chancellor claims credit for the current performance of the economy, but one should examine the trends that he inherited in 1997. Growth had been sustained since 1992–93 and the fiscal position was improving extremely rapidly. Inflation had been tamed—we had delivered inflation of 2.5 per cent. in 1997—and unemployment was falling so fast that it made a complete mockery of Labour's policy to deal with youth unemployment. Its election manifesto contained a target of dealing with 250,000 young unemployed people, but by the time it got into office, 167,000 of them had already found work. We had a 10 per cent. savings rate, and our future pension provision for the people of the United Kingdom was the envy of the rest of Europe. We also had a high position in the competitiveness league in the developed world. The Chancellor received a golden economic inheritance that was built on work done in the economy, which to a degree had started in 1976 when the International Monetary Fund began to dictate economic policy to the previous Labour Government.

The Chancellor has gambled successfully on his growth forecasts over the past year or two. His growth forecast last year turned out to be a successful gamble. His Budget presents us with a growth forecast for the next two years of 3.25 per cent., which is well above the trend. Nearly 20 years ago, when I was stationed in Germany with the Army, I spent some of my quieter evenings at the casino in Bad Oeynhausen indulging in a little gambling. A friend and I had a little system. We went around the roulette tables to find a trend, which we would bet against. For an uncomfortably long time, we kept leaving the casino with more money than we went in with. Eventually, the probability of that trend continuing meant that we went back where we started.

My point is that trends end. To rely on a presentation of economic growth of 3.25 per cent. for the next two years and 2.75 per cent. for 2006 is a pretty serious gamble against an underlying position that has wholly changed since 1997. Public expenditure is set to rise by £120 million a year by 2007–08. Private debt has risen by 93 per cent. to nearly £1,000 billion since 1997. The private savings rate collapsed from 10 per cent. down to a lowly 3.3 per cent. a couple of years ago. It is now at 5 per cent. Our pension provision is worsening rapidly from the position inherited in 1997, when the UK was the second largest relative investor in countries as remotely connected to the UK as Mexico. That investment happened because there was an enormous amount of money, managed by the City of London, that would provide for the future pensions of the people of the UK.

On the television programme "If . . . The Generations Fall Out", to be shown, I think, on Wednesday, people speculate that our future pensioners will not be properly provided for and there will be a huge battle between their interests and those of the working population. That was simply not the case in 1997. The Chancellor has presided over a huge missed opportunity.

The scale of private debt and public debt is accelerating. The simple fact is that those trends are not sustainable. There will have to be a reckoning, which will come at the cost of economic growth. We will need a much tighter fiscal policy, which will mean tax rises and, quite probably, expenditure cuts from the plans presented in the Budget.

7.52 pm

Mr. Mark Hoban (Fareham) (Con): I note that I am the fifth consecutive Opposition Member to speak. I wonder why so few Labour Members are prepared to defend their record in a health debate.

I want to deal with three aspects of the Budget as they affect my constituents. The theme is clear: we should never underestimate the impact of Budget speeches on individual lives. A sweeping gesture by the Chancellor in the Chamber might generate favourable headlines on Budget day, but it could have a long-standing, negative impact on our constituents' lives.

The first aspect has its origins in the 2002 Budget, when the Chancellor announced a zero-rate ban for corporation tax. Ministers told us that that was to stimulate enterprise. It was based on the false, and perhaps naive, assumption that only limited companies were entrepreneurial. We know, however, that partnerships, sole traders and other unincorporated businesses are also entrepreneurial. Many commentators explained that the measure would encourage unincorporated businesses to incorporate to reduce their tax bill—many hon. Members also made that point. Indeed, I explained the problem both on the Floor of the House during the Budget debate and in the Finance Bill Committee.

The Paymaster General recognised what would happen, and I am grateful to Taxation for unearthing a quote from the debate in the 2002 Finance Bill Committee, in which she said:

"the underlying issue is whether the Government have struck the right balance between incentives to incorporate and to remain unincorporated . . . Surely small businesses will not look a gift horse in the mouth."—[Official Report, Standing Committee F, 16 May 2002; c. 116.]

Indeed, they did not. What was predicted at the time transpired. A flood of businesses wanted to incorporate to benefit from the lower tax bills that incorporation brought. It was the right thing to do. Who would pass up the opportunity to reduce a tax bill in such a straightforward way, particularly when invited to do so by the Paymaster General?

However, the increase in the number of incorporations led to the announcement last week of a 19 per cent. tax rate on profits distributed by small companies to minimise the tax benefit that owners of limited companies had, compared with those whose income from their businesses was liable to income tax. It was one of the Chancellor's six stealth taxes announced last Wednesday, taking the total from 60 to 66. It was obvious that that would happen. We knew that business would take advantage of that to reduce the tax bill and, as the Paymaster General said, no small business would look that gift horse in the mouth.

The Government should pay heed to a lesson: changes in the tax system have a behavioural impact. A tax system that is biased towards a particular type of economic activity or organisation will encourage people to move in that direction. The Government should not be surprised if that bias in the system is exploited by people taking advantage of it. Indeed, the further the tax system moves away from a neutral view on a type of economic activity or organisation, the more likely it is that businesses will take the opportunity to exploit that loophole and subvert the Government's objective. Indeed, how can businesses plan for the future if the Government can change their mind within two years about something as fundamental and important to business as changing the nature of taxation for small businesses?

The second aspect of the Budget that I want to touch on is the Lyons report on relocating civil servants out of London and the south-east. The Chancellor said that "the Government are accepting and will implement the Lyons Review for the relocation of civil service jobs. We will relocate out of Whitehall a total of 20,000 public sector jobs, creating new opportunities in the regions and nations of the United Kingdom."—[Official Report, 17 March 2004; Vol. 419, c. 328.]

The core of the Lyons report focuses on the additional costs incurred by Departments of being in London and the benefits of dispersal to the regions that gain the jobs. Tucked away towards the back of the report, in appendix A on page 101, is the suggestion that nearly 1,000 jobs in my constituency should be transferred to Wales. Those are jobs at the Office for National Statistics in Titchfield. I have to confess that I had not realised that Titchfield was part of Whitehall, as the Chancellor sees it. Clearly, there is a poor grasp of geography in the Treasury.

I accept that we need to make savings in the running costs of government—my right hon. Friend the shadow Chancellor has made that case so persuasively that even the Chancellor has tried to catch up—but I wonder whether the Minister can tell me the likely cost savings of the move. As I said, the Lyons report was clear about the cost of locating Departments in London, but it was less robust on the costs of locating them in the south-east. If we add to that the circumstances of the individual department of the ONS—the national pay rates for its employees and the lack of a supplement for working in Hampshire—it seems that there would be no cost savings to be gained from transferring employees from Titchfield to Wales. Indeed, the ONS owns the building in Titchfield, so no rental costs will be saved by moving the employees and that department to Wales.

It is hard to see what cost savings will be brought about by relocation. Has an assessment been made of the impact of such moves on the local economy? The Lyons report states:

"Dispersal of government jobs is likely to have positive effects for regional economies with direct spending for departments and their employees creating jobs in addition to those relocated . . . this additional impact ranged from neutral to one extra new job for every two moved."

If that is the case for regions gaining jobs, surely the reverse is true for those regions losing jobs. What assessment has the ONS made of the impact of a move to Wales on the 1,200 to 1,300 employees at Titchfield and what are their chances of finding alternative jobs in the area? Many of those who work in Titchfield are working mothers, for whom the prospect of moving to Wales may not be practical. There are a number of employees whose family arrangements are tied up with living in the area. I understand that no assessment has been made of the number of people who are prepared or able to move out of the area.

One reason that the ONS is such a popular employer in my constituency is the flexibility it allows to those who have particular care obligations to their families, whether that concerns an elderly relative or children. The Government's aim is to encourage more women to work, and to encourage more single mothers to find work to support their family, but moving that department away from Titchfield is likely significantly to affect many of my constituents who work for it. The Chancellor seemed very proud to be shifting those jobs to the regions and nations of Britain, and he welcomed the move in his Budget speech, but do not let him think that what he proposed is welcome in every household in our regions and nations.

I turn finally to a point that my hon. Friends the Members for Reigate (Mr. Blunt) and for North-East Bedfordshire (Alistair Burt) made about the Barker report, published on the same day as the Budget. The report was significant; it announced that between 70,000 and 120,000 houses should be built to tackle supply-side problems in the housing market. That is another aspect of the Budget that sounds dramatic; it creates a sense of a Chancellor able to conjure up new houses, but it has consequences for my constituents. I want to see more people able to afford their own home, but the Barker report seems to be about moderating the real growth in house prices, slightly restricting that growth by building additional houses. That approach is unlikely to develop the affordable housing that people in my constituency need.

My hon. Friends touched on some other, broader concerns. The Barker report recommended diluting the power that local councils can exercise over developments in their own area, by transferring more responsibility for planning to regional planning bodies. It states:

"Regional Planning Bodies and Regional Housing Boards should be merged to create single bodies responsible for managing regional housing markets, delivering the region's affordability target".

Miss Barker goes on to say:

"Even in the absence of elected regional assemblies, a streamlined institutional framework is possible and desirable."

If those proposals are accepted, the power of local authorities will be further diminished and the ways in which people in areas such as mine can hold their local councillors to account for planning decisions will be reduced.

The report also talks about land value. It says:

"Building on intensively farmed land would result in far smaller costs. These alternative land values are part of the framework within which the costs and benefits of housebuilding should be assessed."

It proposed:

"Moving towards an alternative approach, whereby land for development is assessed according to its relative value in society . . . including the implication that some Green Belt land should be re-designated."

There is no green-belt land in Fareham or south-east Hampshire, but there is some remaining farmland. If the value of that is further reduced to encourage development and to skew the cost-benefit ratio in favour of more development, we shall see a continuous stretch of development from Southampton to Portsmouth along the M27, all to achieve the goal of moderating the growth in house prices in the south-east.

Where is the infrastructure to support that additional housing? One of the biggest issues facing my constituents is the fact that the current infrastructure fails to meet the needs of the existing housing development in Fareham. Our schools, hospitals and roads are already threatened by planned development. Where will the resources come from to build new infrastructure? The main arterial routes in the area, the M27, A27 and A32, are already clogged with traffic. Only one NHS dentist in Fareham is accepting patients, and even he has a six-month waiting list. It is worth noting that when the Secretary of State for Health talked about increasing capacity throughout the health service, he did not mention dentistry.

Mr. Luff: A cavity.

Mr. Hoban: It was, as my hon. Friend says, a cavity in the Health Secretary's speech, but it causes people in my constituency a problem when they cannot find a dentist to meet their needs. The dentists with whom they are registered say that, because of the economics of dental practice, they can no longer accept NHS patients, so all patients are required to switch to private dental services. How much worse will those services become if more and more people are crowded into our area as a consequence of decisions by unaccountable and unelected regional planning and housing boards?

There is little cheer for my constituents in this Budget. The Chancellor is meddling yet again in the tax affairs of small companies, reversing some of the effects of the Budget of just two years ago. Jobs in Titchfield are being moved around the country as if they were a pile of chips being shunted across a roulette table by a croupier. More houses are being imposed on an area that cannot cope with the additional building already going on.

The Chancellor gives the impression that he thinks that the economy is like a machine: pull a lever, flick a switch here and open a valve there, and all will be well. He forgets at his peril that what he is playing with is not some theoretical model of the economy or a machine, but the lives of our constituents. He may welcome the headlines the day after the Budget, but the damage that he causes individuals and their families will last far longer than the glow of those headlines.

8.6 pm

Paul Farrelly (Newcastle-under-Lyme) (Lab): I am delighted to follow the hon. Member for Fareham (Mr. Hoban), not to defend the Budget, but to proclaim it and the opportunities that if offers the NHS, not least in my constituency and industrial north Staffordshire as a whole.

This is the eighth Budget under a Labour Government, though only the third that I, as a new Member, have had the pleasure of witnessing from these Benches. I remember, years ago, this time of year provoking pain, not pleasure—so much so that in the 1980s and early 1990s I used to go out of my way to stay out of the way, to avoid listening to news of tax cuts for the privileged few and yet more public service cuts affecting the neediest. Indeed, under 18 years of Conservative government, there was only one Budget that I can loosely associate with improving the health of the nation, or at least a tiny, precious part of it. That was when Nigel Lawson stuck 10p on the price of a packet of fags and my granddad, Tom King, a 40-plus-a-day man since he served in the trenches, said that he had had enough of those damned Tories, as he put it, and never lit up a cigarette again.

What a difference we have seen in our NHS since 1997, the year that my granddad died. By 2007–08, spending on health care will be more than double what it was a decade ago. That is an achievement that I wish my granddad had lived to see. Let us be clear what that increased investment really means. It does not just mean massive figures plucked out of the air; it means, by 2008, 80,000 more nurses than in 1997, 25,000 more doctors and the biggest hospital-building programme ever. It means that the NHS is safe in Labour's hands.

What of the Opposition? Have they learned the lessons of 1997 and 2001? They have certainly learned, from my right hon. Friend the Chancellor, to talk the talk—sticking, they say, to our plans for health for two years. However, when one puts those plans under a microscope, one finds that the reality is different. The shadow Secretary of State for Health, for example, says that he is committed to free access to health services, based on need and not on the ability to pay. How does he square that with his so-called "patients passports"? Those self-same patients passports will, to quote him,

"allow them to take a proportion of the cost of NHS treatment to offset the cost of independent treatment, which can then be topped-up at the patient's own expense."

How does that make for free and equal access to health care? I noticed that he could not, or would not, answer the Secretary of State's intervention earlier, and no wonder. He certainly has a health plan. It is a plan to give those who can already afford to go private an even bigger helping hand, and it is a pauper's plan for the rest of the population and the NHS.

Under Labour, the NHS is certainly making progress; otherwise the Conservative party would not want to match our spending. Sadly, though, we have not yet found a cure for forgetfulness or the schizophrenic double-speak afflicting Opposition Front-Bench Members.

Mr. David Wilshire (Spelthorne) (Con): If the hon. Gentleman is so certain that the NHS is safe in his Government's hands, can he tell me why the Government are ordering my local primary care trust to cut spending by £17 million next year?

Paul Farrelly: Clearly, I cannot speak about the financial management of the PCT in the hon. Gentleman's area, but I can speak about the bewilderment that most of the population feels about the Conservatives' fixation with vouchers—now called "passports".

I shall speak about the successes and the continuing challenges in the NHS in north Staffordshire—an area with some of the worst and most complex health needs in the country. For decades, one of the biggest issues in our area has been hospital facilities that are housed on different sites in outdated, crumbling Victorian buildings. That is not good for patients or for staff, and it is certainly not good enough for the NHS in the 20th century, let alone the 21st. Patients who needed intensive care sometimes faced journeys of dozens of miles. The press labelled Stoke-on-Trent "the sick city". More than 20,000 people signed petitions crying out for a new hospital to replace the Victorian city general in Stoke-on-Trent and the North Staffordshire royal infirmary on a single site. They did not sign for patients passports, or visas, or vouchers; they signed for a new hospital on their doorstep, because if they or their families or friends were ill, they wanted to be treated as close to home as possible.

If we are to give patients better treatment—to give them that choice—we need to invest in more and modern capacity on their doorstep, which is precisely what Labour is doing in north Staffordshire. Under the Labour Government, work has started on a brand-new £350 million acute hospital on the site of the city general. Gone will be the days when patients were shuttled back and forth on trolleys and in ambulances between the royal infirmary and the wards of the city general. In its place, there will be a super-hospital with a state-of-the-art diagnostic centre, an accident unit, new intermediate care beds and modern wards with the best of facilities for the modern age. That hospital is just one of 114 new hospital developments commissioned since 1997.

Labour's ambitions in north Staffordshire do not stop there. As part of the £350 million project, there will be a brand-new community hospital on the crumbling Haywood and Stanfield sites in north Stoke. Before I entered Parliament in 2001, I chaired the north Staffordshire "Elderly Care for All" campaign, fighting for better elderly care locally. I remember only too vividly visiting experts describing those decaying hospitals as the worst that they had ever seen. Now, finally, after many years of flimsy promises, north Stoke is getting its own brand-new community hospital. In my constituency, Newcastle-under-Lyme, our local community hospital at Bradwell is expanding and developing to offer services such as minor surgery to people in the surrounding areas of Bradwell, Chesterton and Kidsgrove. Such services will complement those offered by acute hospitals and take the pressure off them.

We are not stopping there. We want to invest in primary care—in more local health care on the doorstep—to make sure that there is less need for people to go into hospital at all. In Newcastle-under-Lyme alone, within the north Staffordshire NHS LIFT—local improvement finance trust—programme, work is forging ahead on a brand-new £3 million health centre in Cross Heath, which is among the most deprived 10 per cent. of wards in the country. A brand-new £2 million-plus health centre is planned for Audley, serving the former mining villages in that area. In Clayton, work has started on a £1 million extension of the Kingsbridge health centre, and in the town centre, among other developments, a brand-new GP surgery opened earlier this month. Those are not merely figures plucked out of the air—£1 million in the Budget delivered in London here, another £1 million there. They are real achievements, which my constituents notice and which will improve their lives.

With our new primary care trust in Newcastle-under-Lyme, we are getting improvements just where we need them. I am always suspicious of continuous organisation change: often it is change for change's sake, or demoralising to NHS staff. However, in my constituency, I appreciate the closer working relationship with my local PCT than used to be possible with the old, more remote health authority. My local councillors appreciate that too. If the House will indulge me, as the first Labour speaker after several Opposition speakers, I shall name them: they include John and Gill Williams and Sylvia Butler in Cross Heath, and my good friend Eddie Boden, chairman of Staffordshire county council, who lives in Audley. Working with the PCT, they have played major roles in the improvements to primary care achieved as a result of the LIFT programme coming into their areas.

Despite all those advances, not everything in the garden is rosy. More NHS dentists are needed in my locality, as they are across the country. In specialist services, to give just one example, we in Newcastle and north Staffordshire urgently need to tackle the lack of any proper provision for diagnosis and support for people affected by autism or Asperger's syndrome, starting with kids of pre-school age and continuing through to give schoolchildren and adults the support that they need.

Across the board, we need to deliver all those better facilities, and more, because of the desperate health needs of the people of north Staffordshire. For years, the area depended on coal mining and pottery making—hard physical jobs, done in dirty, dusty and dangerous conditions. Given that the local diet was not the best, it is no wonder that under Labour the Potteries qualified for more investment as a health action zone. To deliver, we must attract and retain the extra doctors, nurses and consultants that Labour's policies and investment in the NHS are already generating. Too often in the past, north Staffordshire and other industrial areas have found it hard to fill vacancies, simply because in our area each job imposes greater demands on each professional than in wealthier, leafier areas.

Under Labour, the investment to tackle health inequalities is being made—nowhere more so than in the new medical school at Keele university in Newcastle-under-Lyme, which was given the green light by my right hon. Friend the Member for Barrow and Furness (Mr. Hutton) shortly after he became a Minister of State at the Department of Health in 1999. He is to visit Chesterton in my constituency next month: he will always be welcome there, and I hope that he will find time to open our new town centre practice. Our first medical students are now training at Keele and what has proudly become the University hospital of North Staffordshire. By 2009, Keele medical school will be hosting its full complement of 610 medical students. It is therefore already playing its full part in training extra new doctors for the country as a whole, and local people hope that many will choose to stay in north Staffordshire and help us to overcome our historical difficulties of recruitment.

Labour's investment in north Staffordshire's local NHS, which the Budget continues, is playing a vital role in a much bigger vision of the regeneration of the area as a whole. As well as playing host to a new medical school, Keele university is developing a science park, attracting businesses involved in medical technology and building what is known in the trade as a medical cluster. It is now the home of cutting-edge biotechnology firms such as Biocomposites—a company that develops synthetic devices for tissue regeneration. I was delighted to play a small part in its decision to relocate to Keele, rather than go to Florida or elsewhere overseas.

The new hospital and other health and regeneration initiatives such as housing market renewal provide opportunities to exploit and develop construction skills. Our regional development agency, Advantage West Midlands, has just backed a new construction skills centre of excellence in north Staffordshire. In the context of regeneration, we are looking closely at the Chancellor's plans to relocate Government agencies to the regions. Envious eyes are being cast over the National Institute for Clinical Excellence and health and safety bodies.

In our local NHS, we can continue to implement 21st-century health care only with the sort of investment that was confirmed by the Chancellor last week: a 7 per cent.-plus real-terms increase in resources each year to 2008. Patients want that investment. They do not want passports, visas or vouchers; they want investment in our NHS—investment that makes our NHS safe and that we can only trust a Labour Government to make.

8.18 pm

Mr. David Ruffley (Bury St. Edmunds) (Con): The Chancellor wanted this to be viewed as a political Budget, setting the battleground for the next general election. I welcome that view of the Budget, because it gives the Conservatives the opportunity to fight on our own ground, where the Chancellor of the Exchequer is naturally far weaker.

I say that for three reasons. First, the Chancellor does not have a reputation for being an efficient and proficient tackler of waste; nor is he good at delivering efficiency savings. For seven years he has been telling the country how wisely and prudently he has been spending public money. In his comprehensive spending reviews in 1998, 2000 and 2002, he invited us to believe that extra money would be tied to greater efficiency. He invited us to believe also that through his public service agreement system, Departments that delivered on targets would be rewarded and that Departments that did not succeed in hitting targets would be penalised. None of that ever happened; it was for the birds. Instead, there has been a 50 per cent. increase in the cost of running central Government Departments since the Chancellor came to office. That amounts to spending about £7 billion extra and meant last year that an additional 511 civil servants were employed every week. After seven years, and after all the fiddling and target setting, the Chancellor has announced that there will not be 130 PSAs. There will be fewer, and they will be measuring outcomes rather than outputs and inputs. He will be abolishing about 500 service delivery agreements.

On top of all that, we are given more promises, pledges and talk in the Budget about how there will be a substantial decrease in bureaucracy. We are told that there will be more proportionate inspection, greater incentives for better performance, and more local autonomy and flexibility. My verdict is that we have heard it all before from the Chancellor, for every year for seven years. After seven years of no action but plenty of talk, why should the country believe that he will be any more effective in future?

Conveniently, but I fear belatedly, Sir Peter Gershon has trotted along at the Chancellor's behest. He has told us that he can find efficiency savings of £20 billion a year by 2008. We are invited to believe that much of that can be done by getting rid of 40,000 civil servants—just for starters—in the Department for Work and Pensions and the Revenue and Excise departments. As most observers have said, that will probably account for £1.5 billion, so Sir Peter is a long way shy of the £20 billion that he noisily advertises.

As The Economist pointed out this week, the reality is that deep structural reform is needed for the Chancellor and Sir Peter Gershon to get anywhere near savings of £20 billion by 2008. There is a need for deep structural reform that only the Conservative party is advocating and explaining in detail. Answer comes there none from the Labour Benches on serious reform in the health service and serious structural reform in the Department for Education and Skills.

On efficiency savings and waste cutting, I like the way in which the Chancellor has come on to our ground. In principle, he has conceded that we have been right all along. However, he has done something more in his Budget by shooting himself in the political foot. He will never be able to say again between now and the next election that cutting waste means a cut in front-line services. That is an argument that he wanted to push against the official Opposition. He is now unable to do that because he has conceded, on his own logic, that efficiency savings mean that front-line services can be protected. That has been our argument all along.

My second reason for arguing that there is a weakness in the Chancellor's political thinking, as expressed in the Budget, is that at the next election, the British public will be asking a basic question. They will want to know whether, for all the money that has been put into our important core public services, there has been a material improvement so that they can say, "Our local schools, hospitals, support services for pensioners and the local police force are better." I do not think that they will be able to answer that question in the affirmative.

We have seen a 22 per cent. increase in truanting in our state education system. The decline in crime began in 1993 when my right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Folkestone and Hythe (Mr. Howard), who is now the Leader of the Opposition, became the Home Secretary. That decline stopped in 2001 and it is now plateauing. In certain parts of the crime figures—for example, violent crime—we have seen some of the greatest hikes for a long time. Gun crime has doubled since 1997. Overall, the law and order story is not a good one.

Particular attention should be drawn to health. There should be more beds than administrators. When we left office in 1997, senior managers, administrators and estate staff numbered 196,700. In 2001, there were 224,030. That increase means that although the ratio of administrative staff to beds was 0:9 when the Conservative Government left office, it is now 1:1.

What about waiting lists? Some of the longest waiting times have been reduced. The more telling figures about waiting times for all other operations—the mean and median waiting times—tell a story of NHS decline. During 1999 to 2000, the mean waiting time in days was 90. For 2000–03, it was 99. The median figure for those same two years was 43 and 49 respectively. Those statistics do not come from Conservative central office; they are not even from the National Audit Office. They come from the Department of Health hospital episodes statistics table 2 from 1999 to 2003.

Probably most Members receive more mail about health than anything else. Despite the 37.5 per cent. increase in funding of the NHS, hospital activity based on finished consultant episodes—completed operations—has risen by only 4.8 per cent. The source of that figure is the Department of Health hospital episodes statistics from 1999 to 2002. Hospital admissions have increased by an average of only 1.9 per cent. annually from 1999 to 2002. Incidentally, that is less than the 2.9 per cent. annual increase from 1991 to 1999.

The OECD has reinforced claims that extra NHS funding has not been spent as well as it should have been. It added:

> "Productivity seems to have declined as the growth in the number of doctors, nurses, hospital buildings and equipment have (not yet) been fully reflected in a growing numbers of treatments. In fact, growth in the volume of health care output has slowed down compared to the first half of the 1990s."

That is because, as we have argued, the structures are not right and the Chancellor must take personal responsibility for the pace of radical health reform in the NHS. He has frustrated serious reform based on the foundation hospital model because, let us face it, he is pandering—that is the right word—to the Labour movement. He thinks that if he argues for a publicly funded health service with no additional private sector involvement—or as little as possible—he will curry favour with his client groups. He is responsible for slowing down the radical reform that the NHS desperately needs.

Thirdly, the Budget has great political weaknesses because of its provisions on taxation. The Red Book confirms the Chancellor's tax addiction. By 2008 the tax burden will be 38.3 per cent.—the highest for just over 20 years. We have had 66 tax rises since the Chancellor took office, and the tax take under his chancellorship is up 50 per cent. in cash terms, which is equivalent to about £5,000 more tax per household since 1997. However, the British public should worry about the path of taxation, as he has indulged in a borrowing binge. His borrowing figures are four times higher than he predicted at the last election. The Institute for Fiscal Studies, the National Institute of Economic and Social Research and The Economist all predict that he will break his golden rule at the start of the next economic cycle which, conveniently, will occur in spring 2006, after the likely date of the election. They quantify the gap as at least £10 billion a year, and it must be plugged with either spending cuts or tax increases, or a mixture of the two. It is more likely that there will be £10 billion-worth of tax increases.

During the last election campaign, the Chancellor was Trappist-like in his refusal to talk about his intentions on tax. After he won that election, however, he introduced hikes in national insurance, thus breaching his promise not to break the upper earnings limit. If the Chancellor of the Exchequer is confident in the Budget that his numbers add up, that he will not break the golden rule at the start of the next economic cycle in spring 2006 and that he will not have to raise taxes, the Financial Secretary and the Economic Secretary, who are in the Chamber tonight, will have no difficulty in giving the House and the country a guarantee that there will be no tax rises and that, because of the Budget judgment, there is no need to raise taxes next year or the year after. If they will not do so, the public and the press will be entitled to recall that the Chancellor has form—and previous. He goes to the electorate denying that he has any intention of putting up tax, but after the election does precisely that. When they have worked out that he has form—and previous—they will be entitled to conclude that a vote for Labour is indeed a vote for third-term tax increases.

8.32 pm

Mr. Peter Luff (Mid-Worcestershire) (Con): Ultimately, our debate on the Budget raises a fundamental question—who knows best how to spend our money, the Chancellor or the people, the taxpayer or the tax raiser? In their hearts, most people know the answer to that question. The Chancellor could do himself a great service by listening to the arguments that have been made. He started badly in the debate on Wednesday, as he ignored the two speeches that followed his statement, and chatted to his friend, the Prime Minister, on the Front Bench. He would have done well to listen to those speeches, because in their different ways they were important contributions. He should listen to independent commentators such as the ITEM Club, which today made confident predictions about the black hole and a third-term Labour tax rise, about which my hon. Friend the Member for Bury St. Edmunds (Mr. Ruffley) has rightly spoken. The British people believe that those third-term tax rises are inevitable, and the Chancellor should listen to them, as opinion polls show.

The 2005 election, assuming that that is when it takes place, may be a bad one to win, because of the serious economic problems that the Chancellor of the Exchequer will leave his successor. He, of course, hopes that someone else will succeed him as Chancellor, as he hopes to be Prime Minister then. He hopes that he can blame the new Chancellor for problems of his creation. We have to be honest about the fact that the economy is doing fairly well at present—I do not think that anyone would argue against that. There are looming issues, such as the trade deficit and the appalling savings ratio, which have been mentioned throughout our debate. The truth, however, is that employment is pretty good and people are fairly comfortable. The Chancellor has achieved that with two good decisions and two pieces of good luck. The first of the two good decisions was independence for the Bank of England, which sent a powerful signal to the financial markets about his seriousness of purpose. The other decision, or rather non-decision, was not going into the single European currency—a wise course of action, and I hope that the Chancellor continues to prevail in the argument with the Prime Minister on that.

The Chancellor has had a couple of bits of good luck, though. One relatively minor but nevertheless significant piece of good luck was the enormous revenues that came from the 3G licence sale, for example, which made a huge contribution to bringing down the national debt. The reduction in the national debt owes a lot to that bit of good luck that fell the Chancellor's way. The other piece of good luck is the one that Labour Members always snigger at when it is mentioned—the golden economic heritage that he had when he took over as Chancellor. [Interruption.] I think I heard a few mumbles of discontent from the Labour Benches.

If one looks at the Red Book, as I have done in some detail, one does not have to be a statistician to look at the graph on page 21 showing the inflation statistics and to realise that inflation has been pretty stable since mid-1993, which is a good long time before the 1997 general election. Then there is the matter of growth. The Chancellor allowed himself a few jokes in his Budget speech on Wednesday. He rather wittily corrected himself and said that he had accidentally misled the House. The period of sustained growth was the longest not for 100 years, but for 200 years. He apologised for that omission. What he did not say is where that period began.

The Red Book tells us on page 15

"with GDP now having grown for 46 consecutive quarters".

Let us count back the quarters. Four of them in 2003, four of them in 2002, four of them in 2001, four of them in 2000, four of them in 1999, four of them in 1998 and the first couple, ahead of the Labour party's victory in the 1997 election, in 1997. That makes 27 quarters under Labour's stewardship. Then, of course, there is one in 1997 for the Conservative Government, another four in 1996, four in 1995, four in 1994, four in 1993 and a couple in 1992, making 19 quarters on our watch. Yes, it is true that there have been 46 consecutive quarters of growth, but the credit for that belongs to previous Conservative Chancellors of the Exchequer.

The present Chancellor's achievement is, for once, not to mess that up, and for that he deserves some limited congratulations. Although he may not be ruining it, there are some worrying signs. The success that he boasts about so confidently from the Dispatch Box is much more limited in reality. The truth is that if one throws money at a problem, some of it will stick and a bit of the problem will get better, but for the amount of money that is being thrown at the problems of this country, things have not got as much better as they ought to have got. And money has been thrown.

There are guiding lines in the Red Book. On page 189, with reference to income tax, we are told:

"The starting and basic rate limits are increased in line with statutory indexation and there are no changes to the income tax rates."

That sounds tremendously reassuring, but table C8 on page 256 shows that over the period 2002–03 to 2004–05 income tax take by the Chancellor will have gone up by 13.5 per cent., social security contributions by 20.3 per cent., value added tax by 15 per cent., fuel duties by 10.5 per cent., council tax by 18 per cent. and total current receipts by nearly 15 per cent. He has taken a huge amount more of our money from us. Since he became Chancellor he has taken in excess of £1,500 more for every man, woman and child in the country. With that kind of extra money, he should be able to do a better job.

The tragedy is—I am indebted to Ruth Lea in her excellent pamphlet, "The Price of the Profligate Chancellor", for drawing my attention to this—that the people who are paying the highest price for that are not the rich, nor those on middle incomes, but the poor. She draws my attention to a table derived from the work of the Office for National Statistics, which shows that while the percentage of gross income paid in tax is 35.6 per cent. on average, for the poorest quintile—the bottom 20 per cent—it is 42.1 per cent. Increased taxes hurt the poor. That is a message that the Chancellor needs to learn. He has certainly taxed them.

We have seen a steady growth in taxation as a percentage of GDP, and we have seen the complete and abysmal failure of the Chancellor to predict his borrowing. We are told on page 3 of the Red Book at paragraph 1.13, and it is repeated verbatim at paragraph 2.38 because the Chancellor is so fond of this:

"The estimated 2003–04 outturn for the public sector current budget shows a deficit of £21.3 billion compared with projected deficits of £19.3 billion and £8.4 billion in the 2003 Pre-Budget Report", and so on, with the Chancellor appearing to be quite confident about the relative increases in borrowing.

Again, I am indebted to Ruth Lea for showing us the truth about those borrowing figures. Actually, the increase in the Chancellor's own predictions has been shameful. In the 2002 Budget, he said that public sector net borrowing for 2002 would be £11 billion, but we now learn that it worked out at £22.9 billion—an increase of £11.9 billion. For 2003, the figure has moved from £13 billion to £37.5 billion, so his error is £24.5 billion. For 2004, he has already increased his estimate from £13 billion to £33 billion—an increase of £20 billion. For 2005 and 2006, he is confidently predicting modest reductions in net borrowing. Let us see what happens, as the trend is far from encouraging.

Let us turn to spending. On page 9 of the Red Book, we read:

"The Government's strategy is to deliver improvements in public services through sustained investment and reform to ensure that taxpayers receive value for money."

We are all in favour of taxpayers receiving value for money, but in an extremely unconvincing performance at the start of the debate, the Secretary of State for Health failed to answer the charge that that simply has not happened in the health sector. The only period for which I have figures is 1996 to 2001. In that period, the number of whole-time equivalents for managers in the national health service rose by 15.5 per cent., while the number of whole-time equivalents for nurses, midwives and health visiting staff rose by 7.3 per cent. In other words, the growth in managers was running at twice the rate of the growth in front-line health professionals. I think that that should worry the Government.

The Chancellor is fond of talking about enormous gains in employment. If we look at the figures, we see that between September 2002 and September 2003, there was an increase of 153,000 people in the public sector and of 105,000 in construction. To be fair, much of that increase is coming from capital investment, but largely, although not exclusively, it is PFI investment that is again funded by the Chancellor. In fact, 258,000 of the jobs are public sector jobs, while the number of manufacturing jobs fell by 103,000 in one year.

Paul Farrelly: The hon. Gentleman is being very forensic, but perhaps he is being a touch forgetful. Will he explain to the House whether the 1987 stock market crash, the years of negative equity, withdrawal from the European exchange rate mechanism and the years of imprudently counting one-off privatisation proceeds as negative Government expenditure were, to pick up his theme, bad luck, accidents or acts of God? Or were they were simply bad policy by a previous Conservative Government?

Mr. Luff: The hon. Gentleman leads me into a whole new speech that I would dearly like to make, destroying the analysis that he has just offered the House. In essence, the current Chancellor has faced relatively benign economic situations nationally by comparison with those faced by previous Chancellors. I know that the hon. Gentleman was not in the House at the time, but if he would care to remember some of the circumstances that the last Conservative Government faced, including the consequences of German reunification in particular, he would paint a very different picture. As for fiddling statistics, this Chancellor's treatment of issues such as PFI debt for the tube, and tax credits, which count as negative income tax, is fiddling statistics on a spectacular scale.

Paul Farrelly rose—

Mr. Luff: I shall happily give way a second time.

Paul Farrelly: If we indeed inherited a golden inheritance, to use the hon. Gentleman's own words, has he ever thought that after 1993, things simply could not have got any worse?

Mr. Luff: That is the voice of a man who believes his own propaganda—something that I try very hard not to do. I shall happily take the hon. Gentleman to the bar after this debate, sit down and show him the economic series. The fact is that everything started getting better from 1993. Every economic series that one looks at shows that plain, simple and straightforward fact. It would do the House a great service if all Labour Members—I do not blame the hon. Gentleman in particular, as he is following a lead given him by people such as his Prime Minister and Chancellor—looked at the facts and saw what actually happened. If he did so, he would see just how wrong he was in his assertion and its implications.

Before that intervention, I was discussing public sector employment and productivity. The previous speaker, my hon. Friend the Member for Bury St. Edmunds (Mr. Ruffley), gave us a fine analysis of productivity in the health sector, and again, the available statistics, which come from the Office for National Statistics publication on economic trends from July last year, only go up to 2001. Intriguingly, they show roughly no change in public sector productivity in 1996; a 1 per cent. improvement in 1997; and—those were years of austerity in public expenditure—another 1 per cent. improvement in 1998. As we get into the years in which the Chancellor increased spending, however, productivity fell by 2 per cent. in 1999; by 1 per cent. in 2000; and by 2 per cent. in 2001. It should surprise no one that if money is thrown at a system faster than the system can absorb it, the system will not spend it wisely.

The Chancellor's Budget strategy raises some important questions. He is spending to the hilt and hoping to get away with it, and that is having some strange consequences at a local level in my constituency. I shall highlight the example of education spending—I unreservedly welcome the increased capital expenditure on schools in my constituency. On Friday last week, I opened a new classroom—the increased capital expenditure is clearly having a beneficial effect and I do not pretend that it is not.

Revenue expenditure is sadly a big issue in Worcestershire, however. By increasing education expenditure in real terms, the Chancellor is bizarrely creating a worse problem for Worcestershire schools, which are falling behind their neighbours because of the rigged funding formula. Straight percentage increases in expenditure on schools means that Worcestershire schools will fall relatively further behind because of the iron law of compound interest. I urge Treasury Ministers to talk to their ministerial colleagues in the Office of the Deputy Prime Minister and say, "If we are putting extra money into schools, we must ensure that it is spent fairly across the country; otherwise anomalies between local education authorities will grow, with very serious consequences for the children in the local education authorities left behind."

The Red Book—I do not know why it is called that because it is a white book—is the Chancellor's personal manifesto. Governments used to publish about one third of its contents; the other two thirds is public relations, spin and puff. The Chancellor talks glowingly about jobcentres on page 84 and about the role of primary care trusts in helping to address local need on page 150. I repeat my plea, which I have already made twice in this Chamber and intend to make again tomorrow at Health questions, for the Government to examine the consequences of not giving true independence to primary care trusts but running them from the centre, through strategic health authorities, while claiming that they are locally organised.

That lack of independence has destroyed eight important health projects in south Worcestershire. One such project at Droitwich Spa in my constituency was intended to include a major new Jobcentre Plus, a police facility, a county council facility, a district council facility, a voluntary facility and a new health centre. Arbitrary changes to funding rules mean that we will not get that investment and that the whole project is at risk, which is completely contrary to the Red Book.

We often hear Labour Members discussing our plans for Home Office expenditure, but I am not too impressed by the Government's plans for Home Office expenditure. Some 300 additional police officers are coming on stream this year in the West Mercia constabulary area, which is welcome. However, who has paid for them? Not the Home Secretary or the taxpayer nationally, but the council tax payer, through phenomenal increases in the police precept. The trouble is that those phenomenal increases are building huge resentment not against the Government—as they should do—but against the police. They lead people to ask, "Why am I not getting the police service I expect for the money that I am being forced to pay?" I urge Ministers to examine that question seriously. There have been 33 per cent. and 15 per cent. increases year on year, and the overall increase in the West Mercia constabulary's precept since the Government came to power is nine times the rate of inflation, which is simply unsustainable and creates problems for the management of the police.

In a final footnote to my speech, I am disappointed to see the Chancellor's disclosure on page 116 of the Red Book that he wants to give orphan assets, which are unclaimed assets in banks, building societies and—now we learn—life assurance companies, to charity. The victims of failed occupational pension schemes should have first claim on those assets, which would address a real and urgent need caused by a problem that was not of people's own making and which the Government are morally obliged to do something about. The obvious way to do it is through the unclaimed assets, but the Government are turning their back on that route. That is distressing.

I trust the people of this country to spend their money better than the Chancellor of the Exchequer, and I look forward to taking that battle to the people in an imminent general election.

8.50 pm

Mr. David Wilshire (Spelthorne) (Con): May I start, Mr. Deputy Speaker, by apologising to the House? When I originally put in to speak, I thought that I could be present throughout the debate, but my duties as an Opposition Whip made life difficult, as I explained to Mr. Speaker earlier. I am sorry not to have heard all the speeches.

Every time I hear the Chancellor or the Secretary of State for Health, I am reminded how desperately out of touch with reality they are. As my hon. Friend the Member for Mid-Worcestershire (Mr. Luff) said, they have come to believe their own propaganda. If everything is so wonderful in the NHS, why do my constituents face £17 million-worth of cuts year on year at the Government's insistence? If the NHS is safe in the hands of this Labour Government, why are they trying to privatise part of my local hospital? While Ministers stand at the Dispatch Box and spin away about an NHS utopia, my constituents know different—they know the truth.

I want to tell the House about the reality of the NHS in my part of Middlesex. My local general hospital, Ashford, started as a workhouse. In 1987, when I became the local MP, it was mainly a collection of wartime temporary prefabs. During the time of the last Conservative Government, it was completely rebuilt. Since 1997, it has suffered cut after cut. In 2000, this Government axed its accident and emergency department, scrapped all its intensive care beds, and stopped in-patient paediatric services. Now, they are at it again. This year, they want to scrap the emergency department, which they gave us when they axed the A and E; scrap all the high-dependency beds, as well as the intensive care beds; and close all 150 medical and acute surgical beds. If they have their way, Ashford hospital will have fewer beds than when it was a workhouse, and my constituents will be left with a first-aid post by day and a telephone to ring for a GP deputising service at night. The reality of the NHS in Spelthorne is not what the Chancellor's spin claims it to be. Small wonder that a former A and E consultant at Ashford said of the cuts that the Government have been making, "People will suffer and some will die."

That is the reality of what this Government are doing to the NHS in my constituency. The way in which they treat the NHS in Surrey is a downright disgrace. It is underfunded so that money can go to Labour cronies, inadequate allowances are made for the additional costs of providing services in the south-east, and the longevity of my constituents is completely ignored when it comes to working out the demands on services. Listening to the Chancellor last week, one would have thought that the Government would do something to help; but not a bit of it. Their response to the problems in my constituency is to demand more and more cuts.

If I look back, I can see that the rot set in when the Ashford trust was merged with the St. Peter's trust. That was an attempt to save money by shifting services out of Ashford and into St. Peter's. The result was predictable:

St. Peter's could not cope. In due course, a damning National Institute for Clinical Excellence report into its maternity services produced another crisis.

All that led to something else: no stars when the Government produced their first little league table. The Government brought that on themselves. What did they do? They sacked the chairman and the chief executive and had the bright idea of franchising the management of the trust. The purpose of the franchising exercise was made clear—"Sort out the mess that we, the Government, have made of the services and end the overspending." The Government received and accepted a proposal, but to this day, they refuse to publish the franchise plan. They will not tell us what they agreed and what was meant to happen. I have asked time and again only to be answered with a refusal to publish.

That probably does not matter now because another financial crisis has overtaken the trust and the franchise plan to which I referred is irrelevant. The current crisis is even worse. The Ashford and St. Peter's Hospitals NHS trust is now breaking the law because it overspends by £17 million a year. On top of that, it has an inherited debt. I note that the Government wrote off the debts of some trusts in some places but because the trust is based in Surrey, which they do not like, I guess that our debt will not be written off.

Paul Farrelly: I am loth to interrupt the hon. Gentleman in full rant, but earlier, I described some of the advances in north Staffordshire, and I should point out that one of the Labour Government's first decisions in 1997 was to give the go-ahead to a brand new hospital in Amersham. I know that because I contested Chesham and Amersham in the general election in 1997. Would the hon. Gentleman describe the hon. Member for Chesham and Amersham (Mrs. Gillan) as a Labour crony?
